During the Revolutionary War duties were waived, shipbuilding practically ceased, intercourse with England was forbidden and all other trade was hazardous. Virginia alone continued her external policy. After the war tariff duties were again imposed except in New Jersey, and tonnage duties were generally levied for ship protection in connection with tariff rates.

New Hampshire declared in her tariff act of 1788 that one of its principal objects was "To insure a favorable balance of trade and to prevent large sums of money from being drawn to foreign countries." In fact the distress and ruin which overpassed the states from 1783 to 1789, inclusive, was directly due to adverse balances of commerce arising from foreign transportation as well as trade and which largely influenced the legislation of the period causing it to take the form of discriminatory duties. Between 1784 and 1789 the following laws were enacted:

New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut: extraordinary tonnage duties on all foreign vessels entering any of their ports, and American vessels free.

New York: double duties on goods by British ships, whether brought direct or through other states.

New Jersey: tonnage duties on foreign ships. Pennsylvania: tonnage duties on ships, treaty nations $1.41 per ton, on those of other nations $1.88 per ton; home ships free. Discriminating tariff duties on Asiatic goods by foreign ships 2 per cent. extra, on home ships 5 per cent. rebate; teas direct from China on American vessels free, but dutied heavily if brought indirect or by foreign vessels.

Maryland had tonnage duties of $1.00 per ton on British vessels. French or Dutch vessels sixty-six cents per ton, American vessels free.

Virginia: tonnage duties on French or Dutch vessels, fifty cents per ton; British vessels, $1.00 per ton; American vessels free. Brandy by American or French vessels free. Rum by British ships taxed.

South Carolina: thirty-two cents per ton on all foreign vessels; American vessels free, and 2 per cent. ad valorem extra duty on goods in foreign vessels.

Georgia: tonnage duty of forty-two cents per ton on all foreign vessels.

In 1789 the tonnage duty against foreign ships averaged in all the states sixty cents per ton. At this time the regulation of commerce was vested in the moderate government and Congress began its work of regulation.

First Action by Congress.

The first step taken by Congress for the encouragement of shipping was when Mr. Fitzsimons of Pennsylvania on the 18th of April, 1789, introduced a tariff measure that was forthwith adopted. It moved a list of discriminating duties on Asiatic goods calculated to secure the trade of the far East for American ships. He stated that under similar legislation by Pennsylvania that state already commanded the direct commerce with China and India. At the same session Mr. Masson's tonnage resolutions were taken up, but the Senate disapproving of discrimination between foreign countries, the matter went over, but a separate tonnage bill was soon enacted, making an even tonnage rate on all foreign vessels of fifty cents per ton.

This was a great session for the shipowners. Mr. Smith of Maryland, a merchant, moved an amendment to the tariff bill, then nearly completed, to add a clause "allowing a rebate of 10 per cent on duty payable on all goods imported in American vessels" which was carried. In 1794 this rebate to American vessels was changed to an extra duty of 1-10 on all goods imported on foreign vessels. This, with the tonnage tax discrimination, forms the original system of ship protection in this country.

A registry law was enacted on September 1, 1789, defining ownership, under whose provisions it was evidently better to build ones own vessels than to buy them at the risk of having their nationality disputed in foreign ports. Such were the measures comprising the "navigation laws" of the United States as enacted by the first congress.

Stimulating Effect of Ship Protection.

These laws began immediately to have an effect on the shipbuilding and shipowning business of the states. The stimulating effect on American shipping was wonderful, notwithstanding the hard fight that England made against them.

In 1789 the foreign trade shipping of the United States amounted to only 123,893 tons, exports and imports forming 17 1/2 per cent. of the imports and 30 per cent. of the exports. In ten years (1799) the foreign trade shipping of the United States had increased to 657,142 tons, forming 90 per cent. of the imports and 87 per cent. of the exports carried in American ships. During the War of 1812 the percentage of the foreign trade carried by American ships fell to 71 per cent. of the imports and 51 per cent. of the exports.

In 1825, under the original navigation laws, the United States carried in her own ships 95 1/2 per cent. of her imports and 89.6 per cent. of her exports. This marks the highest point reached by American shipping in the foreign trade.

The navigation laws were effective in producing the result desired at the beginning of the history of the United States and a good many of the friends of American shipping think that the restoration of these laws would again give to the United States her fair share of the foreign transportation of the country.

Efforts to Revive Navigation Laws.

A bill was introduced before the last congress for this purpose, entitled "A bill to equalize the footing of ships in foreign trade by constitutional regulation." The author of this bill was Mr. W. W. Bates, N. A., president of the Shipping Society of America and formerly United States Commissioner of Navigation. The headquarters of the society of which Mr. Bates is president, curiously enough, is located in Denver.

I doubt if such a bill can ever find support in the congress of to-day. While there could be no doubt as to the effect of a return to the old navigation laws on the shipping of this country, there is grave doubt as to the possibility of this country with such laws in force keeping up pleasant relationship with other maritime nations.

When these laws were enacted they were retaliatory measures, effective under the conditions then existent to fight against similar measures in use by other nations, in fact they had the effect of finally breaking up the system of discrimination so long and so successfully practiced by England. The conditions of day need other treatment and that will appear when we come to consider what other nations are doing to stimulate their foreign shipping trade.

The old navigation laws failed because they involved this country in a continual struggle with other nations who were also seeking foreign shipping trade. From the first beginning of protection to American shipping in the foreign trade, Great Britain was active in her opposition and she continued to antagonize every effort of America to become a great sea power. This is still to be expected and must be considered in the application of any remedy to our sick shipping. Immediately on the passage of the act of 1789—forming the navigation law of America—Parliament appointed a committee, under Lord Liverpool, to note the acts of Congress and to report measures for their counter action in regard to ship protection. For twenty-five years the British ministry watched and waited, at one time to persuade, at another time to force the United States into an abandonment of discriminatory duties in the carrying trade between the two countries. This course on the part of England began to show results in the making of the "Jay" treaty in 1794, which stipulated that for twelve years the United States government would not increase her duties against British vessels and would permit her to countervail those in force. This treaty, not having the desired effect, in 1802 Parliament passed an act providing for the perpetual non-protection of shipping. It was expected by the British Parliament that Congress would respond with a similar act, but it failed to do so. In 1806 a treaty favoring the same policy was brought over by the United States commissioners, but President Jefferson returned it as too one sided to submit to the Senate. Failing to accomplish anything that would secure the American trade the British determined to provoke a war which would result in the "Yankee" ships being swept from the sea. The United States accepted this challenge in 1812. What took place during the course of this war opens a new chapter in the history of the American shipping trade in foreign commerce and will form the subject matter for our next article.

The term "sandlappers" was invented by the late State Senator Fowler, an eccentric character of Tulare and Fresno counties, and he applied it to the grain farmers who first ventured into the cattle country of the Upper San Joaquin valley. The name stuck to them, at least locally, but intensive and diversified farming have done much to reduce it to dust. The "Sandlapper" is a story, not a history, and, while typical of a critical period in the development of interior California, and somewhat identified as to place, it is wholly arbitrary as to characters and as to most incidents. Any attempt to identify any of the characters as real persons will result in unprofitable confusion. (The Author.)

THE big six mule team, with wagon and trail wagon, and, however, water wagon behind that still, drew out of the dusty road in front of a river ranch house. The huge brakes hissed and scraped against the tires, the steady chuck, chuck, chuck of the hubs against the shoulders of the axles ceased to sound and the team came to a stop.

Directly behind the big team was a spring road wagon, covered, drawn by a span of large bay mares and driven by a dark-skinned, plump little woman in sun-bonnet. On the seat beside her were two tousel-headed boys of five and seven years, respectively, and, in a little padded box, especially contrived, immediately back of the seat, nestled a bright-eyed, rollicking baby girl just big enough to toddle.

Bringing up the rear were half a dozen cows of good breed, with their calves, kept from lagging behind or straying away by a ship of a girl seated on a smallish horse, manifestly little more than a colt. When the big team came to a halt the rest of the caravan came up and stood, dust-begrimed, under the friendly shade of two or three spreading oaks.

The proprietor of the ranch house, who had been sitting on the veranda with chair tipped back against the wall, laid down his newspaper, knocked the ashes from his pipe, and came swinging down to the front gate over which he stood leaning expectantly.

"Can you give me the direction I should take to fetch that section sixteen?" asked the driver, half turning and throwing his leg across the saddle of the big wheeler mule he was riding, naming at the same time the township and range. "I know where the land is from the railroad station out there on the plains, but I ain't a sure how to come at it from this direction."

"Bear to the right as you pass my corner and make for a gap in the timber you'll see low down on the horizon. There ain't any road, but the cattle trails all lead in the direction you took the lake. There's a slough out there a piece, ought to be deep except for a few water holes you can easily keep out of and you'll have no trouble in crossing. I suppose when you get to the land you'll know it if you've been to it."

"Thank you. Now what's my last chance to fill my tank with water it to use while I'm getting a well bored and pump in? I've got the implements with me and will go at it as soon as I can get the tent up and can pick up a man or two to help."

"Well, stranger, I expect this is about your last chance. There ain't no water out there no God can make rivers and ain't never likely to be much that's good. You can drive up by the windmill. Here, Gabe," addressing a stripling who had come around the corner, "pass that garden hose through the fence, so this man can fill his tank, and then turn on the water."

The traveler straightened himself in the saddle, pulled the brake strap releasing the wheels and, calling in stentorian tones, "Gee there; gee, Toby," slapped the jerk line against the mules and drew up a length or two opposite to the place where, just inside the fence, stood the windmill and tank, and presently the water was gurgling through the hose into the tank on the water-wagon.

Meantime, the rancher had walked along up to the town outside the fence and, drawing his jack-knife from his pocket and picking up a stick from the ground, stood leaning against the fence contemplatively whittling. The traveler, having set the brakes and hung the jerkline over the hames of the saddle mule, passed around to the rear of the wagon and took a position against the fence by the side of the rancher.

The conflict between the two men was striking. Both were large and powerfully built, but on different lines. The river rancher was above medium height but so stockily built as to make him appear shorter than he was, and there was a manifest prospect, as the years multiplied, of his having to resist the taking on of adipose tissue. His dark beard covered his face almost to the eyes and was closely cropped and bristly. His eyes were black and, when aroused, had the faculty of glistening.

The teamster stood taller by more than half a head, though he might not have said higher. His arms were long and bony and his hands were huge. He appeared to be stoop-shouldered, but this was mainly because of the depth of his chest, and a habitual forward incline of his head. His hair verged on red and his beard, which was full and came half way down his bosom, was broad, thick and curly. His eyes were blue as azure and laughed with good-nature even when his features were grim.

"I am not watering you up because I am glad you have come into the country," observed the river rancher dryly, "for I am not; but I suppose you 'sandlappers' will not be content until you give those plains a try-out, and in you ought to get on one of those mules."

"You think them a hard proposition then, do you?" inquired the traveler.

"That's what I do, and it appears to me that a man of sense, such as you seem to be, could discover that for himself, if he'd look about a bit before driving stakes, instead of letting some sharper of a real estate dealer rope him in. You ought to get on one of those mules of yours and ride around among those water holes down along the sloughs and see the skeletons of the cattle that have died of starvation, leaving their bones to bleach in the sun. I have seen that land you are going to mighty near as bare as the middle of that road, and for two years in succession, too."

"I noticed some likely looking wheat back here a piece as I came along," returned the teamster, "and the soil looks to me to be uncommon good."

"Yes, the soil is all right, and this year there was some rain, but maybe there won't be any to speak of next year or the year after; and if there ain't, people won't be able to see your coat tails flopping for the dust you will be making in getting out of the country. I tell you you won't be doing yourself nor anybody else any good by setting out there on that waste where the sun and the sand are a-kissing of each other the live-long day for more than three hundred days in the year. It's a stock range, and a stock range is all it ever will be fit for, and it ain't more than half the time that it is fit for that."

"Well, stranger," drawled the teamster, "Silas Singham generally comes pretty near to knowing what he is doing and why he does it, and he ain't coming down here from Yolo with both eyes shut tight. He rather thinks he'll drive on, set stakes and hold down a half section of that desolation awhile anyhow. Much obliged to you, though, for your advice. I suppose it is all for my good and not two words for your own to one for mine. You've been here a long time, I take it, and ought to know, I reckon."

"Forty acres in by the river, with a little ditch of water on it, would be worth more to you than 640 out there on the plains without water," was the reply.

"Perhaps there may be a ditch of water taken out on the plains some day," ventured the teamster, with an expression of countenance that implied that this was not the first time the subject had entered his mind. "It looks to me as though that land would take to water as naturally as a duck."

"Perhaps it would if it had the chance," returned the rancher, "but there ain't no chance and ain't never goin' to be none, either. The river folks want all the water there is in the river, except in flood time, and even then it does more good than harm, for the flooded lowlands grow good feed for two or three years after. First in time, first in right is the law of it, and we river folks haven't been here twenty years ahead of you for nothing."

"May there not be another principle of the law that might cut some figure in the case?" ventured the teamster. "Seems to me I have heard something about the 'greatest good to the greatest number,' and it would not surprise me if the water that would irrigate forty acres in here on the river, after coming down through thirty miles of sand, lost an acre or two on hard ground higher up, and run in ditches right meadow, irrigate 640 acres out there on the plains."

"Well, that ain't never goin' to be done," returned the rancher with increasing warmth. "It ain't never goin' to be done; so don't build on it. We river folks were here first, and we are goin' to stand for our rights, every man of us. The water that comes down as far as my place is mine, just as much as my land is, and if I can't have what's mine I don't care to live, so when I say that we river men are going to fight for our rights, I mean fight, and we are going to fight just as hard and as often as it is necessary in order to hold on to our property. We've expected an inrush of sandlappers sooner or later and we've got their work cut out for 'em. They ain't never goin' to be allowed to touch the water in our ditch. They have made trouble enough down the valley, and we propose to let them know what's what the first rattle out of the box. The appropriation law ain't worth shucks unless it catches the river folks sleeping on their rights, and the men on this river are not goin' to be caught asleep for no live years at a stretch, until adverse user stops them from complaining."

"With this the river rancher squatted close to the ground and, reaching out for a splinter of a fence board, took off a few large shavings and then proceeded to eat the stick into short bits in silence, while the teamster only gave vent to a prolonged whistle.

"I hope my cattle won't be bothering your crops out there on the plains, if you should ever happen to have any crops," the river rancher never observed, as if half talking to himself. "They ain't an order at all, and I am more inclined to follow their appetites than their consciences."

"Oh! I am not looking for any trouble on that score," cheerfully responded the teamster. "You seem to know a good bit of law yourself and you are not a man to be around your cattle that there is a no-fence law in this state. A man with a taste for law isn't likely to let his cattle grow up in ignorance of that fact."

"They don't know any more about that fool law than the fool legislators knew that passed it," returned the rancher. "Besides, that section you have located on is right in the middle of my range on the road betwixt this ranch and my lake ranch, between which they are migrating back and forth a good share of the time. Every trail runs straight across it, so if you want to be on the safe side I reckon you'd better fence."

"Not if Silas Singham knows himself," was the emphatic rejoinder. "I can't afford it, and if I had ever so much money I wouldn't do it, for I don't sanction the principle of it. If my crops threatened to eat up your cattle I'd fence right away or get out of the country, as any good citizen ought to do, but as it is a case of your cattle eating up my crops, I reckon you are the one who will have to do the fencing. Ain't there something in the law about 'so using your own as not to injure another's property.'

"Look here, stranger," exclaimed the river rancher, rising to his feet and lifting his voice proportionately, "we may just as well understand each other now as later. I'll see all the sandlappers this side of Tophet safely over the rim into it before I'll fence my cattle, or herd them either, and we river folks are all of the same mind. Those plains out there are fit for nothing but stock range, and stock range they will remain, fence law or no fence law. We've got God Almighty on our side in this business, for if he'd intended those plains to be made farms, he would have supplied them with either rivers or rain, and if you squatters will govern yourselves accordingly you'll be saving yourselves and us a heap of trouble. That's what you will."

As the rancher delivered himself of this final outburst that glitter for which he had long been noted, and which had caused him to be looked upon as a dangerous man to antagonize, came into his eyes and caused them to gleam like a pair of black diamonds. It had been said of Moses Brayton that he had two pairs of eyes, one pair for ordinary use and a second pair, behind the first, for occasions when he was thoroughly aroused. At such times the second pair shone out through the first and indicated the true character of the man. His neighbors said that they were "devil's eyes!"

For an instant the two men confronted each other in silence, but with looks that plainly told the frightened little woman in the wagon that they were taking each other's measure against an event not unlikely to take place some other day if not on the spot. Neither was afraid, but each saw in the other an antagonist that, whether or however the issue were tried, would put him to a final test of either mental or physical prowess.

"Come, Papa!" the woman in the wagon called, "don't you see that the tank is full and running over?"

Recalling himself to the duty in hand, Silas Singham tossed the hose over the fence, and lightly springing over after it, shut off the faucet, and as lightly vaulted back again. Notwithstanding his huge bulk and length of limb he still was, as he had ever been, an athlete.

"Look here, my man," he said, with a restrained coolness not without emphasis. "You haven't extended to me the sort of welcome I expected for one who comes here as head of a colony to develop the country, and you are not the sort of man I want to be beholden to right at the start. I want to pay you for that tank water."

"I ain't reduced to selling water by the tankful," was the reply, "and you'd better hold on to all the money you've got. You may need it before you get to sell anything off that horned tooth ranch of your'n."

"There isn't any good way for me to get that water but up into that tank where it came from, or I'd put it right back and drive on, so you'll take a dollar for it or it goes upon the ground before it leaves your land," declared the teamster.

"Let her squizzle then," was the rejoinder.

With that Silas Singham strode to the water wagon, opened the faucet full wide, swung himself into his saddle and, with a resounding crack of his whip and a "gee, Toby," led the way for his caravan to the newly established railroad station, where he could refill his water wagon without being beholden to any "condemned riparianist," he explained to the big wheel mule he was riding.

The river rancher stood leaning against the fence whittling viciously and watching with glittering eyes the receding procession until it was well-nigh lost in the dust of its own making, and until the chuck, chuck, chuck of the heavy hubs against the axles, as the wagons wobbled through the ruts, could no longer be heard. When he had turned toward the house to resume his chair and newspaper his boy overheard him muttering to himself, "That sandlapper is going to make a heap of trouble first and last—if he lives, but if Moses Brayton does not hold his own with him it will be the first time he has met his match. He is husky, though, there's no getting around that."

Chapter II. AMITY AND COMITY.

Having poked the end of the garden hose through the fence and turned on the water as directed the lad addressed as "Gabe" slipped through the gate to inspect the big team, then the smaller wagon with its contents, and, finally, sidled along to what had been his objective from the first, the half grown girl on horseback watching the cows and their calves feeding on the dry grasses by the roadside.

"Huh! Those calves of your'n look pretty well fagged out," he observed, casting a shy look up into the face of the girl.

"You'd look pretty well fagged out, too, if you had hoofed it all the way from Yolo," was the reply.

"Huh! How long yer been a comin'?"

"Two weeks this morning since we started."

"Huh! That's a pretty likely looking broncho you're ridin'."

"It isn't any broncho at all, at least not more than half. It's a Kentucky thoroughbred."

"Huh! I'll bet we've got a horse that will beat him all hollow for a half mile dash, if he is a thoroughbred."

"Now, I'll just bet you haven't. There ain't anything that goes on four legs that can beat Roanoke for a half mile, if he is only a colt."

"Huh! I'll bet you anything you want that Peacock can."

"Pshaw! Peacocks can't run."

"Huh! Peacock ain't no peacock. Peacock's a horse, four years old, and he can throw dust in the eyes of anything in Tulare county. You ought to see him. He's a bird."

"Thought you just said he was a horse and now you say he is a bird, but, bird or horse, he can't beat Roanoke. Can he, Roanoke?" As the girl ceased speaking she flicked the horse lightly on the breast with her riding whip and he shook his head as decided a "no" as any horse could.

"Huh! Can he do any more tricks?" demanded the lad.

"Can you, Roanoke?" she asked, and immediately the horse nodded three vigorous assents.

"Huh! I'll give you a good trade for him."

"No you won't," affirmed the girl.

"Huh! What'll you take for him then?"

"Roanoke isn't for sale, are you, Roanoke?" and again the horse gave an emphatic negative. "As long as we both live Roanoke and Helen are not going to be parted. Nobody ever feeds him but me. He has been mine ever since he was born, and he is going to be mine until one or other of us dies."

"I had a sister once named Helen, but the diphtheria took her two years ago. It came mighty near taking me, too, and Ma says that Pa hain't never forgiven me for not dying and leavin' her. Anyway he hain't never been just the same to me that he used to be before Helen was took. He used to say: 'Son, don't you want to take a ride with Dad out on the range?' Now he says: 'Gabe, catch up my boss and fetch him round'; and if I say: 'Pa, can't I go, too?' he says: 'Now, you stay 'long with Ma. She might be lonesome and the cattle'll be plenty of company for me.'

"Do you know," the lad continued, "you remind me a heap of Helen. She had just such snappy eyes with fun in 'em, and just such wavy, brown hair. She'd a been just about your age, too, if she had a lived, I reckon, for she was ten when she was took and that was two years ago."

"I am twelve past," remarked Helen solemnly, for the earnestness and evident emotion with which the boy spoke touched her sharply.

"Huh! I was fourteen a month ago," the lad replied. "What's your whole name?"

"Helen Singham."

"Sing-ham, that's a funny name. Seems to me I'd rather sing something else besides ham."

"You don't have to sing it if you don't like it. You're so smart, now what's your name?"

"Well, folks mostly call me Gabe, but that ain't my name, nor Gabriel ain't neither, though they call me that sometimes when they want to be real nice to me, so I'll do something for 'em."

"Well, what do they call you Gabriel for if it ain't your name, though I think it is a pretty name, only it is more fit for a girl. It is too nice a name to waste on a boy."

"Huh! That's because they call me Gabriel because I am always tooting my own horn, but Ma says it is because I am full of the Old Harry."

"But what is your real name—you haven't told me yet?"

"Huh! It's Clayton Brayton." "Clay-ton! Bray-ton! That's such a funny name. One can't help singing that." And immediately she began to sing it half at the top of her voice, up the scale and down, at which they both laughed heartily. "I tell you what, though," she said, "it is most a wonder that they did not call you 'Huh.' You say it almost every time you open your mouth. If they'd a let you alone you'd have named yourself." And then they both laughed again.

"Will you be goin' to school at the station when it begins next fall?" asked the boy.

"Oh, I expect so, Roanoke and I. Will they let horses come to school?"

"There's more'n a dozen horses there every day, staked out, or under the shed if it rains, but the kids are apt to pester you some at first. I won't let them, though, I'll be darned if I will. If you were a boy it would be different."

"Oh, I can take care of myself, I guess. I wasn't born in a hospital."

"Huh! I didn't say you were," said the lad, "but anyhow if I catch any of 'em making off with your saddle, blanket, or tying your bridle reins into knots, I'll thump 'em to sleep. They know me, and if they see that I'm on your side they'll go mighty slow; but if you was a boy somebody would lick you the first day. You know I kind of like you right at the start."

"Don't know whether I'm going to like you so awfully well or not. You are pretty fresh, I must say." With that they laughed again as only young folks can.

So absorbed had the youngsters been with each other that they had not taken note of the less fraternal conversation that had taken place between their respective sires, but the well-known "Gee-up there, Toby," of Silas Singham, and the renewal of the steady chuck, chuck, chuck, of the big wagon, recalled the girl to her duties, and so, with an exchange of hearty good-bys, the two children separated to meet again in school at the station early in the fall.

"Clayton Brayton," the girl hummed to herself as she rode along. "There is no danger of forgetting that name."

"Ma'd a had a crying spell if she'd a seen that girl," the boy thought to himself as he walked toward the house after Helen had gotten fairly out of sight. "I'll bet Peacock can't stand that horse, though, and I mean to give him a try some day when Dad's gone to the city with cattle and Ma ain't payin' much attention."

point on the Truckee river below all these Clark's Station, has built a head gate to divert the water to supply the Truckee-Carson irrigation project, which has been carried through by the reclamation service, a bureau of the Department of the Interior.

A controversy arose over the right of the government to a stated share of the water, the electric companies claiming that the prior claims were jeopardized by the reclamation project. As the Truckee River General Electric Company owns fifty-four acres and the dam at the outlet of Lake Tahoe at the head of Truckee river, the government, in turn, felt that its water for the reclamation project was insecurely guaranteed. Out of this controversy the contract in question was agreed on as a compromise. It may safely be said that the Truckee River General Electric Company is now a firm believer in compromises, for it gets an astonishing lot of concessions as its share.

By this contract the government gets one solitary thing; it gets the assurance that after all the vested rights of, and the new rights acquired by, the electric company are satisfied the government shall have the right to the amount of water which it has gotten in the past for the reclamation project if that amount of water is left.

The Truckee River General Electric Company gets:

1. The government to pay half the expenses of rebuilding the company's dam at the outlet of Lake Tahoe.

2. The government to pay half the expense of dredging the bed of the lake near the outlet so as to improve the free flow.

3. The government to assume the expense of operating the dam at the outlet, and to pay one-half the cost of all necessary repairs and renewals, and

4. The government to guarantee that the flow of water in the Truckee river past the various power plants shall always be sufficient to the current necessities of these power plants as they now exist. (Mention is considerably made of a collateral contract with an overruling Providence by which the government is relieved of responsibility for failure to provide such flow in case of the acts of God or the public enemy.)

This is not all that the Truckee River General Electric Company gets. The contract stipulates that, by going through the paper formality of relieving the government of its responsibility for providing such flow—but not relieving the government of the cost of operating the present outlet of Lake Tahoe—the company thereby automatically receives from the government a perpetual franchise permitting it to divert the waters of Lake Tahoe at any other point on the lake rim that it chooses for any power purposes it may desire. Furthermore, with this privilege, the company gets the right to select any power sites or storage reservoir sites it chooses on the entire Lake Tahoe watershed or on the entire Truckee river watershed that are on lands owned by the government. The company is not limited as to number or location of these power sites, and it is given five years in which to select them, five more years in which to build on them, and eternity in which to occupy them—all of them, if it chooses. This sounds too preposterous for belief, but that is what the contract says. The Truckee River General Electric Company is given an absolute, perpetual monopoly of all the remaining power possibilities of the Truckee river and Lake Tahoe water-sheds, with the one stipulation that certain vested private irrigation interests shall be protected in their present status, and that the waters for the reclamation project shall never be less than what the government has been in the past receiving.

A remarkable feature of the contract is the fact that the government could have condemned the dam at the present outlet of Lake Tahoe and fully protected its rights at the cost of a lump sum in the neighborhood of $100,000 without making any of the sweeping concessions that are described above. In fact, such condemnation proceedings were undertaken by the government and have not even yet been withdrawn. They have merely been allowed to rest while the present contract was being made.

The great value of this contract to the Truckee River General Electric Company, besides the fact that it gives it a complete monopoly, is that it permits the company to divert the waters of Lake Tahoe at another point so that, in a distance of five miles, it acquires a fall of 1100 feet, capable of developing at a most conservative estimate 40,000 additional horsepower. And under this second diversion, another fall permits the development of another 20,000 horsepower. And under the rights on the Little Truckee, acquired under this contract, it can develop another additional 15,000 horsepower. For this concession and for its monopoly it pays no one anything and inveigles the government into standing one-half of the expenses of most of the operation and construction.

Differences Between the New and the Old.

It was promised last week that some essential differences between the new constitution of California and the old one would be explained. These differences are so many and so important that more than one lesson will have to be devoted to them, so this time we will devote ourselves to the legislative department.

It has been explained that the People of California had become suspicious of their legislatures, largely through the baneful influences exerted by the Central Pacific people in securing such legislation as advantaged their enterprises. Making money hand over fist, they were not parsimonious in paying some of that money out to lobbyists and legislators who would subscribe their interests. To curb this evil the constitutional convention set itself to the task of tying the hands of the legislature not behind its back or tight to its side, but with so short a rope as to keep its hands out of its pockets to some extent and in plain view as much as possible.

The old constitution declared that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." The new constitution declared, in effect, that all laws shall be of a general nature. It prohibited specifically three particular kinds of special legislation wherein abuses had resulted, covering almost the entire field of ordinary legislation, and then, to clinch the matter, added a thirty-third, which prohibited special legislation "where a general law can be made applicable."

Great abuses grew up under the old, wide-open system of legislating specially to fit particular cases in particular places, but they were not all prevented by constitutionally forbidding special legislation. For instance, the different counties were specially legislated for or against (not infrequently the latter) as their representatives in the legislature could make shift to get bills through. This is still being done through the device of making nearly as many classes of counties as there are counties and then legislating specially for each class. In most cases one county constitutes a class. The supreme court has "winked the other eye" and gravely held this not to be special legislation, although every man in his senses knows that it is. Its seeming necessity has excused the overriding of a fundamental reform attempted by the framers of the new constitution.

Again, Section 32 of Article IV plainly prohibits the payment of any claim against the state "under any agreement or contract made without express authority of the law," yet such claims are paid at the order of every legislature that sits, through the device of not stating in the appropriation bill what the basis of the claim is. All such claims are paid through "An Act to Pay the Claim of," without reciting what the claim is for, and the supreme court has held, in effect, that a perfectly unconstitutional claim against the state may be constitutionally paid if the reason why it is paid is not stated in the bill. Many hundreds of thousands of dollars have by this shallow device been paid from the state treasury since the adoption of the new constitution, whose payment that constitution expressly forbids. In many cases these claims were just and deserved to be paid, but others have been no better than graft, having neither moral nor legal validity.

Section thirty-three of the same article sought to prevent public service corporations overcharging the public by authorizing the legislature to enact laws governing their charges. The legislature sought to make this provision effective by giving boards of supervisors and city trustees power to fix rates of charges for gas, water and other public service corporations. The general result of this policy was to precipitate all these corporations into the politics of every city in the state with the view of securing boards of supervisors or city trustees who would agree to let the public service corporations and enough higher, while they were about it, to reimburse those companies for the cost of "fixing" such boards of supervisors or trustees.

If this ruse in any instance failed to serve the interests of such corporations they generally appealed to the courts on the ground that the rates fixed were confiscatory, and, by procrastination in the courts (collecting meantime such rates as they felt inclined to impose) deferred the issue so long as to make it unimportant how the case was decided when decided.

To put it in a nutshell, thirty years of effort to fix rates at once just to the public service corporations and to their patrons have proven futile. If fair rates have been obtained it has been for reasons outside of the efforts which the constitution and legislation have made. Public sentiment and a disposition to be fair on the part of the corporation managers are to be credited with such good results as have been obtained.

Great efforts were made by the new constitution and attendant legislation to stamp out bribery in official life and to abolish lobbying in legislative halls. There was need of it, but little enough has been accomplished. It is open and notorious that, since the New Constitution was adopted, the Southern Pacific and other corporations have maintained lobbies at every legislative session and it is openly and notoriously known that hundreds of thousands of illicit dollars have been passed into the pockets of legislators in senatorial and other contests, yet only two persons have undergone imprisonment in consequence of such malfeasance.

Another protective measure imposed by the new constitution was that prohibiting public officials, on pain of forfeiture of their offices, riding on passes over the railroads, yet legislators have ridden miles innumerable without paying their fare. Tickets, on slow trains, have been slipped into their hands without cost to them at every session. Only here and there a legislator refuses the courtesy. Sergeants-at-arms, in charge of junketing committees, have drawn from the state the value of the full fares of all the traveling members and handed the amount to them to be pocketed by them while turning in to conductors tickets to cover the expenditures supposedly paid for out of the committee fund, but in reality furnished without cost by the railroad lobbyists.

These facts, so open and notorious as not to be questioned, show the futility of attempting to legislate men and corporations into honest ways when they are essentially dishonest. The fault, as often pointed out, lies in a low standard of public and private morals in this commonwealth among rich and poor, officials and citizens. The public sentiment will never get better service than it unequivocally demands.

It is reported that Mr. Etsuo Etsuo, a wealthy resident of Omi province, Japan, will present 30,000 fireflies to the Emperor. These fireflies are said to have been caught by himself and his mother and wife.

The Unconquerable Soul of Man.

The north pole has been reached, and an American flag has been planted where the pole ought to be.

There was nothing there. It was not anticipated that anything would be found there, save a shifting sea of purple ice, with the possible addition of one or two scientific facts of some significance. Then why the century and a half struggle to get there at the sacrifice of hundreds of human lives and money running into the millions?

To demonstrate the unconquerable soul of Man! There is no task too hard for him, no risk too dangerous, no jumping-off place that he will not brave, no land forbidden him, no flaming sword that can turn him back. A little lower than the angels, he crowns himself, again and again, with glory and honor. He has even had the hardihood to face Eternal Majesty with a demand for justice for his race.

All honor to Dr. Frederick A. Cook! He has carried the emblem of human freedom farther than any other man, and what though he has set it up in a voiceless solitude to wave unseen in razor-edged air, the fact that it is there will stimulate the imaginations of millions and make appeal to them to make that banner worthy of the celebrity that has come to it.

If character building be the purpose of life then is Dr. Cook one of our master builders.

What About the Fourth Man?

Probably Mr. Heney can be elected district attorney of San Francisco no matter who, or how many, make the race for mayor, but his chances would be improved, and the welfare of San Francisco would be immensely advanced, if the movement for Heney could be associated with a similar movement for a first-class head for a good government ticket. Has San Francisco the manhood to fetch out such a candidate for such a ticket?

To put up with a choice out of three admitted evils is craven. It would better befit an old people's home or an orphanage than an American city. Unless civic virtue in San Francisco is dead or gone aishing the fourth candidate for mayor, if he be made of the right stuff, should sweep the town, and there is little reason for thinking civic virtue either dead or aishing. It is tired, but it is alive. It was feared by many that the last national campaign was going by default, but when the votes were counted it looked different. The people had made up their minds and were quietly waiting for the 3d of November. They are now waiting, like so many spinsters, for the right man.

We have felt that Walter Macarthur possesses more points of "rightness" at this time than any other man of the hour. He is honest, capable, has few downright enemies and a host of friends. He has the negative strength that nothing can be said against him, with the positive strength that everything can be said for him that can be said for any man, except that he can not afford to finance a race.

The kind of mayor that James D. Phelan would make we all know because he has been mayor three times, serving with credit every time. He has enemies. His negative strength is not as great as that of Mr. Macarthur, but his positive strength is not exceeded by that of any man in town. He can win if he will run, and he can afford to make the race.

With either of these men placed before the people they will have the alternative of accepting a positive good instead of a Hobson's choice among three admitted evils. To offer the Men of San Francisco less than such a freedom of choice would be a disgrace to the forces of civic reform.

The Guilt of Gold.

That the world's supply of gold is increasing at a tremendous pace can not be questioned. The addition of $420,000,000 to $450,000,000 a year in the yellow metal to the world's well-boarded supply can not go on forever without wonderfully cheapening the metal itself. When the metal is cheapened it takes more of it to be worth a day's labor, a sack of flour, a ham, a barrel of sugar, a bolt of muslin or a suit of clothes. In other words, other conditions remaining unchanged, prices must rise. The cost of living must be increased as measured by gold.

This is what is going on all over the world. The cost of living is increasing, prices are going up, land is worth more this year than last, taxes are higher because it takes more money to buy the things that government has got to have. Transportation rates are increasing, interest is higher and when merchants sell off a stock of goods they can not take the proceeds of their sale and go into the market and replace the stock for the same money that the old stock cost. There is no getting away from this condition of affairs except to plug up the mines and keep the miners out of them, and this can not be done. Government is not to be blamed for the situation, courts are not and neither are political bureaus of greedy corporations. Gold is guilty.

But it does not follow that the increase of gold is the only cause of increase in the cost of living, although the press controlled by the interests fair would make it so appear. Excessive tariffs, combinations to "cinch" the consumer, the raising of freight rates 10 per cent, merely because they can be raised, the sequestration and monopolization of nature's sources of wealth, all these help to raise prices, too. They are particeps criminis. Never forget that, and when some representative of the interests would make you believe that gold is the only cause of an increased cost of living tell him "nay, nay, not so, good sir." We can not fight gold, but the other conspirators we can and must. Up and at 'em.

A Prodigy of Power.

The reader who desires merely to be entertained may find this week's instalment of our "Hydro-Electric Power in California" dry reading. Unavoidably it is mainly a category of the communities and corporations that go to make up two main power generating, distributing and consuming groups covering the greater part of Southern California.

But the reader with a mind to be concerned for the welfare of the commonwealth will find the article profoundly suggestive. There are little communities gathered about a manufacturing concern whose life or death, prosperity or adversity, are altogether bound up in what befalls "the company." It is coming to be so with the whole of California, as related to the Southern Pacific Company and affiliated corporations.

This has come about not unnaturally. What more natural than that the railroads should desire to own and control the interurban electric lines that, otherwise, would come into competition with such railroads? What more natural than that those who own and control the interurban car lines should desire to own and control urban car lines as well? What more natural than that those who own and operate all these car lines should desire to own and operate the power generating and distributing plants by which they move?

Finally, what more natural than that the community of interest that owns and operates railroads, car lines and hydro-electric power plants should wish also to control the government that is to control all these corporate activities? Having all these sources of control in their hands, what more natural, aye inevitable, than that "The Cinch" should be applied to the people of California in accord with Mr. Harriman's fundamental philosophy that every man is entitled to all he can get? There is growing up in this commonwealth a giant of such prodigious stature as will make the Espee of old look like a Tom Thumb by comparison. Its growth has been natural, logical, perhaps inevitable, but so is the growth of a cancer.

If now the committee representing the League of Independent Republican clubs will call Mr. Leland into counsel they will learn from his own lips that in the event of his election Gavin McNab will not control Leland, that he will be a free man solicitous only for the good name of his city and the untarnished reputation he can leave to his posterity. And then let them call in McCarthy and apply to him the better test. It won't melt in his untold mouth. Was that league led by spring chickens, and from the incubator at that, that the leaders are so gulgiply gulgible?

HOW FAR HAVE WE COME?

The Morning Echo, of Bakersfield, (Hon. S. C. Smith's paper) takes the Imperial Standard to task for uttering a "wail of despair," in stating that, during the last quarter of a century, the people have made complete surrender to powerful corporate interests; that it can not recall one instance, during that period, where the corporations wanted anything they did not get, no matter how completely the interests of the people were ignored.

Per contra, The Echo, in a spirit of exaltation, points to the fact that, during the last quarter of a century, it has become established that public service corporations are public servants; that the right of government to supervise and adjust their rates is no longer questioned; that, a quarter of a century ago, street railway franchises were given away while now we take a share of their earnings for public use, and franchises are now taxed.

Our contemporaries are both right. Looking back over the last quarter of a century the verdict of history must be that some splendid principles, then in dispute, have become theoretically affirmed. It is only in their application that we fall short of realization. No sooner was the principle of governmental control established than the allied corporations took control of that department of government which did the controlling, the people got the principle, the corporations got the proceeds; the people made the platforms, the allied corporations named the candidates. Instead of subjugating the corporations an incorporated plutocracy has subjugated half the states in the American Union and dominated the Congress lately adjourned. No complete victory has yet been won.

There is no justification for the spirit of despair, yet whoever does not know that free institutions were never in greater danger than they are today is both deaf and blind and should have the grace to remain dumb. The danger is not that the forms of free government will be overthrown, or that sound principles of government will cease to slip glibly from the tongue. The danger is that the form will lack the substance, that the spirit will lack a material body which it may make effective for the common good. Venice continued to be known as the "Republic of Venice" near a thousand years after it ceased to possess a single attribute of popular government and had become as pitiless a tyranny as ever cursed the children of men.

Our time calls for courage, steadfastness, the inspiration of hope and the determination to achieve victory over incorporated greed and an associated lust for power, selfishly to be employed; but whoever is not concerned for the future of free government in this country, profoundly concerned for it, is either a trifler or so wrapped in self as to be blind to public concerns.

James J. Hill lately applied four tests to our time. They were equality, simplicity, economy and justice. Have we equality? Never in our country has class consciousness been so pronounced as now, or the man who "goes back on his class" been so derided. Have we simplicity? Ask of the more than baronial splendor of the American nabobs of today? Ask of Harriman with his $2,000,000 castle and 50,000-acre preserve in the heart of agricultural New York. Have we justice? It is a purchasable commodity, dear it is true, but to be had, or not to be endured, as those who are able may choose at the price. If free, then only of, for and among those of no political or social significance. Have we economy? Ask, we have—in the homes of the people where a rising cost of living has enforced it for the further aggrandizement of men already rich beyond the avarice of kings of a former age.

Yet we must and will believe that the rise of the common man is to be continuous, that unselfish, capable leadership will not be wanting as it is in San Francisco today; that the deadening inertia of the mass that has just suffered San Francisco politically to temporize with the hosts of a soulless materialism will be cast aside whenever some Moses speaks to the people that they go forward.

Looking backward, we have not, all along the human front, come so far as the Echo would have us believe or marked time as the Standard seems to think. At certain points we have advanced. At others ground has been lost. After all, a quarter of a century is not a day in the world's history, nor half a day. As the 2,000-year-old sequoias are too short-lived to tell us of climatic changes on this coast, but only the geologic strata or perchance the glaciers, so centuries are too short wherewith to measure in exact terms the progress of the Common Man, to whom this continent was dedicated.

WHO IS BEING FOOLED?

William Crocker was taken up by a committee of twenty-five and his nomination for mayor secured at the hands of the Republican party. That committee of twenty-five was openly and notoriously constituted in the interests of persons under indictment for graft and with the view of electing a municipal ticket that will put an end to the graft prosecutions, so setting the rascals free.

A certain League of Independent Republican clubs was formed for the purpose of putting before Republican voters a municipal ticket that decent men could support, a ticket that, if nominated and elected, would stand for the equal enforcement of the laws against rich malefactors and poor alike and for the continuance of the graft prosecutions until those connected with crime are either acquitted or convicted. Byron Mauzy headed this ticket and Republicans very generally voted for him, but, by the use of Union Labor and Democratic votes, galvanized as Republicans, the Committee of twenty-five ticket triumphed and William Crocker becomes the putative Republican candidate for mayor of San Francisco. The issue so fought out at the primary was as plain as the difference between white and black, daylight and darkness, heaven and the other place.

Now comes a self-constituted committee representative of the League of Independent Republican Clubs and, after a two-hours' conference with William Crocker, proclaims to the parent body that Mr. Crocker's views are in full harmony with those of the League of Independent Republican clubs. Who is being fooled?

Unless Mr. Rudolph Spreckels and Mr. Patrick Calhoun have buried all differences and have fallen upon each other's necks in an ecstasy of brotherly affection, unless Mr. Francis J. Heney and the bunch of seven odoriferous attorneys who sat over against him are now in complete accord and concord, unless the forces of decency and of indecency can no longer find differences between them, unless right is wrong and wrong is right and licentiousness and chastity are one and the same thing one person can no more be representative of the sentiments of the League of Independent Republicans clubs and those of the Herrin-Hellman committee of twenty-five than any one person can represent, and be acceptable to St. John and Iscariot, vice and virtue, God and Mammon. Who is being fooled?

Having made friends with the Mammon of unrighteousness and obliged himself to do their bidding, is Mr. Crocker now seeking substantial favors from the children of light? Can one servant serve two masters? Or has Mr. Crocker discovered that his original backers procured his nomination merely to divide the decent element while they slaughter him at the polls in favor of the more servicable McCarthy? This gives Mr. William Crocker credit for a political sagacity of which his best friends have not deemed him capable. Who is being fooled?

Have the committee representing the League of Republican clubs played false to their constituency and compromised with Crocker the principles of their League in the interests of party regularity? Not so. The thing is unthinkable. They are all of them honorable gentlemen and if they say that they have received satisfactory assurances from Crocker it is because they have received them. Has the Committee of twenty-five fared less well?

It can not be denied that the Political Bureau over which Mr. Herrin presides, and which avails itself of the activities of Lynch and Sullivan, and such allies as Hellman and the rest of the Calhoun crowd, does occasionally slip up on its men. It did so in the case of State Treasurer Williams, who proved true blue, and it appears to have done so with Surveyor General Kingsbury, who refused to be a thief, but it is dollars to nickels, twenty to one, that those people know their man as most men know their own back yards.

Who, then, is being fooled?

A SCHOOL FOR STATESMEN.

The California Weekly is not ashamed of its School For Citizenship, a department that finds new friends from week to week, but what California needs fully as much as a training school for citizens is a training school for statesmen. It has not had such a school since the advent of the old Central Pacific in politics in the early 70's. Nor has California, since then, had in either branch of Congress a representative of first class character and abilities, unless we except Newton Booth, who served in the United States Senate from '73 to '79, and Thomas R. Bard, whose term in the senate was not long enough to give him an opportunity fully to develop that statesmanship of which his friends believe him capable. Senator Stanford was a consummate political manipulator, but his statesmanship was well measured by the financial vagaries with which he refreshed the faists. Good men California has sent to Congress, but not men big enough to rank as statesmen.

And for the reason that the political powers that have ruled California for more than thirty years have had no use for public men of first class abilities and independent spirit. The measure of manhood applied by the political bureau of the Central Pacific Company and its successors has been that of capacity for "taking orders", whether in the assembly or senate of the California legislature or House or Senate in the national congress. No man has gone to any one of these august bodies, with the hearty consent of the political bureau mentioned, without satisfying that bureau that, at crucial times, he will not prove disobedient.

This political status in California has made political life uninviting to men of first class abilities and independent spirit, and, lacking that forgetfulness of self that should have actuated them to fight a public enemy without hope of private advancement, men of first class ability have devoted themselves to other than public careers.

There is but one remedy for this untoward condition, and that lies in the emancipation of California from corporate control. Take the state out of the hands of Herrin and his hirlings and public careers will be open to men whose self-respect will not permit them to "take orders" or cool their heels in ante-rooms of great corporations that the further pleasure of those corporations may be learned. If the insurgent movement in the Republican ranks achieves no other good than this of opening the way into public life to a self-respecting and capable manhood, it will be worth all it can cost, and in helping to open this way no better "School for Statesmanship" can be devised. The call is for volunteers. Who is ready to enlist for the war? If the movement win, a way will be opened whereby the fittest may rise. If it lose, there will at least be the consolation of having fought in a good cause.

THE LINE OF CLEAVAGE.

That there is a distinct line of cleavage running through the Republican party no observant person can deny. It is easily followed through such issues as the emancipation of the party from corporate control, such a revision of our criminal procedures as will give The People the rights and privileges regarding venue, challenging of jurors and appeal which defendants have, the non-partisan nomination and election of the judiciary, state-wide advisory vote at the primary election on the selection of United States senator, the non-alienation in perpetuity of water rights and power franchises, the power of the national government to levy an income tax, the conservation of our national resources as opposed to their exploitation by greedy corporations, the upholding of the Roosevelt policies in general.

Few if any independent, progressive Republicans will hesitate to take the affirmative of all these issues. The organization wing may as certainly be counted on to take the negative, if not openly in specific resolutions, then covertly and implacably, in congress and legislature, with the purpose of defeating or retarding every step toward the realization of any of these purposes. Of these things we may be as certain as though the allied iniquities had assembled in solemn convolve and formally resolved against every such forward step.

No doubt this line of cleavage might be further extended as, for instance, for and against non-partisanship in municipal elections, the abolition of wards and election of city officials at large, the initiative, referendum and recall in cities.

It is equally plain that the same line of cleavage would run through the Democratic party from end to end. On the progressive side of this line of cleavage Republicans and Democrats would be found working in harmony for the progressive policies above outlined. On the reactionary or "organization" side Democrats and Republicans would be found cheek by jowl sitting in stolid hostility to every forward movement.

The Man from Mars might ask why, in view of this condition, all the progressive Republicans and Democrats do not unite to form a single party of progress and all the "Organization" Democrats and Republicans to form a conservative or non-progressive party. There are two reasons why. The principal reason is that the associated villainies are strong only as they are on the inside of both political parties. If they stand up to be counted they are lost. The other reason lies in the inertia of political affiliation and tradition. We were Republicans or Democrats long before and continue to be long after, we are able to give any good reason why we should be either.

Therefore the contest must be in both parties and for the control of both parties. Shall the contest be waged all along the whole line of cleavage or only upon one issue—the emancipation of both political parties from corporate domination? This is an issue which the progressive elements in both parties must decide for themselves respectively. The "organization" will have to go to battle on any battle ground the progressive element may choose. All advantages of position and time may be had by the insurgents. Only in choice of weapons are the progressives limited. They must be content with organization and publicity. The reactionaries are confined to cash and duplicity. Their supply of both is ample.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League made its light mainly upon the emancipation of the Republican party from corporate control. While that was, and is, the paramount issue, the movement probably lost something from the narrowness of its expressed sympathies. It should be broadened this time to include, not only the making of California a free and independent commonwealth, but the revision and reform of our criminal procedures, non-partisan election of judicial candidates, state-wide advisory vote on the selection of United States senators, the non-alienation of power privileges in perpetuity and the conferring upon the general government the power to levy an income tax.

It would be well, however, to stop about there. There are other issues of public importance such as grow out of the liquor traffic, woman suffrage, revenue and taxation, ceding to the states control over rights of way and reservoir sites on government land. These would divide the progressive forces themselves and whatever divides them from each other, and not all of them from the common enemy—the incorporated plutocracies—should be shunned.

There is some guessing going on as to which would be most likely to make Francis J. Heney governor of California, his defeat for district attorney of San Francisco or his election. His election would give him the prestige of having carried the city against all the forces that civic iniquity can mobilize. His defeat would justify a prompt appeal to the state to vindicate its own fair name by repudiating the action of its chief city. If elected he will be too busy with the prosecutions to make the race for governor. If defeated he will be just the man to head a state movement for reforming the criminal procedure. District attorney or governor, which? It looks as though choice would have to be made betwixt the two.

William Bradbury has donned prison garb and taken up his quarters at San Quentin prison, convicted of little else than downright meanness. Had he been a whole-hearted, generous man he might, with his money, have defied the prosecutor for perjury, grafted right and left and held his head high in the society of San Francisco's four hundred. Other such men are doing it, but, being merely rebellious, obstreperous and mean, he was rendered helpless in his old age, as many another has been. The worst that The California Weekly wishes him is that, during his seclusion, he may come to himself, soften down and come out from thence humbled and forgiven.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

A larger employer of high grade labor stated that he regarded half the desirability of an employee as dependent upon his ability to get on well with other men. Being the coast representative of a very large enterprise, those who enter the service of his company are called upon to meet and influence, not only a large clientele, but a great number of fellow servants of the same corporation, and, however well a candidate for a position in that company may be equipped for the performance of one particular service, his ability to get on with other men must prove of equal value or no place can be found for him.

What this employer has figured out, after painstaking observation and investigation, in terms of percentages of value, other employees have arrived at in a general and perhaps inchoate way. Personality counts for half the value of a man, or, to state it differently, technical fitness for an occupation is doubled in value by adding to it address, tact, atmosphere, the ability to get on with other men.

These things are not to be taught in schools or colleges, and yet, in many cases, must be acquired in schools and colleges if acquired at all. Without them a man is only half a man with half an earning capacity, half as many places open to him, half as large a share of prosperity as another, better equipped in that particular, may enjoy, also half as great a satisfaction in living, for, in the final analysis, society roughly estimates us, and we undiscerningly estimate ourselves at as real a value as this exceptionally careful employer has painstakingly figured out.

And what is this thing we call personality, the thing that opens all doors and hearts to some and closes them all with a slam to others? Must one be born with it in order to possess it? Is it a question of heredity, or, as my father was or a question of cultivation, self control, deliberate training for a vocation?

Second perhaps to our lack of a merchant marine is our national lack of gentility, good breeding, that fine courtesy that enables men to get on with other men. One who has been much abroad, and in many countries, with which we should be doing business, brings home the unwholesome truth that the people of those countries say of us: "We do not like to deal with your people. We are not comfortable in their presence. They insult us. They don't know how to behave toward us." And so our foreign commerce languishes, especially in Latin and Oriental countries, where the inartistic, the rude and the unbecoming give pain and arouse antipathy.

Again, what is the quality of this courtesy, this personal atmosphere that attracts or repels, that makes our value or halves it? For one thing it is so subtle, and of such quality, that one incapable of being counterfeited. No assumed suavity or put-on urbanity will serve as a substitute. It must be genuine.

It comes of an honest heart, of the spirit of kindness, of a modesty in the estimation of self, and it does not come of seeking the balance let the other see what it may. Born of sincerity, kindness and modesty, it needs to be reared in an atmosphere where sincerity, kindness and modesty may flourish. It needs an environment of good breeding, and where, if not at college and university, is good breeding to be looked for? There are those who seem to feel that to do a kind act in a kindly way betrays a taint of effeminacy, so they do it with a brusque lack of grace that robs the deed of half its charm. One whose habit it is to do even kind things boorishly can not double his earning capacity by doing kind things. We have splendid men in America, but we have not a relatively large proportion of splendid gentlemen. This lack has made, with countless thousands, all the difference between a large earning capacity and a small, a well rounded life and a life that was meagre, hungry, half starved

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Development of Rural Routes.

When it is borne in mind that the first rural free delivery routes of the postoffice department were established but thirteen years ago, their development in the meantime seems nothing less than startling, a phenomenal demonstration of the rapidly with which the national government may respond to a popular demand. Five of these routes were established, in West Virginia, in 1896, and within three years their number had been increased to 391, while their cost thus far had been about $450,000. Time considered, this was a fair start, but since then the growth of the institution has been by leaps and bounds which make such a start seem insignificant. Ten more years have elapsed, and now in every state and territory in our country there are such routes, their entire number being 40,919, on which 40,804 carriers are employed. Their total cost thus far has been about $170,000,000. Illinois, with 2,284 routes, has the greatest number, while the number in each of seven states exceeds the 1,841 in New York, our most populous commonwealth, the need of the routes being greater where the population is less condensed.

Price of the Warring Privilege.

There are in the civilized world nine nations which are supposed to be ready to fight "at the drop of the hat," or, if not on that provocation, then whenever the provocation may be deemed sufficient. These are the nations currently described as "the great military powers of the world." They consist of Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Austria, Hungary, Italy, the United States and Japan, and that they pay high for their warring distinction let statistics attest. Here are the figures: Great Britain annually pays for her army and navy, in round numbers, $315,000,000; Russia, $260,000,000; Germany, $255,000,000; the United States, $240,000,000; France, $205,000,000; Italy, $80,000,000; Austria, $75,000,000; Japan, $48,000,000; and Hungary, $40,000,000. This is a neat little total of $1,518,000,000, or let us say, sufficient to measure the distance from starvation to humble plenty for 5,060,000 people. Certainly the privilege comes high, and it might not come amiss to beat the sword into that plowshare. These taxes for the maintenance of army and navy amount to almost 40 per cent of the taxes paid by the peoples involved. That is to say, of every five dollars thus paid two are devoted to keeping the chip on our shoulder. It is an expensive chip. Great Britain is the nation that buys the most of this luxury.

The "Canned Voice" and Consumption.

The "canned voice" which is frequently mentioned as the gramophone, graphophone, or phonograph, has been set to a use which far exceeds, in value, its ordinary function of exuding tinnny music. This is no less than instructing the people concerning tuberculosis, its cause and prevention, and already it has done much service in this line. The New York state charitable association has been using the instrument for this purpose, and it reports that during the year terminating August 10, 1909, it by this means addressed 2,433,135 people on the subject of their health and the best method of maintaining it. Of course these seemingly accurate figures cannot be absolutely so, but they probably approximate accuracy. For instance, it is claimed that about 754,000 persons passing through the museum of natural history in New York paused last year to hear the preserved voice say, "Don't live or work in rooms where there is no fresh air; such rooms are dangerous. Always keep your windows open." The admonitions are varied, but their general trend is in the direction of increasing public knowledge of the laws of health, and every means is adopted to reach the people with these health guides in gramophone form.

Directors Who Do Not Direct.

The controller of the currency not long ago sent letters to all directors of national banks, in which he endeavored to ascertain the manner in which they discharged their duties. The answers to his letter were not encouraging, indicating, as they did, that a large proportion of the directors do not discharge their duties at all. Their name is a misnomer, for they direct nothing. But one-fourth of these directors knew the real conditions in the banks they were supposed to direct. The next number of the currency number admitted that they knew absolutely nothing of the situation in their banks. Only 31 per cent of them approved loans, while the remaining 69 per cent left that important matter entirely to the discretion of the officers of their banks. Six per cent made of objection to overdrafts, and 80 per cent knew nothing of the genuineness of signatures on discounted notes. In short, the great majority left the undirected management of the banks to their officials, with a beautiful, if sometimes misdirected, faith that all would be well. It should be remembered that this is a showing made by the directors themselves, and so, if at all prejudiced, that prejudice cannot be against them.

The Shipping Commerce of the World.

To return to peaceful ways, if Great Britain pays the most for the chip on the shoulder, she also has most to do with the tranquil paths of commerce. The latest Lloyd's Register recently issued, reports the entire number of steamships and sailing ships now on the world's waters as 30,540, and of these 11,565, or more than three-eighths, belong to British owners. This is a fine showing for our cousin of the right little tight littleisle, but further investigation of the facts demonstrates that finer (for them) still is to come. The total tonnage of the world's shipping is 41,449,767 tons, and of this 18,826,442 tons, or more than 45 per cent, are owned by Britons. Great Britain owns three and one-half times as much tonnage as the United States, and four and one-half times as much as Germany, while Norway, which comes next, has scarcely more than a tenth as much as the Britons. There are at the present time 101 steamships capable of exceeding twenty knots per hour, and of these sixty-one are British owned. On the whole, the Register shows a pleasing condition of affairs—for Britons, but it should be less satisfactory to the people of other nations.

The American Exposition in Berlin.

In a magnificent palace much larger than Madison Square Garden, New York, in the heart of Berlin, an American exposition will be held during the months of May, June and July next year. The idea which gave birth to the exposition was that of presenting a high-class exhibition of American industries, inventions, arts, etc., where Europeans best could see them, and already it is apparent that this idea will be carried to an effective issue. Prince Henry of Prussia will be the honorary president of the exposition, and prominent German business men will co-operate with him, while Thomas A. Edison and J. Pierpont Morgan will be members of the American honorary committee. Of course, these notables may serve rather as figureheads than as active participants, but the fact that they have permitted their names to be used indicates that they foresee success for the enterprise. Steamship companies will give freight rates reduced by 30 per cent, and all things indicate that Europeans are to see American wares under most favorable circumstances.

The Latest Man-Killing Device.

Will man never cease to dream of the day when he can satisfy the brute within himself by slaughtering his fellow-beings in battalions? Whether he will or not, it is certain that he still is exercising the cunning of his intellect in devising new and more wholesale means of killing. The latest of these devices is that of a German officer who has invented a torpedo which, he claims, will, when dropped from an airship, go far toward annihilating an army. It explodes with a tremendous concussion and at the same time emits an immense sheet of flame. Experts, who are inclined to look upon the invention with favor, now are attempting to decide whether the explosion would be likely to terminate the career of the airship, a consummation which to some might not appear wholly objectionable. Perhaps, after all, the final, great day of universal peace will be hastened by these manslaughtering devices, little man becoming so dangerous to himself as to treat himself with utmost consideration.

Newest Ships Smaller.

Perhaps the limit has been already reached. The next new Cunarders for the north Atlantic service will be smaller and slower than the Lusitania and Mauretania.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

THE PLAYERLESS PLAYERS."

When Edwin Booth founded the Players' Club in New York he intended to provide a social center for the fraternity of actors, but the wideness of his own range of sympathies caused him to allow a clause in the constitution of the club that has well-nigh defeated its purpose. This clause, relative to the qualification of members, allows the election of members of any profession. The result is that the beautiful clubhouse, in quiet, aristocratic old Gramercy Park, receives within its doors as many lawyers, doctors and writers as actors.

The theatrical atmosphere is preserved in many ways, to be sure. The rooms in which Booth lived his last years and died are as he left them, kept as he last arranged them, as a memorial of him. On the walls throughout the clubhouse are playbills of famous casts, portraits of famous actors in their great roles, and "properties" used by them, swords and the like. And, of course, many actors still belong to the club.

But the majority of actors have felt irked at the intrusion of such non-"professional" people. They enjoy herding with their own people, and they have founded new clubs to satisfy this desire. The Lambs, though not wholly limited to actors, is much more representative of the profession than the Players'. It has grown in recent years to a very large membership, and its annual "gamboles" net sums of money well up in the five figures. This money is spent on the clubhouse and for the benefit of disabled or superannuated actors.

The Greenroom Club is even more representative of the profession. Its membership is limited exclusively to actors, managers, and playwrights. Outsiders who have the courtesy of a card to the club extended to them see here the genus actor in propria persona at his pleasures, especially on Saturday nights after the theaters are closed, when everybody is at the beck and call of the master of ceremonies for the evening and must, when called upon, execute an impromptu "turn" for the amusement of his fellow members.

At these gatherings are exhibited the qualities of actors that are the most admirable—their unaffected comradeship and unconventional freedom in the social intercourse. It is possible that the chill atmosphere of the more austere and reserved professions is the principal thing that has driven the actors from the Players'. The Players', as a theatrical club, is rapidly becoming a tradition, a tradition that will be forever hallowed by the memory of Booth and Jefferson. It seems likely soon to lose all vital connection with the contemporaneous history of the stage.

STORIES OF TENNYSON

The London correspondent of the New York Sun has compiled the following list of about Tennyson that have come to light in connection with the recent celebration of the centenary of his birth:

Once a young woman who had been just introduced to Tennyson at Freshwater was left alone with him on the seashore. She had immense awe of the poet and therefore did not interrupt him as he sat speechless, gazing straight ahead of him at the sea.

The long silence was broken at last in an astonishing manner by Tennyson. He was going to open his lips and utter some lovely thought, the young woman imagined. Instead he opened them and in gruff and gloomy tones gave voice to this remark:

"You creak."

Tennyson added as explanation:

"You creak. Your stays creak."

This so startled the young woman that she ran away and went indoors, where a large company, she found, was gathered together over tea. In a little time Tennyson appeared, a vague expression on his countenance, as though something had gone wrong with him. The girl, now accounting him possibly mad and certainly impotent, tried hard to hide away from him.

In vain His eagle eye found her out. He threatened his way among the other guests toward her, took her hand and said in resonant tones before the whole company of them: "My dear, I beg your pardon. I find it was my braces."

The feelings of the young woman and the astonishment of the guests may be left to the imagination.

Once Irving was discussing a play with the poet and ordered a bottle of port to help in the discussion. Tennyson drank glass after glass until the bottle was finished and then turned reproachfully to the actor and said: "Irving, how fond you are of port!"

At Aldworth an American woman once penetrated into his garden and was gratified to observe the poet walking up and down, apparently in the agonies of composition. Suddenly he stopped and gazed with a vacant expression at a bed of lettuce. His lips began to move and his still hidden admirer whipped out her note book to record the pearls of wisdom from the master's mouth. What he actually said after prolonged cogitation was:

"Damn those rabbits!"

PERSIAN POETRY.

Too few people realize the beauty and richness of Persian poetry, wrapt in its veil of mysticism. Of all this poetry, that of Jelaluddin is as a child. He was a seer, a builder of religious ecstasies. When five years old his parents were made fugitives and his life was sorrowful and melancholy. The following exquisite apologue is from the pen of this poet mystic:

"There came one and knocked at the door of the Beloved. And a voice answered and said, 'Who is there?' The lover replied, 'It is I.' 'Go hence,' returned the voice, 'there is no room within for thee and me.' Then came the lover a second time and knocked, and again the voice demanded, 'Who is there?' He answered, 'It is thou.' 'Enter,' said the voice, 'for I am within.'"

GHAZELS.

From the Diwan of Hafiz.

From the storm, wind of chance it is not possible to see that on this lawn grew once the wild white rose or the red.

The hot breath of the simoon which hath passed across this garden, makes it marvelous that the color of the rose should remain, or the scent of the jessamine.

Better than eternal life is union with the Beloved; grant me that, O Lord, for that is best.

Whether I be virtuous or sinful, go thou thine own way, for in the end every one will reap according to the seed he has sown.

If my heart draws me to the musk-scented grape, so be it! From austerity and hypocrisy cometh no sweet smell.

The world is a bride of surpassing beauty—but remember that this maiden is never bound to anyone.

In the morning I strayed to the garden, drawn by the sweet scent of the roses, that, like the desolate nightingale, it might find balm for my brain.

MONTHLY NOVELS AGAIN?

Book buyers and collectors of first editions will be interested in a revival of the practice of issuing novels in monthly parts. Fifty or sixty years ago the practice was common enough, most of the popular works of the early Victorian novelists were so published and the appearance of installments of Thackeray in yellow, that of Dickens in green was eagerly looked forward to by hundreds of thousands of readers.

If a story really arouses public interest this method of publication is very profitable to the author and the publisher, but it is by no means certain that the production of any living writer will rival the popularity of any of the classic novelists.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELVE.

Mark Twain Before "Joan of Arc."

Before Mark Twain listened to the siren song of "serious literature," almost anything he wrote would go on our little shelf of books that really are ours by right of absolute absorption. The luckless day when he abandoned his inimitable circus tent for the "legit" in literature marks the day we parted ways with the Mark Twain of our joyful boyhood and sadly recognized the fact that the author of "Huck Finn" was dead. William Dean Howells may think "Joan of Arc" is high art, but give us "Tom Sawyer," "Roughing It," and "Innocents Abroad." Here is the American genius speaking, new and clear and distinct, seeing with the young eyes of a young nation and writing in the broad humor of a people who had learned to laugh without malice.

In these precious earlier books the writer discerns a quality of true greatness; universality. In his boyhood, no incident occurred nor any subject was broached but he could quote something from Mark Twain that was to the point as criticism or parallel. Shakespeare has this quality, on a higher plane of literary expression, to be sure. I doubt if he has it in greater degree than Mark Twain, and surely Shakespeare's expression and "modern instances" are nowhere near so close to the homely life of mankind as Mark Twain's.

Of course, two of his characters are immortal. Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn are flesh and blood with the everlasting heart of childhood. Age will not dim nor custom stale their intimate appeal. To boys, they are the most alluring pictures of that most alluring word in boyhood's vocabulary—"Adventure." To men, they are the joyful re-creation of "remember the time you and I did—" everything that the lapse of years has gilded with the priceless gold of youth.

Dear old Mark Twain! Let us be patient with his recent stuff—he's near to Shakespeare's seventh age, remember—let us forget his recent whims and oddities, and, in some precious hour, drag to the light the well-thumbed, old, familiar volumes, steal a glamorous ride back to the mirthful, carefree, adventurous days, and praise God that He made Mark Twain to make us laugh.

A WAGNER THEATRE BILL

A theatre bill has recently been discovered which was issued by Richard Wagner in the days when he was the leader of the orchestra at the Riga Theatre, and in that capacity had a right to a benefit performance. It reads:

SUNDAY, DEC. 11, 1837.

will be performed for the benefit of the undersigned for the first time.

"NORMA."

grand romantic opera in two acts, by Bellini.

The undersigned believes that he cannot prove his veneration for the dilettante public of this town better than by choosing this opera for the benefit accorded him in recognition of his efforts to encourage and improve the youthful musical talents belonging to the theatre of this town. Among all Bellini's creations "Norma" is the one that unites with the richest harvest of melodies the most intimate spirit and profoundest truth. Even the stoutest adversaries of the neo-Italian school have recognized with justice that this composition, which speaks to the heart, gives proof of mental effort and sacrifices nothing to modern platitudes.

As everything has been done as regards rehearsals and the mounting of this work I can venture humbly to invite the public which loves the theatre, and I do so with the joyful hope that my efforts to fulfil as far as it is possible the duties of my position will find kindly and sympathetic approbation.

HOW SHALL WE RECEIVE MR. TAFT?

THE EXAMPLE OF THE RECEPTION TENDERED GENERAL GRANT.

Appropos of the imminence of the visit of President Taft, former receptions to Presidents of the country are being discussed and incidents thereof are being recalled. It has been claimed that where there exists a warm feeling of welcome in the hearts of the people, that feeling usually manages to find expression somewhere, and where it is genuine and strong, the personality of the recipient in a great degree inspires or dominates much that is said and done.

Not to recall the incident of President Harrison's visit, which it is said Oakland still remembers, the two best remembered receptions are the one accorded to Ex-President Grant on his return from his triumphal tour around the world and that accorded to President Roosevelt toward the end of his first term. Both men had in an extraordinary degree won the admiration of the people, for widely different reasons, and toward both men personally was extended the warmest expression of welcome.

We give below the address of welcome to General Grant delivered by Henry Edgerton, which was reprinted in the "Sacramento Bee" of May 16, 1903. Next week we shall give the address of welcome to President Roosevelt, delivered by John F. Davis, taken from the San Francisco morning dailies of May 15, 1903. The first was upon the occasion of the reception at the state capitol in November, 1879, as General Grant was proceeding on his way eastward, and was one of the most splendid receptions ever given to anyone in California.

Those who remember the eloquent Edgerton at his best will seem to hear his resonant voice rounding out his splendid periods as of yore. The younger generation, reading the address, will be easily persuaded that in those days there were orators in California. Grant and Edgerton are at rest, but Roosevelt and Davis, not unworthy successors, still live; but of them in our next. [Editor California Weekly.]

HENRY EDGERTON'S WELCOME TO GENERAL GRANT.

General Grant: The citizens of Sacramento, in union with the representatives of numerous other communities, near and remote, in behalf of the people of California, cordially welcome you with your family and suite to the freedom and hospitalities of their Capital City.

They desire thereby to interpret and emphasize their profound respect for you, and their gratitude for illustrious service rendered to our common country. The muse of history will in due time fix the character and extent of those services in permanent and philosophic view. Poetry and art will celebrate them in animating and enduring form. May the day be far distant when the voices that praise may indulge in the fullness of utterance that belongs to the sanctity of the grave.

It is a generous pride that intertwines a consciousness of liberty with veneration for its defenders. It is therefore at all times decorous and graceful in the generation that has witnessed your achievements to assert their splendor and beneficence, and by public acclamation and ovation to attest and solemnize the legitimate homage of its admiration and love.

We congratulate you upon the felicity of life spared to witness the coincidence of your patriotic deeds with the grandeur and prosperity of your country. We possess a territorial domain embracing many zones of climate and flora, and extending in almost continuous cohesion to meridian lines that include a third of your journey around the earth. We exhibit the civilization bearing a genuine American stamp, which has manifested itself as strong enough to give admission to the diverse characteristics of many races, and to transmute all it admits into original forms of civic and social life that clearly reflect its own nature. We live in the shelter of a Government in which the beauty and harmony of free institutions are embodied in visible stability and order, in societies that move regularly and tranquilly to the music of the Union, in a Republic where the unchecked impulses and powers inherent in an ingenious and ingenious people essay and solve as they rise all social and political problems.

In these glowing realities, in the fixed station and destiny of a noble and puissant Nation, in the amplitude and perfection of its liberties, in the multiplicitous variety and indomitable vigor of its popular life, and in the inspiring story of its perils, its struggles and its triumphs, the discriminating judgment of the age has discerned the fair and imperishable monuments of your own fame.

We contemplate for a moment a military career which, presaging its splendor at Molino del Rey and Chapultepec, and made immortal by the memories of Donelson, of Shiloh, of Vicksburg, of Chattanooga and Richmond, was consummated and glorified by a magnanimity that lifted up victory to a sublime moral height, and led a heroic people without bitterness of recollection across the threshold of a new and better era. We challenge a military renown that has cost less to justice, less to humanity, less to the human conscience.

We advert to a civic career in the great office of President, attempted without previous civic experience and running to the full limit yet allowed to the most illustrious of your predecessors, and "In that fierce light that beats upon a throne, And blackens every blot," we see clearly mirrored the lofty patriotism, the calm, immovable character, the incorrupt, acute mind, the "chastity of honor."

We retrace your tour around the globe, marked at every point of the circumference by unexampled demonstrations of respect, and everywhere, in the pomp and pageantry of the courts of Europe and in the rigid forms of the ancient theocracies and empires of Asia, we behold the unostentatious Republican citizen symbolizing the dignity and the honor of his country and drawing it more closely into the great life of the world.

As Americans, we dwell upon these resplendent deeds with feelings that surpass enthusiasm. We group them upon the background of a life that reveals no unseemly pursuit of office, no trust violated, no confidence betrayed, no friendship broken, and trustfully lay them at the feet of history.

As Californians, we remember that our state, its unrivaled domain, its polity, its prosperity and happiness attained, and its fair prospect of future greatness and power are the fruits of a conquest in which you bore a conspicuous and brilliant part. California, always loyal to the ancient faith and traditions of the Nation, her blood and treasure in perpetual pledge to its security and honor, her great heart ever bowed in tender reverence of the memories of its statesmen and warriors dead, always delights to exalt its heroes living.

Today her sons and daughters crown you with a garland woven of their gratitude, their confidence and their love. There is not a Californian whose patriotism is unmixed with a grateful affection for you. There is not in California a community or party, a sect or a class which, in the hour of its peril, would not confide the glory of the Republic to the guardianship of Grant. Her hospitality to you is as boundless and sincere as the sentiment and feelings from which it springs. Every miner's cabin, every peasant's cot, and every rich man's palace in her borders, with "doors on golden hinges turning," is thrown wide open to you. Come in and abide with us.

OAKLAND, CAL.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Never Mind the Needle's Eye.

His pa had made some millions while he lingered here below,
Then received an urgent summons to the court that's held up stairs,
And his funeral was a triumph of most fashionable woe,
And the parson gave him honor in the neat-est of his prayers.
Yet a camel, don't you know,
Through a needle's eye may go—
But I think you know the balance, and perhaps it is too thin,
For the parson in his prayer
Shoved him up the golden stair
To the very gate of heaven, and I guess he showed him in;
And who am I, and who are you, to balance up his fate
And dwell upon a passage that is likely out of date?

The mourning son was neatly dressed—outside, of course, I mean—
Though the human vase he shattered, still the scents of dollars cling;
And so the public came at once upon the heir to beam,
And sadly sighed, "The king is dead," and chirruped, "Live the king!"
For although a camel's show
Through a needle's eye to go
May be classed as rather narrow, still we need not really mind,
For we find on contemplation
That it doesn't jar the nation,
Since the camel, being thoughtful, always leaves his load behind,
And well you know, and so do I—'tis true, as all allow—
That not to camel or its heir, but to its "stuff" we bow.

Concerning Coleoptera.

The Smithsonian Institution, which its founder established "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," has, by way of such increase and diffusion, published "A Monographic Revision of the Coleoptera Belonging to the Tenebrionide Tribe Eleodini Inhabiting the United States, Lower California and Adjacent Islands." For a long time now I have thirsted for knowledge relating to the coleoptera belonging to the tenebrionide tribe eleodini. I might have got along without the tenebrionide, but my yearning soul would not be content without at least a fair allowance of eleodini; so I have been coying with the book. Throughout it reads very much the same, except that it is more same in some places than it is in others. One forceful and eloquent passage particularly impressed me, and so I republish it for the benefit of any other person who hitherto has hesitated whether to order his coleoptera with or without trimmings:

"The body is oblong to ovate, rarely oval; apertures; head prominent, slightly narrowed behind; the eyes; epistoma covering the base of the mandibles at the sides; labrum prominent; mentum small, inserted upon a gular peduncle; maxillae slender, slightly curved; maxillary palpi with the last joint securiform, not very large; eyes transverse, reniform, tolerably finely granulated; antennae eleven jointed; elytra embracing widely the planks of the abdomen, epipleurae narrow to moderately wide, middle coxae with large trochantin, side pieces attaining the coxal cavities; metasternum very short, episterna narrow, epimera quite distinct; hind coxae widely separated; lateral process of abdomen rectangular; third and fourth ventral segments not prolonged behind at the margin."

I should have read the foregoing more than once if it had not been for the headache, but, vaguely and dazedly, I already feel that my knowledge has been more diffused than increased. Yet I do not deny that the announcement is true, for I guess it is, or else it isn't, and, anyway, you can't prove it by me. Who am I, that I should doubt that the critters are apterous, and that the epistoma get mixed with the mandibles, and that the labrum has a front seat on the gular peduncle, and that the palpi are securiform in spots, and that the elytra and epipleurae are all right, and ain't it awful, Mabel? And who am I to negative assertions that may be true, and then, again, may be merely the result of the English language having been struck by lightning? No, I cannot do it. I dislike to tender advice to the Smithsonian Institute, of course, but if I were in its place I should diffuse my "diffusion of knowledge" a little less diffusive. Such a course would be far more unlikely to result in wrecked intellects.

The Opinions of Rufus.

If you don't b'lieve that our judgments depends a lot on circumstances try to remember if you've ever heered a woman that was takin' anti-fat say that she was an admirer of directorate gowns.

The doctors are some excited over a disease called pellagra they've discovered in this country, but I don't b'lieve they'll find it 'll 'mount to much—it can't be cut out.

I've noticed that it's gen'ly the smallest idee that needs the biggest cuss-words to carry it through.

We may be grateful, brethern, that paresis ain't a common disease, but when we look 'bout us we can't c'nside it strange.

Ef ten men was wuth $10,000 among 'em, an' one of them was wuth $9,500, you could figger out that some of 'em would be middlin' poor, couldn't you? But I s'pose you can't see any connection 'twen multi-millionaires an' pauperism, can you? It's a queer world, my bloved.

I don't like to say a word 'gainst fashion, fer I realize that if it wan't fer it lots of my sisters would lose interest in life, but when I see thirtyn ounces of brains topped off with thirty-nine ounces of hair I can't help wond'rin ef 't wouldn't be better of the situation was reversed.

We yell, "Don't knock," but this here bouquet's fer one kind of knocker—the man that 'knocks' evil. He's like a carpenter that knocks the nails he drives; the knockin' is necessary to good buildin'.

I've heered men brag 'bout their ancestors when it seemed to me that an apology to 'em would be more fittin' under the circumstances.

Thoughtful Man on the Illogical Public.

"The public is illogical, not to say unreasonable," the Thoughtful Man remarked, "and, of course, many of its newspapers must be the same. We deprecate this fact exceedingly, but what can we do about it? Already we have bought all the publications we can afford to keep on our payroll, and as this leaves us with a considerable number still unpurchased, there we are. Naturally we are proud of our consolidated Post and Globe (as it be well shaken before taken), the Oakland Tribune, the Chronicle, the Los Angeles Times and other papers against which we fumigate, but, alas! they are not enough; the public still remains illogical."

"For instance, take that little billet doux which Mr. Calhoun sent out to the papers of the country. I feel that I describe it inadequately when I say that it was a triumph of critical reasoning. In it we proudly demonstrated that Mr. Heney was guilty. We did not say of what he was guilty, for we didn't know, but we showed that he was guilty; anyway, and it followed as the night the day that Mr. Calhoun was innocent. With your clear intellect, you see it immediately, do you not? You must, for not to see it interferes with business."

"Well, how can I make you believe that that triumph of argumentative art reacted? It seems impossible, but it did. The unpurchased publications, East and West, took it up, and insisted that Mr. Heney's guilt or innocence was not at issue, but Mr. Calhoun's was. The shame of it! The dark disgrace! And this at a time when we couldn't afford to buy another paper!"

"Then a man named Wigmore, an unknown person who had done nothing except to make himself the highest living authority on evidence, emerged from his shameful obscurity long enough to insist that Mr. Calhoun's letter had a tendency to demonstrate his guilt. Oh, the black ignominy of it! And if there were any color blacker than black I would mention it, too. Yet such are the shameful creatures that interfere with business! I don't know what we can do now, although the editor of the Tribune suggests that we empty another pot of ink. But ink costs. You ought to see the bills we charge to non-interference with business. Ah me, the public is so illogical! Let's bury our sorrows."

So we stepped down to the corner, and buried them.

These Are Our Brothers.

I have played the game, and I know right well
The price that the player full oft must pay,
I have lived my hours in a self-made hell,
When peace had rewarded a better way.
I have fallen, to rise, and risen, to fall,
Have bartered for shadows the sunlight's glow,
But this I have learned from my stumblings all,
And I thank my God that it e'en is so:
In midst of sinners my brother I know,
Brother in weakness and brother in might;
Had I known the temptation that laid him low,
Haply I, too, were astray in the night.

Lost in the fog and imbedded in mire;
"Thank God," we murmur, "I am not as he!"
Ay, but the muck on our better attire
Proves that his kinsman forever are we;
Kinsmen with pebbles we willingly cast,
Or kinsmen with blessing we fain would bestow;

And some of us sink to his station at last,
And some, looking upward, a better fate know.

Brothers in darkness and brothers in light,
Wayfarers, all, in the earthly maze,
Had we known the temptation that brought him light,
How had we fared, and what were our ways?

There where the tenement litters and spawns
(Price of the millionaire—bow to the name)
Think you that ever the light of the dawns
Shineth all fair for their children of shame?
Yet they are brothers, poor, pitiful ones,
Born to the terror that walketh by night
And to the evil that mocketh God's suns,
Needing man's pity to set them aright.
Brothers by might of humanity's claim;
Souls that the specters of evil pursue—
Had you been born to those purities of shame,
How were it, brother, how were it with you?

"Bob" Burdette.

Rev. Robert J. (better, and most lovingly known to the world as "Bob") Burdette injured his spine by a fall last spring, and it is feared that the injury will be permanent. There are tens and hundreds of thousands throughout the English-speaking world who will trust that this fear is baseless, for, whether or not they have met him, they count him among their friends. Long years ago, when, in the columns of the Burlington Hawkeye, he was adding to life's sunshine, they learned to know and love him. Since then he has delivered his gospel of good-will and brotherly love, and the world has been the better for it. So it is that much grateful sympathy goes out to "Bob" Burdette in his misfortune, and so it is that we will venture to hope that his invalidism will not be enduring.

Electric Railroad Company, which operates the street railways of Stockton. William F. Herrin is vice-president of this company.

The Southern Pacific owns the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company, which connects San Francisco by ferry and trolley with Sausalito, Larkspur, Mill Valley, Ross, San Anselmo, Fairfax and San Rafael.

The power for all these roads is purchased from the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, which was described in the second article of this series.

The Pacific Light and Power Company has located, and is holding for future development, about twenty new power sites in the Sierra Nevada. These sites are capable of developing about 1,000,000 horsepower.

The San Joaquin Light and Power Company controls several additional undeveloped power sites.

The Southern Pacific Company, through its various subsidiary power and trolley companies, has acquired power sites, developed and undeveloped, sufficient to provide power for an electric railroad from Los Angeles to San Jose and San Francisco by way of the San Joaquin valley. The engineering problems, such as the necessary construction and equipment of the power plants and the extension of transmission lines to feed such a road, have all been threshed out. The route of such a road has been surveyed. It is impossible to venture an opinion when the road will be made complete, but there is no doubt that it is a part of the plans of the Southern Pacific. The process of completing it will be by connecting existing lines now under the company's control. The present part of the policy is to complete the local systems first, as at Fresno, so as to provide ample radiating freight-feeding local lines before completing the trunk-line connections.

As this article is limited to Southern and South Central California, no account is taken of other Southern Pacific power developments, such as are contemplated for the electrification of the Sacramento division, or such power sites as are being held in Siskiyou county by doing just enough development work on them to hold the appropriation rights to the water.

PERSONALIA

David Warfield's new leading woman in "The Music Master" is Miss Janet Dunbar, who has been on the stage only one year. In private life she is Miss Nettie Gallagher, of Kansas City.

Napoleon will appear as a baritone in a new opera based upon "Mme. Sans-Gené," Sardou's comedy. Giordano is now finishing the work. Verdi pointed out to him the possibilities of the Sardou drama.

Mme. Sembrich has the distinction of being the first honorary member ever elected to the metropolitan opera company of New York. This honor was conferred on her at the time of her farewell appearance in February.

John Bunyan has a rival in Henry Weidenbach, an artist serving four years in the Ohio penitentiary for grand larceny, who has been commissioned to redecorate some of the valuable paintings in the Ohio State House.

Paderewski has lately received the cross of the Legion of Honor, being the only musician besides Liszt and Rubenstein to receive it without first passing through the grade of chevalier. Paderewski, by the way, is now nearly fifty years old.

Prof. E. C. Griffin, recently engaged to head the chemistry department of the Kansas State Agricultural College, is spending his vacation at Brighton, Col., as a hoad carrier. He is not trying to solve the labor problem, but likes hard work. He is earning $1.50 a day there.

Gen. Daniel H. Rucker, U. S. A., retired, was recently notified by a life insurance company that under its rules he was dead, and that they were ready to pay his policy in full. The General, who is ninety-six, accepted payment, though he denied the assertion that he was dead.

Edwin Markham, author of "The Man With the Hoe," is coming home. Of California he says: "Once the charm of that golden climate gets into a man's veins, he may roam all over the earth, but he will always long to return to the sunset land. My best inspirations came to me there."

Frank N. Meyer, one of the "plant explorers" of the department of agriculture, will soon leave on a long tour through Turkey and China in search of new varieties of grapes said to grow in those regions. Mr. Meyer has brought back many valuable new plants and fruits from previous expeditions.

General Allen, chief of the signal corps of the United States army, is quoted as saying that a wild tale sent to the press from London about a wonderful Yankee inventor at Fort Omaha, who has provided our army with an electrical machine capable of defeating any enemy, is "completely without foundation."

During his recent visit in London Harrison Grey Fiske discussed with Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree the idea of Mrs. Fiske's appearing in London, with the result that tentative arrangements were made whereby Mrs. Fiske will play a joint starring engagement at His Majesty's Theater with Sir Herbert and an English company. One of the foremost dramatists in England has been commissioned to write a play that will provide Mrs. Fiske and Tree with an appropriate medium.

Have you heard the Victrola?

The Victor without a horn! It looks like a music cabinet—it plays and sings like the artists themselves without rasp or mechanical noise. Now being installed in all the best homes in America, in the choicest suites of the finest hotels, aboard the ocean greyhounds and in the palaces of nobility throughout all Europe.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Pretended Preservation Of Party Regularity

Political custom often lacks a great deal of being logical. Party regularity is an asset to a politician and most politicians are afraid of stepping over party lines even to save their party from disgrace. It is possible that George C. Pardee may be the only person in California who openly haunted a convention and still had a political career left open to him. It occurred in an Oakland city election a number of years ago. The Espee gang had made the Republican city convention its own to the promised injury of the city, whereupon Pardee bolted the convention, defied it to its teeth, headed a non-partisan movement and swept the city in the interests of decent government. What saved him was that he won out, for there is nothing that succeeds like success. When, afterward, the machine attempted to brand him as a bolter, Republicans of Oakland remembered that they bolted, too, and he wasn't hurt there or anywhere. Any strong man may bolt a bad ticket and not be hurt if he will only get out and whip the bad ticket before the people. The weak man with political aspirations will have to preserve an appearance of party regularity or be lost, although the appearance may be the shallowest that ever was. The Independent Republican League leaders in San Francisco no doubt feel that they must make a bluff at standing for the Crocker ticket because it carries the Republican banner, but they may not only vote independently at the polls, but pass the word down the line to do likewise and not suffer serious harm.

Give to the Voter A Free Man's Chance

It appears to extenuate little that William Crocker was nominated in opposition to a majority of the voting Republicans of San Francisco. The fact that he owes his nomination to renegades temporarily absent from the Rainey Democrat and Union Labor reservations lent for the occasion is held to count for nothing. Party regularity still demands a show on the part of Republicans of swallowing Crocker as the Republican nominee, no matter how he got his nomination. Anywhere outside of politics fraud vitiates all contracts and releases from all obligations, and in politics "everything goes" and a nomination binds no matter how that nomination was obtained. Title by theft, purchase, corporation domination, ballot box stuffing, or what not, is held as good as by the free suffrages of a regular party constituency. Fortunately, the party voter is bound by no such obligation as holds the petty politician to regularity. He may cure the rank product of a dishonest primary without being called to account by any political potentate who walks. In his little voting booth he fears only God and an accusing conscience. This should give his friends of good government in San Francisco courage to put before the people a good government ticket. Without such a ticket the conscience of the city can not find expression. With it the way is wide open for a splendid victory at the polls unless, indeed, the city is altogether steeped in sin and lost to shame.

Los Angeles Points The Better Way

Los Angeles, like San Francisco, is facing the danger and opportunity of electing a new city government through new methods. The state primary law, which controls in San Francisco, does not control in Los Angeles, because that city possesses a special primary enactment embodied in its charter, and it takes precedence of the general law. Under this special statute the voters of the southern city will, in a short time, go to the polls to nominate candidates, some of whom will be elected at the regular municipal election to be held in December. The greatest practical difference between the nominating primary as we had it in San Francisco and as it will be worked in Los Angeles will be in the ballots, for in the latter city no party names or other political designations will be permitted; John Smith, candidate for mayor, will appear as plain John Smith—neither Republican nor Democrat, nor Socialist. The names of all candidates for a given office will be arranged alphabetically, and it will be necessary to stamp after the name of each candidate for whom the voter desires to vote.

Partisan Politics Probably Out of It

In other words, the Los Angeles scheme is the precise opposite of that with which San Francisco was supplied by the state statute. The latter was designed to perpetuate party control and to organize it on the right basis, by putting the power immediately in the hands of the people; the Los Angeles charter aims at the extirpation of party in city elections. Whether or not the latter object will be accomplished can not be told until after the experiment has been tried, and most new schemes in government have a trick of disappointing both their advocates and their opponents; but it appears intrinsically probable that the voter who finds on his ballot no labels to tell him whether the candidates are Republicans or Democrats will vote with a good deal less regard for party than he would manifest under the old plan of party tickets and labels. The Los Angeles primary will be an elimination contest, for of all the candidates voted for at what time only two for each office can go on the ballot at the December municipal election; these two will, of course, appear without party designations, and both may be Republicans, or both Democrats, or they may be Republican and Democrat, respectively.

Parker Trying to Hoist The Party Banner

And now what are the Los Angeles politicians doing to give effect to the letter and spirit of the no-party primary law? The contest between the political reform law and the unreformed politician is traditional, like that between the gun-maker and the maker of defensive armor; a cannon capable of piercing any existing armor is no sooner built than armor to resist it is invented, and then comes a more powerful gun, and so the contest goes on indefinitely. In line with this traditional policy the Republican City Committee of Los Angeles, which is accused of being dominated by Walter Parker of the Southern Pacific political bureau, has called a Republican city convention of 2,000 delegates, to be elected at informal precinct caucuses. The effect of such a tremendous convocation of delegates is supposed to be to stoke the party enthusiasm to fever heat, and to send the convention's nominees into the primary contest with an irresistible impetus. But whether this bright scheme will work out as its promoters expect is a question involved in considerable doubt, and it is reported that some of the candidates who intend going before the voters at the primary are now debating whether or not they want the indorsement of Mr. Parker's convention—in other words, whether it will help more than it will hurt to be so indorsed.

Pre-Primary Conventions Are Probably Inevitable

The present mayor of Los Angeles, Mr. Alexander, was elected by the reform forces at a special election brought about through the recall provisions of the charter, which forced the resignation of Mayor Harper. It appears to be the wish of his supporters that Mayor Alexander has "made good," and he will be a candidate for re-election. City Auditor Mutchet, who also was put in office by the reformers, is another aspirant and he may go before the Republican convention, although Mayor Alexander will not. Ex-Councilman George A. Smith is an eager candidate, having put up his street-spanning banners some time since. In addition to the mayor and a few other executive officers there are to be chosen nine city councilmen; they are to be elected at large, the ward basis of representation having been abolished. As for the reform Republicans, they, too, are planning to indorse certain candidates in advance of the primary, though they will not hold a formal convention, and presumably will not think of going into Walter Parker's convention. It seems to be a fact that by no kind of direct primary law is the necessity for organization obviated, though it is to be hoped that organization will never again be so compelling or so absolute as it was under the old convention method of nominating. Pre-primary conventions, caucuses or mass meetings for naming tickets are probably inevitable under any and all direct primary laws, but in city elections, they need not, and should not be, on party lines or engineered by party bosses.

Theodore Bell Comes to Town

The fact that Theodore Bell has moved to San Francisco, this time with lures and penates, signifies more than a little. He is to be reckoned with hereafter. His party needs him. His regeneration is not unlikely to be largely in his hands. He, more than any other, may set the pace for it. He is progressive, sincere, capable and buoyed with a boundless hope for freer conditions and better things than we have known. He is not of that wing of the Democracy that reveres day before yesterday and mortally dreads day after tomorrow. He has good sense and an enthusiasm that does not grow weary because it finds hard sledding. Theodore Bell has come to town, which is good for the town.

Another One Out For Secretary of State

The bunch of "organization" candidates for Secretary of State does not appear to be complete as yet. To Stafford, Hilborn, Jordan and Price, a detectable set of Herringized odd-jobs men, has lately been added one H. S. Morrow, of San Diego, employed in the office of Surveyor General Kingsbury. His sponsor is Col. D. C. Collier, what a handicap for a young man with aspirations! For, be it remembered, this San Diego Colonel Collier, at the last Republican convention that ever was, made his round form wonderfully conspicuous in facilitating the efforts of George Knight to run the convention in the Herrin interest. Next to the unapproachable Shasta-tongued, galvanized Republican, Tom Dozier, this man Collier was the noisiest purveyor for the "organization" boss at the convention. Good morrow, Mr. Morrow. You are not in it.

A Sizeable Man for the Place

Speaking of candidates for Secretary of State, coming from the capitol building, some minds us that that ample roof does shelter at least one man big enough, broad enough and true enough to make an ideal State Secretary, and it is an office that needs a big, broad, capable, honest man. It ranks in importance next to the office of governor, and the man who is State Treasurer William R. Williams. He is not after the job. He wants to stay where he is, and, as long as he does stay there, the state's money will be safe, but he ought to be promoted. The good of the service demands his promotion, and it is not impossible that the people will demand it of him. The salary is no greater than that of treasurer, while the work, and even the responsibility, is immensely greater. Mr. Williams is thoroughly competent. None of the others spoken of is so except in a clerical sense. The competence of Mr. Williams is adequate, whether from the standpoint of clerical aptitude or broad minded state craft. He is a good man to keep in mind. As for the other men, it is improbable that Mr. Herrin has any objection to their frolicking around the state under the impression that they are candidates for the office of Secretary of State, but they are not. They are not sizeable.

Hobson's Choice The most striking characteristic of the political situation in San Francisco is the "where am I at?" state of mind of the friends of good government. They see no representative of their hopes for better things in any of the three candidates for mayor. The result is that they are likely to follow either of two tendencies: to resign themselves to making the best of a bad situation, which they define as "taking the least of the three evils" (which means, swallowing Crocker if you are a Republican, or swallowing Leland if you are a Democrat); or to hope against hope for a fourth and entirely independent ticket. The public is looking to the Good Government League for the latter solution. The Good Government League is considering such a move, and it may name such a ticket. On the other hand, it may accept the inert view and endorse Leland. Altogether it is a disappointing field that is presented to the voter.

Crocker's High Bid for Independents' Support. Crocker, when interviewed by the informal committee of leaders of the Municipal League, Independent Republican Clubs, unequivocally declared that he would not be influenced by Sullivan and Lynch in the naming of members of the commissions of the city government. He declared with equal directness that he would not interfere in any way with the pressing of the graft prosecutions if the people signified, by the election of Heney, their will to have them continued. By these assurances, and others, Crocker satisfied this committee, and they publicly indorsed him.

Leland's Bid for the Same Support Leland has made almost identically the same assurances to the independent bodies to whom he has applied for support. Presumably—on the same almost identical basis—F. H. McCarthy would give exactly the same assurances. McCarthy's assurances were undoubtedly disbelieved by any sophisticated person. Leland's professions are derided by the independent Republicans who have accepted Crocker. Crocker's professions are derided by the people to whom Leland's seem good enough. I. W. Hellman, Jr., is reported to have said in private conversation last week that it made no difference to him which was elected as between Crocker and McCarthy. An independent Republican leader who has not swallowed Crocker, and probably will not, says he would as soon see the devil mayor as Leland.

Confusion as to When one considers the other All Candidates candidates on the several tickets, equal confusion is met. Not even the sordid Chronicle can stomach the supervisory ticket that is on Crocker's ticket. There are eight names on that list for supervisors—the men named by the Independent Republicans. Of the other ten, a Republican leader said that he could not vote for them if they were pickled in disinfectants. This leader, and most of the other Republicans who know the facts, will vote for eight Republican supervisors and ten Democrats. The sophisticated Democrats will vote for exactly the same men. The danger of the situation is that the uninformed and careless rank and file of the Republican party will interpret the Independents' indorsement of Crocker as an indorsement of the whole ticket, and vote it straight.

Heney's Fight in Good Shape The Heney campaign is in good shape. His independent petition will be complete in a few days. Heney himself will return to San Francisco tomorrow night and will at once address a meeting for the purpose of formally placing himself before the people. The Heney Women's Club has been formed with a large and enthusiastic membership. The Heney League is a rapidly growing organization. Heney's campaign fund will be collected by popular subscription, and contributions for this purpose are coming in encouragingly.

Will Macarthur Try for It? The hopes of those who look for a fourth man to save the day are centered on Walter Macarthur, editor of the Coast Seamen's Journal, independent Democrat and independent union labor man. He has the respect and confidence of the soundest men of all parties in San Francisco. He would make a splendid mayor. And he will make the run, if he can be convinced that a representative part of all the parties really want him to do it and that they will fight for him if he does. At this writing he is not convinced of these things, but there is a hope that the undoubted sentiment that exists in his favor will be crystallized in time to properly assure him of support early enough for him to make an effective campaign.

Equalize the Other Fellow The State Board of Equalization stirred up a hornet's nest in Southern California, whereat the San Francisco newspapers treated their southern brethren very ungenerously. If only those counties that have not sinned against equality of state assessment were to throw stones the atmosphere would be strikingly free from debris. The San Bernardino Sun has a hunch that the effort to raise all the property of the state to a 60 per cent level of valuation owes its inspiration to railroad influence for the equalization of its own larger burden of taxation which it has been minded, in recent years, to pay. The source of inspiration may not be far wrong, though the reason given is not genuine. The assessment of the railroad has small relation to how other property is assessed.

HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER IN CALIFORNIA

III. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA; AND THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC'S RELATION TO CONTROL.

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

Two companies control the electrical business of all California south of Tehachapi. These companies are the Edison Electric Company and the Pacific Light and Power Company. They have not now any rival whose competition cuts any figure at all in the control of the market or in the fixing of prices. These companies have divided the richest market in this section—Los Angeles city and county—about evenly between them. They have divided about evenly the business of supplying current to the great urban and interurban trolley systems in this district.

Both of these companies develop enormous quantities of electric power in hydraulic plants. The Edison Electric Company generates three-fourths of its entire output in this way. The Pacific Light and Power Company develops about half its output by water power. The balance, in both companies, is generated by steam.

These two companies do not compete in their common market in the matter of charges for service. There is a rivalry between them for the control of sources of hydro-electric power in the mountain streams of Southern and South Central California. Until recently no one has shared in this rivalry because of the monopoly of the market by them. Now, however, the Los Angeles Aqueduct, which is a department of the city government of Los Angeles, expects to utilize the fall of the water it is bringing from Owens Lake to generate electric power. Whether this power will ultimately do more than light the streets of Los Angeles, or whether it will be put on the general market in competition with the present companies, remains to be seen.

At this time, and for the purpose of this article, the municipal plant is negligible, for two reasons: It does not yet exist; when it is complete it will be able to supply only the limited amount of power possible to be developed from the limited amount of water from the one source controlled by the city.

The Edison Electric Company.

The Edison Electric Company succeeded the West Side Lighting Company. It absorbed other companies, thus obtaining the control of local markets by acquiring the local medium of production and distribution. In this process it absorbed the Santa Monica Gas and Electric Company, the Santa Barbara Consolidated Electric Company, the Mountain Power Company, the Redlands Electric Light and Power Company, the United Electricity, Gas and Power Company, the Southern California Power Company, the Santa Ana Gas and Electric Company, the Pasadena Electric Light and Power Company, the Whittier Light and Fuel Company, the Pomona and Ontario Light and Fuel Company, the Redlands Gas Company, and the Riverside Light and Fuel Company.

This company operates in Tulare, Kern, Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, San Bernardino, Riverside and Orange counties. It covers the following cities and towns in Southern California: Los Angeles, Pasadena, Riverside, Redlands, Santa Barbara, Santa Ana, Santa Monica, Long Beach, San Pedro, Redondo, Pomona, Colton, Whittier, Monrovia, Claremont, Orange, Inglewood, San Fernando, Fullerton, Sawtelle, and Fuentec.

The largest hydro-electric plant of The Edison Electric is on the Kern river, in the Cassitas mountains, sixteen miles east of Bakersfield. Another plant is on Lytle creek, near Rialto, San Bernardino county. There are also three plants on Mill creek, in the San Bernardino mountains, near Craftonville (southeast of the city of San Bernardino), and two plants on the Santa Ana river. These plants have an aggregate total rated capacity of 41,000 continuous electric horsepower. The remainder—17,000 horsepower—of the product of The Edison Electric is generated by steam.

The transmission of this power illustrates the possibilities of wide usefulness of electricity developed by water power remote from the place where the electricity is needed. The Edison Electric transmits power 118 miles at 66,000 volts, 109 miles at 33,000 volts, 42 miles at 17,000 volts, and 320 miles at 10,000 volts.

This company has issued something over $11,000,000 of its authorized $13,000,000 of capital stock, and has outstanding nearly as much more in bonds.

The Pacific Light and Power Company.

The other company, the Pacific Light and Power, rose to its present magnitude by a process of absorption and growth similar to that of The Edison Electric. It owns the Kern River Company, the San Bernardino Gas and Electric Company, the Mentone Power Company, the Sierra Power Company, the San Gabriel Electric Company, the Ontario and San Antonio Heights Railway Company, the Domestic Water Company of Ontario, the Union Power Company, and the Riverside Power Company. The officers of the Pacific Light and Power Company also control the San Joaquin Light and Power Company, the Fresno City Railway Company, and the Fresno Traction Company.

The hydro-electric plants of the Pacific Light and Power Company have a rated capacity of about 20,000 continuous electric horsepower. The largest of these plants is in Kern county on Kern river, near Vaughn. It is rated at 13,000 horsepower. The other plants are in Southern California. The largest is near Mentone, the next near Azusa, and two of 900 horsepower capacity each are, one in the San Gabriel mountains near Ontario and the other opposite Arlington.

The Pacific Light and Power Company is capitalized at $10,000,000. It is authorized to be bonded for $10,000,000, of which $5,000,000 is outstanding.

Largest Customers of Companies.

The urban and interurban trolley systems of Los Angeles and vicinity are the largest customers of the Pacific Light and Power and The Edison Electric. These trolley systems are:

Los Angeles Railway Company, which operates the entire street railway system of the city of Los Angeles, and which owns 134 miles of track.

Los Angeles Interurban Railway Company, which operates 102 passenger cars and 20 freight cars over sixty-seven miles of track, connecting Los Angeles with a number of the adjacent towns.

Pacific Electric Railway, which operates 300 passenger cars and forty freight cars over 216 miles of track, connecting Los Angeles and Huntington Beach, Alhambra, Dolgeville, Altadena, Mt. Lowe, Pasadena, Garvanza, Long Beach, San Pedro, Arcadia, Whittier, Monrovia, Compton, Glendora, Azusa, Covina, Watts, Ramona, Beach, Manhattan Beach, Duarte, Echo Mountain, Dominguez, Laguna, Bolsa and Chica.

Los Angeles-Pacific Company, which operates 168 passenger cars and 184 freight cars over 210 miles of track, connecting Los Angeles and Santa Monica, Ocean Park, Playa del Rey, Harmon Beach, Manhattan Beach, Shakespeare Beach, Redondo, Hollywood, Colegrove, Verona, Venice, Ivy Park, Inglewood, Sawtelle, Palms and Soldiers' Home.

The customers of the Pacific Light and Power and The Edison Electric are as follows: Pacific Light and Power Company, Los Angeles Railway Company, Los Angeles Interurban Railway Company, and Pacific Electric Railway.

The Edison Electric Company: Los Angeles-Pacific Company.

At this point, the official organization of these companies becomes significant. Consider first the Pacific Light and Power Company and the three trolley systems that buy their power from it. The Pacific Light and Power Company has for years alternated in control between H. E. Huntington and E. H. Harriman. Huntington has at last decided that he has had enough of the fight, and will retire this winter from all active business, leaving the Southern Pacific interests in control of the Pacific Light and Power Company. This Southern Pacific interest has always been in evidence through the fact that I. W. Hellman, of San Francisco, has been the treasurer of the company. Hellman is a director in a half dozen Southern Pacific enterprises, such as the Wells-Fargo Nevada National Bank of San Francisco.

Now note that the president, vice-president and treasurer of all three trolley systems that buy power from the Pacific Light and Power Company are the same, and who they are. H. E. Huntington is president, William F. Herrin is vice-president, and I. W. Hellman is treasurer, of all three companies. William F. Herrin is general counsel for the Southern Pacific Company.

In other words, the Southern Pacific Company controls one of the two power producing companies of Southern California, and three of the four largest trolley systems of Southern California.

On the face of it, the other power-producing company, The Edison Electric, is free of Southern Pacific influence. But the Los Angeles-Pacific Company, which is the largest customer of The Edison Electric, is a Southern Pacific concern. The vice-president and treasurer of the Los Angeles-Pacific Company is M. H. Sherman, who is E. H. Harriman's personal representative and the Southern Pacific attorney in Los Angeles.

To revise the second paragraph preceding this, the Southern Pacific Company is one and has a strong business grip amounting to control of the other of the two power-producing companies of Southern California; and the Southern Pacific controls the four principal trolley systems of Southern California.

These facts raise, in specific terms, the question that has been in the public mind for some time: What is the connection between the railroads and the tendency toward a monopolization of the hydro-electric business in California?

The following facts may serve to throw further light on this question.

Other Southern Pacific Interests.

The Pacific Light and Power Company, as noted above, controls the San Joaquin Light and Power Company. This latter company has developed very valuable power sites on the San Joaquin river in Madera county, and transmits electricity for light and power purposes to Fresno, Madera, Hanford, Armona, Corcoran, Fowler, Dinuba, Laton, Orsi, Reedley, Selma and Sultana. It also controls and supplies power to the Fresno Traction Company, which operates the street railways of Fresno, and which is preparing to penetrate the suburban agricultural country adjacent to Fresno. Of course, this chain of control leads back directly to the Southern Pacific Company.

The Southern Pacific owns several other municipal and interurban trolley lines in the state. It owns the San Jose and Los Gatos Interurban Railway Company, which operates over forty miles of track, connecting San Jose, Campbell, Los Gatos and Saratoga. The president of this company is Jere T. Burke, who is, after William F. Herrin, the head of the Southern Pacific legislative lobby.

The Southern Pacific owns the Santa Clara Interurban Railroad Company, which now operates in Palo Alto and which, when extensions now under way are completed, will connect Santa Clara with San Francisco.

The Southern Pacific controls the Stockton

The "Pittsburg Syndicate" has purchased 7,413 acres of the Glenn estate, in the county of that name, for a sum said to be in excess of $500,000. This comprises the entire estate except 640 acres retained by each one of the three heirs.

From asphalt beds on a ranch near Los Angeles the skull of an animal of the feline family was exhumed. It was larger than the skull of any existing lion or tiger.

Earl Wilson, a fourteen year old boy of Santa Cruz, is dead from lockjaw caused by the scratch of a mountain lion which he received about six weeks prior to his death.

The Whitney house, known since early days to sojourners in Truckee, was destroyed by fire last week.

Senator J. B. Sanford, who has been in a sanitarium and under treatment for nervous prostration ever since the adjournment of the legislature, has returned to his editorial labors on the Ukiah Despatch-Democrat.

But five dollars a ton is being offered for wine grapes, and growers in the Sacramento valley assert that they will feed them to hogs rather than accept that price.

The Byron Times has purchased a cylinder press, and celebrates the fact by publishing a neatly printed paper in two colors—which is not so slow for a paper printed in a small town.

Mr and Mrs. G. E. Plye, of Willits, have attained the unique distinction of being twice formally married in one day. They secured a wedding license in Ukiah, went to Santa Rosa, went through a marriage ceremony before the city recorder, returned to Ukiah, discovered that their license was not valid in Santa Rosa, and were again married by a clergyman. It is trusted that the double ceremony is so binding that not even divorce ever will disturb the bond.

The Niles Washington Press is eighteen years old, and there has not been a day in the eighteen years in which it has not stood for the betterment of the community and the right as it saw it; which is higher praise than can be extended to some papers published in much more populous centers.

Now comes the rumor that the Los Angeles consolidated committee will work for state division, with Pasadena as the capital of the southern state. Pasadena is much too beautiful to be thus invidiously distinguished, and it is not improbable that the story will terminate as it began—as a mere rumor.

The Orange Post has issued a handsome illustrated supplement which would be a credit to a town several times the size of Orange.

It is believed that a wagon road in Glenn and Mendocino counties will be completed before winter sets in, thus giving the first safe passage for teams and automobiles from the Sacramento valley to the Northern California seashore.

Californian Poets' Corner

It is said that Mary Austin, the novelist and essayist, does not esteem her poems very highly; but, nevertheless, they do not discredit her literary reputation. The following lines appeared in Out West about five years ago:

NIGHT WIND, WAKE!

By Mary Austin.

Night Wind wake! now the cattle leave the trail for us,

Huddled on the hill slope by the stony water scar,

Get you down along the steep

Where the moon-cyed gillies keep.

To go walking in the meadows—

Silver runnels in the shadows and the hidden waters are.

Night Wind wake! now the laden vine is calling us,

Calling with the incense of its green and misty blooms.

Now the milk-white alders quake

Where the dark lies like a lake

On the musky scented meadows,

On the many-lilied meadows,

On the chilly mountain meadows where the throaty hylas blooms.

Night Wind wake! I am coming up the trail to you,

Up and past the gullies where the midnight shadows lair,

Past the tangle by the creek

Where the trail is all to seek.

To the damp and dusky meadows,

To the willow-skirted meadows,

To go walking in the meadows with the pleasant Night Wind there.

AN apparently level plain lies between two paralleling ranges of mountains with summits sixty to seventy miles asunder, as the crow flies, and trending from southeast to northwest.

A river, with bed and brink, but little bank, debouches through the mountains and piles its debris high and wide where it enters upon the plain, forming a triangular, elevated swamp filled with willows and twining briars and hemmed in on either side by the spreading walls of a foothill canyon. From time to time, diverging channels are cut by raging waters through this elevated swamp to the open plain and, through it, in irregular courses, to the trough of the valley where rests, out somewhere in the shimmering distance, a shallow saucer of a lake indistinguishable from any marauding mirage that may come dancing into the field of vision.

Along these wet-weather channels from river to lake stretch lines of straggling oaks, not dense enough to be forests, yet comprising groves of considerable extent and great beauty. A half-day's drive either northerly or southerly will fetch one to another river, another swamp, another series of radiating channels, some of them filled to the brink with the drifting sands of ages and known as "sand-streaks," whose natural office it is to under-drain where the over-drainage of the open channels fails fully to perform that office.

Such is, or was, the Upper San Joaquin valley of South Central California.

Of the mountains volumes might be written, without the subject, but only the reader, being exhausted; Pelion upon Ossa, ridge upon ridge, the Sierra Nevada lifts its huge bulk more than a day's drive either northerly or southerly and rock crested, the granite pinnacles of a thousand peaks silhouetted against the morning sky give the range that serrated appearance that suggested its name. It is a region locked in snow and ice during winter, but during summer, the peaks with the light gray water of the snow, and the great valley below lay blistering, save as it was partly veiled from the sun by a canopy of impalpable dust suspended from range to range half way up the sides of the Sierra, and through which only the tallest peaks of the Monte Diablo range on the farther side of the valley stand blue and clear.

As for the valley itself, if it be seen between the beginning of the rains in the fall and their cessation at the end of the season, generally about the first of May, no land could wear a more luxurious look, provided always that it really has rained, which it has not always. Carpeted with a velvety mat of vine-like grasses, covered with wild flowers in kaleidoscopic variety and unsurpassed profusion, a surfeited animal life is invited literally to lie on flowery beds of ease. But if it has not rained, or if the rainy season has been a failure, there, closed in by the expansive walls, at the time of which we write, lie as brown as late autumn and sometimes as bare as a turnpike. Nowhere else is the transition from affluence to poverty more savage, or from poverty to affluence more swift and unstinted than here, conditioned upon whether the rains come or go, whether the waters of the insufficient rivers are utilized for irrigation or are allowed to sink unused in the sandy sieves of their swampy debouchments.

At the time when our story begins this great upper valley was a common of pasture, except along the narrow margins of the streams where the overflooded rivers, caused by the melting snows on the mountain summits, overspread the adjacent plain with nature's spendthrift irrigation. Along these streams stockmen had made some settlements and had done some stake-and-ridered fencing, but all the rest of the valley was as unsexed by division walls as the open sea. If there were orchards the trees were seedless; if there were vineyards the vines were of the varieties which the Mission padres brought from Spain a century before. The dwellings were roomy, rather than conveniently or architecturally arranged, and had for a background, great, half-open barns, surrounded by coral fences high and strong. Not invariably there was a small corn field

Not many weeks of camping on the ground under a spreading tent had elapsed before Silas Singham and his family were living under their own roof. At the start a well was bored and windmill set up to pump water into a capacious tank set high enough from the ground to permit water to be piped to all the rooms in the house.

The exactions of the Tulare climate are not severe with regard to house construction, and pioneer ranch houses were built accordingly. The merest skeleton of a frame set up, enclosed with rough boards set on end, cracks battered over, the inner walls first lined with cheese cloth tacked on and then covered with wall paper; ceilings covered with a heavier lining and then kalsomined, outside either whitewashed or suffered to be given such a weather-worn stain as a nearly tropical sun and a bone-dry atmosphere lose little time in imparting to wooden surfaces—such was the method of construction of Silas Singham's "White House" home, for it was by that name that, by the application of whitewash, it came to be known far and near.

Silas Singham's home was exceptional, too, in that it was larger than usual with this type of habitation. The main part was rectangular, two stories high, face to the road and porch across the front. To the rear of this a long and narrow dining room and kitchen all in one, one story high and with narrow porches on either side. Back of this, and joined on, was the windmill, tower and tank, with the tower framework boarded in for a milk house.

Twenty rods to the rear stood a big skeleton of a barn open to the weather, with stalls ranged along either side and a great open space between in which many tons of hay could be stacked. Alongside the barn were sheds for the protection of farm implements, and a little, portable smithy, for Silas Singham was a thrifty man and believed in taking care of what he possessed. In this, too, he was an exceptional "sandlapper." Around the house a lath fence was thrown, leaving room for a few orchard and shade trees, as soon as they could be planted, and for a small garden to be watered from the windmill and tank. This was home, dubbed by the river men the "Horned Toad" ranch.

CHAPTER IV. THE SCHOOL AND THE STATION.

There had been one of those early passings, "never-known-before" September rains, which nevertheless happen in the Upper San Joaquin valley about three seasons out of every five. They clear the air of dust, dampen the dry heat, and narrow, dingy the sacks of grain piled up unprotected in the field and astonish the people with their unexpectedness. A first shower would do all these things if it did not come until Thanksgiving.

The shower had come Sunday, after nearly five months of rainless summer, and school was to open for the fall term at the station Monday morning. Helen, at bedtime, on the qui vive of expectancy, had gotten her books together prepared for an early start for her ten-mile ride in the fresh morning air. Only one thing distressed her. She could no longer ride boy-fashion with her father's saddle as she had done all summer out on the plains, so she was forced to cinch on the side-saddle, which Roanoke disliked and she abominated, and make the best of it.

Never had she seen the mountains look so beautiful as they did that morning, standing high and clear in the purified air. She had not seen them before except through an atmosphere more or less obscured with a dusty haze. They looked to be scarcely farther away than the station, and yet their summits were a good fifty miles beyond. She longed to go right on up into the mountains and see what they were like and meant to do so some day, but now there was nothing ahead of her but school and a twenty-mile horseback ride each day.

She expected to be frightfully early, perhaps the first one there, but quite a little way before reaching the rambling building with its one-story additions, put on to meet the temporary needs of a fast-increasing population, her eyes fell upon an advancing figure that had often passed before her vision since that memorable day in the road. The boy's father had been unkind to her father that day, and now she did not think that she should like him at all, but his face shone so eager and bright that her resentment passed for the moment even before either had spoken.

"Come over this way," he called, taking the way toward the sheds, "I have got a stall picked out for you. It is the end one and mine is next, so that I can keep you both tidied up easy as not, and if any 'kid' makes off with your horse blanket or ties your bridle into knots I'll swat him to sleep."

"Well, you are pretty fresh, sure enough," said Helen with a pout. "How do you know what I would rather be clear at the other end of the shed? It is not very old plug of a horse that I want my Roanoke to associate with." But she followed him to the sheds without further protest.

"If you let Clay Babe hear you speak of him as an old plug he'll kick a lung out of you. There is only one other horse in the place that can beat him a half-mile dash, and that is Peacock, and he can beat Peacock for a quarter."

"Where is that precious Peacock? Why didn't you ride him?"

"Dad won't let me, until after the fair, except just for exercise up and down the road in front of our house. He is being trained for the races. Shant I help you down?"

"No, thank you, Huh! Roanoke will help me."

"Don't say 'huh' any more every time I open my mouth. You made fun of me so that time last spring that I have been sitting up nights with myself ever since breaking myself of the habit."

"Well, you are easy, I must say!" was Helen's comment. "Kneel, Roanoke, kneel, I say. I want to get down." With a few flicks with the riding whip across his knees the horse knelt, Helen slipped from the saddle, and the animal bounded to his feet again.

In a moment Gabriel had the saddle off Roanoke's back and hung in its place, the horse stabled by his own volition, and he up across the entrance way; then, taking Helen's books, he led the way to the school-house.

Gabriel had three several reasons for desiring to make himself agreeable to Helen. One was that he had concluded that she would rank as quite the prettiest girl in school, and to be her friend would make him the envy of all of the other fellows. Another was that he wanted very much to see how fast her educated horse could go, for, although the horse was evidently no "scrub," he had his doubts about the value of higher education for a horse. Finally, the boy was indescribably lonely. His father, while kind enough, had shunned companionship ever since sister Helen had died. His mother was much comfort to him, but rarely left the home, and as for the vaqueros, well, aside from the horses and cattle, endless cards and gun practice, in which he was as proficient as the best of them, there wasn't anything left but whiskey, and he would rather try to chew up carpet tacks than to drink that stuff.

When Helen no longer had the classification had been completed, much to Gabriel's joy, he found that Helen and he were in the same classes, a little way along in the eighth grade.

The school was overcrowded, the teachers were too few and the erection of a brick building preparatory to the opening of a more advanced school was already under way, for the station was rapidly growing into a town and was ambitious of becoming a city.

For the reasons given the advanced eighth graders were thrown much upon their own resources and Helen and Gabriel soon found themselves almost in a class by themselves, Helen leading and Gabriel determined to keep up if it drove him to an asylum. Never before had he done so much studying or found so little time for making the lives of other pupils miserable.

The lines of travel which Helen and Gabriel had to take to and from school were divergent. Each lived ten miles away, Gabriel to the north and Helen to the west, each, as Gabriel explained it, at the corner of a full piece of pie with the school house at the center, but by cutting off "slaunchwise" right through the woods, about a third of the way from town, he could come in on Helen's road a mile from school without losing much time or going very far out of his way. A principal object in doing this was that at the point of intersection of the two lines of travel there began a half-mile straight-away race track that had been somewhat improved, where all the scrub races gotten up in the town had been run ever since the railroad station was established and the first saloon had opened. Gabriel was fairly aching to see Roanoke run.

On the second morning after school opened, as Helen drew near to the race course, she caught sight of Gabriel cantering swiftly along a trail converging upon the main road and soon he was by her side. "There are the starting posts," he called, "and it is a half mile straight-away to the wire in front of the judges' stand. Now let us see what that educated horse of yours can do."

Clay Babe knew what was in his rider's mind, for he had run races over that track with every pony that came to school and could go at all, but Roanoke was not quite in the secret, although the presence of the horse by his side had no mean inspiration. "Now!" exclaimed Gabriel and was away on the instant. Roanoke lost a length or so at the start, which was increased to two lengths by the time the quarter post was reached, but from there on he gained rapidly, closed the gap and passed under the wire at least a good length ahead.

Helen was triumphant, and Gabriel seemed to, from being real sorry. "That colt has got go in him, sure enough," he said, as he dismounted in front of the shed, stripped the saddle from his smoking horse and turned him into the stall. A moment later he had unsaddled Helen's horse and was vigorously rubbing him down. Throwing his own blanket over Roanoke, he turned to and rubbed Clay Babe down and covered him with a saddle blanket. "He is a half-mile horse and I am blest if I don't believe he'll be a miler when he gets a little older, but he needs training. He didn't get away good, and you need to ride him boy fashion. What do you say to a run every morning when the track is good? I'll come by that way. It'll be good for the horses and more fun for me than a basket of monkeys."

And so the youngsters and their horses had their morning dash whenever the weather was fine and the track in fit condition for the training of Roanoke to the rules of the game. The rains, though, came in good quantity the first year of Silas Singham's experience as a "sandlapper." It did the heart of him good, with his six strong mules, five-gang plow, seeder attached and harrow dragging behind, to tear up the rich, virgin earth, for sod it was not. The native grasses, being all annuals, made no sod, such as must be broken and rotted on the prairies of the Middle West before the land becomes workable and productive. Each day saw seven new acres plowed, seeded and harrowed down betwixt sun and sun, and Silas Singham was happy in his prospects and full of faith in the country.

The remainder of the colony of Yolo county farmers had joined him, too, and Enterprise settlement had grown apace. Others also had come in and settled, and a primary school district had been organized and school-house built for the accommodation of children too young to ride to Tulare for attendance upon the graded school. As a particular mark of enterprise, justifying the name given the district, a tower had been erected above the schoolhouse roof and a bell hung, big and loud enough to awaken the whole neighborhood if a fire broke out in grass or grain field, or other event occurred warranting a night summons. No resident of Enterprise but felt a possessory pride in that bell, for it had been placed there by popular subscription.

Moses Brayton's cattle came around occasionally, wonderfully curious it seemed, to see how farm work progressed in the settlement. They watched their opportunity to paw and wallow in the loose earth and would spend the night on it if unmolested; but Silas, or some of the neighbors, patiently drove them off, attributing their trespassing to that "ornerness" with which their owner had characterized them. Word was occasionally sent to their owner that it would be well for him to take care of his cattle, but no attention was paid to the notification.

When the grain began to grow the trespassing of the cattle became less excusable and more serious, for the whole plains were green and the cattle were surfeited. Sometimes the settlers would retire at night without a horned beast being in sight, to awaken in the morning with several hundred head of cattle scattered over the fields and not a vaquero to be seen. Men wondered at this until Helen, at school, received a hint from Gabriel that helped to clear the mystery.

"Did you ever see a cow-brute that had a solid hoof just like a horse?" demanded Gabriel of Helen one evening as he was putting the saddle on Helen's horse for her.

"No, nor you either," was the reply. "Well, I've seen the tracks they made in the soft ground, anyhow," declared the boy, "and you can see them yourself if you will ride down toward the lake the next time Dad's cattle come pestering around you, but don't you ever say that I said so, or my back will get basted a plenty."

"Clayton Brayton, what are you giving me? You must think I'm a silly."

"Well, if you don't believe me just go and see for yourself is all I have to say, but be careful not to say I ever gave you the hunch," urged the lad.

Pondering in her mind Gabriel's enigmatic observations Helen resolved that, next time the cattle came, she would ride around that way to see if she could find any footprints of horses among those of the cattle where they crossed spots of bare ground. Accordingly she rose exceptionally early and followed the retreating cattle trail several miles toward the lake, and, sure enough, there were horse tracks among the split hoof prints, and she reported the fact to her father, but kept her own counsel regarding the origin of her discovery.

The next time the cattle came, a bunch of them were corralled and held for damages, but Brayton's vaqueros came while Silas was in town and took the cattle away, leaving a threatening message instead of the money claimed as damages. Other ranches were visited in like manner. From time to time, the cattle revelled out of possession, a jury trial demanded and the juries, being summoned by a river-sympathizing sheriff, either found for the defendant or failed to agree, so that the people despaired of the protection of the law.

Along toward the lake, where the wheat should be in the stage of the harking of a dog, and the indiscreet bellowing of a cow that had become separated from her calf, reached the ears of Helen sleeping by an open window upstairs and she aroused her father just in time to find a great herd of cattle moving in a body toward his grain. Helen sprang upon the bare back of Roanoke and dashed to the schoolhouse, where she rang the great bell with all her might, arousing the whole neighborhood, who joined in driving the cattle far back toward the lake. As they passed through a network of sloughs, several pistol shots were heard in the near distance and bullets went whizzing over the heads of the cattle drivers, but in the darkness they saw no one and pressed forward unafraid, accepting the incident more as a warning than as an attempt upon their lives. With the coming of morning horse tracks were found among the tracks made by the cattle, showing clearly that they had been driven toward the grain fields deliberately.

Then a man was hired to patrol the settlement at night for the protection of the crops, with instructions to ring the schoolhouse bell if the cattle approached, but, within a week, this man was found leaning against a hummock of earth, dead, with a bullet hole through his brain and his own pistol, with one chamber empty, lying by his side. His left shoulder was broken and his face was much bruised, as though he had fallen from his horse, but no powder marks were found on his skin, and a citizen of the neighborhood, who chanced to be up at night, asserted that he heard two shots fired with a considerable interval between them. However, the cattle had not made their appearance that night. There were many who doubted the commonly received theory of suicide, and, anyhow, a case of Winchester rifles and a thousand rounds of ammunition were ordered from San Francisco that day by telephone.

(Seen From Outside the City.)

Editor Weekly: Looking over the primary results in San Francisco in the light of the recent campaign waged there, it is easy to see that the issue presented was whether the graft prosecution should go on or be discontinued. There may have been various prospective scenes in numbers with a platonic banking after fight, but this was the district attorneyship over which the fight was in reality made. Will Henry in Langdon's place the movement to take the "higher-ups" San Quentinward will be carried on, no matter how slowly, to success at last. Without him there that movement is bound to come to nothing. And briefly put, the verdict of the primaries is that Henry shall not discontinue attorney and graft prosecution go on, and no farther shall the graft prosecution go. Of course, if he runs in November independently or upon the ticket on which he has been nominated, it may happen that there will be enough votes in his favor east in San Francisco to insure his election. But suppose he does not before the electorate of that city for the office, if the primary balloting is in all indicative of what the election returns will be this fall, these millions of taxpayers have no fear of the sloughed and barred windows, doors, and ramparts.

The fact is that there is a rotten state of public sentiment existing in the city of San Francisco. By her action taken the other day in turning Henry down, which action may well be regarded as final, this municipality has assured the world that the latter's impression that justice is to be bought and sold in the big city of the Pacific coast has nothing groundless about it, whatever. But San Francisco does not seem to care what the world thinks about her. Nor are we nor anybody else concerned in the thing as to the reputation she bears in other parts of the planet or how that reputation becomes her. What she does is her own business, so far as it concerns her self alone. It is not to be forgotten, however, that outsiders are going to accuse California of sympathizing with and condoning the graft prosecution of the most populous city of the commonwealth are in the habit of doing that reprehensible thing. Hence it may be regretted for the people of this state to clear themselves of San Francisco's reflected shame by making Henry governor of California. HOWARD ERICKSON.

NYE ON THE JOB.

(From the Fresno Republican.)

It was State Controller A. B. Nye, who founded the assessor of Contra Costa county, the other day, by asking him to explain how he had to raise the assessment of farm lands in his county, when the $1,000,000 franchise of the Pacific Telephone Company and the $6,000,000 franchise of the Union Oil Company had been assessed at only $5,000 apiece. Both these franchises had been assessed at full value in San Francisco and Los Angeles, when the companies had their offices there, and both companies had technically moved their books to Contra Costa county, apparently for the express purpose of evading taxes.

It was State Controller Nye who fought last year for the obvious principle of basing the railroad taxes on the income of the year for which the taxes were assessed, instead of on that of a previous year.

And it has been State Controller A. B. Nye who has, at every opportunity, stood between the rights of the people and the combination of predatory corporations and complainant officials who would destroy them. Nye has made, out of what might easily be treated as a routine office, one of the central facts of California administration. He has made a career out of a minor office—just as any man big enough can make a career out of anything.

And, by the same token, California could have no better governor than A. B. Nye. We are not saying that he would make an ideal candidate, for he is an unspectacular person, and candidates are sometimes needed (more's the pity) to fire the imaginations of the people. Neither are we trying to boost him, willingly, to an office which probably he does not want. But, just for speculation, if we were entrusted with the temporary dictatorship of California, with power to appoint the next governor, we would appoint A. B. Nye, the man of all men in California who best knows the job. The people might do worse—and probably will.

"Where's your watch?" "Here it is." "But that watch is silver. The one you used to carry had a fine gold case." "Circumstances alter cases, you know."—Yonkers Statesman.

The New Constitution and Capital.

The new constitution was charged with being socialistic, anarchistic, and in open warfare with capital. It was charged with attacking property, the foundations of social order, with attacking wealth "by the application of violent and dangerous remedies for a disease that ought to have been treated by a gentler method." That there were diseases in the social order was not denied, but these were looked upon as inevitable and to be borne with stoical philosophy, but to be resisted very cautiously if at all. As Mr. Theodore Hittell declared in his history of that time, "Capital was no more tyrannical and corporations no more unconscionable than by their very nature they are compelled to be." Let us see what some of these bad things which the new constitution undertook to do to capital really were.

Partly through Spanish grants, partly through swindling the state out of its swamp and overflowed lands under pretense of a reclamation that was never more than a pretense, partly through dummy locators on government lands (paid for at $1.25 per acre in greenbacks then worth half their face value), and partly through purchase from land-grant railroads, not only had land monopoly become a menace to the commonwealth, but the burden of land taxation was thrown in unequal portion upon the smaller holdings.

To meet this difficulty section 2 of article 13 provides that "land and the improvements thereon shall be separately assessed. Cultivated and uncultivated land of the same quality, and similarly situated, shall be assessed at the same value." This was looked upon as a species of agrarianism, but is it? Could any policy be more just if justly applied?

The most that can be claimed for this provision, in actual practice, is that it has tended toward a more equal taxation of land values and encouraged a tendency to subdivide large holdings, but whatever discrimination has persisted to this day has been in favor of, and not against, large holdings of land. It is fairly safe to say that there may not now be in California a thousand-acre ranch that, quality and situation considered, is assessed at the same proportionate value with a forty-acre home in the same locality. Great landlords have either so seduced county assessors or boards of supervisors from their sworn duty, or procured the election of those who have proved partial to great interests, as practically to negate this wise and just provision of the new constitution.

The worst of it is that the people themselves have not effectively resorted to the partiality against themselves. Their own moral obtuseness has stood in the way of their appreciation and denunciation of official perfidy. If taken to task for a culpable lack of interest in the issue the common answer has been: "Oh, that is politics." The people have recognized and, by negligence if not acceptance, have consented to a low standard of official and political integrity and have deservedly paid the price every time they have paid their taxes. It is as certainly, if not as greatly, immoral to submit to fraud as to commit it, and the paramount truth the writer of these lessons wishes to drive home to the inner consciousness of his readers is that California has all along suffered, and is now suffering, from low standards of civic morals held by the people themselves. As long as official thieves are received as social equals with honest folk, while horse thieves are not, we shall have more official thieves than horse thieves.

The extent to which promotion enterprises had "worked" counties, cities, and even the state, to secure subsidies in aid of corporate or private enterprises, to the burdening of taxpayers, led the makers of the new constitution to prohibit gifts of public moneys or credits, or exemptions from taxation, in aid of any private or corporate enterprises, and the percentage of public debt to assessed wealth was strictly limited. It was feared by financial interests of a certain class that these restrictions upon the discretionary powers of a free people would discourage enterprises, and perhaps it has, of a certain character which the more it is discouraged the greater the public welfare. It is like the kind of business that the prosecution of graft in San Francisco is especially hurting—the kind that most needs to be hurt.

Another provision of the new constitution which capitalists stoutly resisted at the time, and have since practically overthrown, was that which regarded a mortgage interest in property as property and subject to taxation in the hands of the holder of the mortgage. If one owned a mortgaged farm, when he came to pay his taxes, the value of the mortgage was deducted from the assessed value of the farm and he paid the taxes on the remainder, while the holder of the mortgage had to pay the tax on the value of the mortgage. This was perfectly just, but not perfectly practical in application. As a horse can be led to water but can not be made to drink, so a money lender can not be made to lend his money on terms not satisfactory to himself. He can keep his money or lend it elsewhere. In theory this constitutional provision was beyond criticism, but in practice it worked a hardship upon the borrower as well as an inconvenience upon the lender. The interest rate was always made enough higher than the normal rate to cover any possible taxpaying contingency. It is an economic truth, slow of comprehension, that most laws for the protection of debtors, or the prevention of usury, have no other effect than to make conditions more difficult for the borrower of money.

While the provision for the taxation of mortgages still stands in the constitution, the provision that made it effective (section 5 of article 12), which prohibited a debtor contracting to pay the taxes himself, in consideration of a lowered interest rate, was, in 1906, repealed by the people, and now the common custom is for the borrower to contract to pay the taxes and, by so doing, he gets his interest reduced an average of about 2 per cent.

This provision of the new constitution, severely denounced as hostile to capital, was, within itself, perfectly just and perfectly sound, but in application, not very feasible. It forgot human nature and did not take into account that the lender and not the borrower is generally in a position to dictate terms.

Former United States Senator Henry M. Teller, of Colorado, recently said that "the game of Politics is not a financial success. I was poor when I became a senator—the first public office I ever held—and I'm a poor man to-day. The salary paid to congressmen is too small for the great burden which they have to bear; and yet I don't know but what if I had my life to live over again I might do the same thing I have done, if possible. The lasting friendship I have made with the public men of the last thirty years is enough almost to compensate for the general financial loss one incurs."

Mr. Heney the Issue.

Had the forces of civic righteousness in San Francisco made shift to head a municipal ticket with a first-class candidate for mayor, such a man for instance as Walter Macarthur, James D. Phelan or Hiram Johnson, it would have been possible to marshal all the forces that will stand for good government, a good administration of justice and a reputable reputation for our city at home and abroad, for enthusiastic fighting all along the line, but, inasmuch as no such head to the ticket could be found, the fight must now resolve itself about the person and the work of Francis J. Heney. Mr. Heney becomes the sole personality, and the further prosecution of the Big Grafters the sole issue, of the campaign. There is even some danger of losing sight of the need for selecting a square deal Board of Supervisors.

This narrowing and emphasizing of the issue may not prove wholly an evil. The people like to have clean-cut, concrete issues put up to them. There was a tendency to keep the real purpose in the background. The committee of twenty-five alleged business men kept their purpose to themselves, and only their organ, the Chronicle, blarneyed it out. Even the League of Independent Republican Clubs sidestepped it, and Mr. Maury did not give it particular emphasis. Mr. Heney, by virtue of his position and his personality, will make the issue so plain that the very gamins in the alleyways will understand it.

The contest will not be between Mr. Heney and Mr. Fickert. Mr. Fickert is a Pooh Bah. It will be between Mr. Heney and all the powers of evil this side of the adamant front gate to perdition. Nor will the contest be therefore unequal, for Mr. Heney will command the alliance of all the forces of righteousness this side of the Gates of Pearl that bar the way to Paradise. The battle will be of thrilling interest. The whole world will be looking on. A candidate for mayor who would have appealed to the imaginations and civic consciences of men would have been an aid to Mr. Heney and Mr. Heney an aid to him, especially in bringing out the last man on the great register. The danger now is that some will wish to wash their hands of the whole business by remaining at home. These would not vote for Mr. Fickert if they were to go to the polls. What man can do Mr. Heney will do, and to doubt his triumph will be to doubt the people of San Francisco.

Some Urbanities of Discussion.

One of the interesting features of the papers on Hetch-Hetchy read before the Commonwealth Club Wednesday night was the fact that neither side took pains to attribute frankness or honesty to the other. These papers were prepared by eminent engineers, scientific men, but they by no means reflected scientific calm and impersonality. Probably there is no help for it. A political question is still political, even when it is an engineering one. Our politicians do not attribute frankness or honesty to each other. And until the issue is finally settled, whether the people's government shall control the public-service corporations or they shall control the government, these questions of public supply will necessarily involve as much politics as engineering. If one may have Christian or pagan science why not Republican or Democratic engineering?

Our Flag on the Seas.

The attention of the thoughtful reader is called to the second article in the series on "American Shipping In American Ships," which appears in this issue, written for The California Weekly by Mr. Geo. W. Dickie. One fact, stated by him, should be sufficient to challenge the attention of all patriotic Americans. It is that, during the period beginning with 1789 and ending in 1828, when discriminating duties favored American ships, 95.2 per cent. of American exports, and 89 per cent. of the imports, were carried in American ships, whereas now, and for many years, foreign owned, built, manned and operated ships carry almost precisely the above percentage of American shipping, leaving only the fractional part to American deep-sea commerce in American bottoms. This is both a national calamity and a national disgrace.

In the next article in the series, to appear two weeks hence, Mr. Dickie will consider the much vaunted panacea of "free ships," the doctrine brought out in opposition to a ship subsidy every time such a measure is brought forward as the one and only certain and all sufficient remedy—the allowing of American capital to buy ships where it can buy them cheapest and then sail them under the American flag. No little curiosity will be felt to see how Mr. Dickie will handle this issue.

To our way of thinking we shall have to do in relation to our shipping as other nations do in relation to their shipping until we can induce them to stop doing it. It is with the merchant marine as with the navy. We don't want a big navy and if others will quit building we will, and if they won't we won't. We don't want to subsidize our merchant marine and will not if other nations do not, but if they will we must.

That Pole.

Whoever got there first that North Pole is Uncle Sam's. We shall have to let that content us until the scientists have taken the data furnished by Peary and Cook and traced their courses out to a conclusion that scientific geographers themselves can agree upon. If they fail of agreement Peary and Cook will have to go back and do it over.

But let not the individual work himself into a passion over the pros and cons between Cook and Peary. That might turn black hairs white, but can have no other result. It is as with the atmosphere of Mars, nothing that we can do anything about. The astronomers must settle it.

Anyhow it is Uncle Sam's pole and with that assurance we may properly swell our hearts with all the pride the hoops will stand.

Equalized.

After six years of shilly-shallying with a much dreaded duty the State Board of Equalization has equalized the state and, apparently, with a vengeance. In the contemplation of the New Constitution this board of five discreet persons was expected to get good team work out of the county assessors of the state, cause them to pull together and on the level, but they have not done it. Tax shirking by counties has been persistently and systematically followed, with the result that the burden of state government has been unevenly borne.

The best thing to do about the whole business is to be rid of it. The knowledge that other counties are shirking puts a premium upon each county to shirk, and the assessor who does not shirk in the interests of his county is likely to be brought to book by his county. No system is defensible that needlessly takes human nature at its worst. The better way is to leave the taxation of property values to local communities for local purposes and support the state by indirect taxation.

The drastic character of the equalization raises an issue as to its fairness. Heretofore state controllers (ex-officio members of the board) have voted against all increases while each district member was held exempt from voting for a raise in his own district. These precedents were, to some extent, departed from in this instance. State Controller Nye voted for moderate, rather than immoderate, increases and, as his sanity of judgment is to be valued next to his unflinching loyalty to conscience, the rest of the board need not be surprised if the consensus of opinion accepts Mr. Nye's view as much nearer the right thing than that of the majority.

Whenever a candidate repudiates his own sponsors without losing, or expecting to lose, their support, it will be well to wait until he makes good before placing one's trust in him. Let those who were born yesterday take him at his word.

It is perhaps pertinent to inquire, of those who are "fired" of the graft prosecution, how long it took them to get tired of the graft?

HIS DAYS NUMBERED.

A little while he lived at his more than baronial castle at Arden on the Hudson, lordling of all he surveyed. A little while he wandered with feeble step through the marble halls, which his more than kingly wealth had supplied him, but the death damp was upon his brow and the dank breath of the grave blew in his face and he laid him down to die. So passed E. H. Harriman, the wizard of yesterday, the memory of to-day.

Let his obituary be brief and to the point, then pass to other concerns more important.

He was a great organizer and as such conferred advantages upon half a continent. That is half the story.

He was a great sophisticator-speculator and as such plundered like a Ghengis Khan, reaped where he had not sown and gathered where he had not sown. That is the other half.

The spirit of the jungle animated him, but, lacking physical prowess and a suitable period in the world's history, he became as subtle as a magician. His moral values were negligible quantities. As a force he was to be reckoned with.

He subjugated commonwealths as well as rival railroads and taught an incorporated plutocracy how to do it. Acknowledging no master but his own will, and no ally but Standard Oil, he rose from broker's clerk to the mastery of the transportation of half a continent, suzerain of many states he had reduced to dependencies.

And then he threw up his hands and made surrender to a stomach, a mere sack made of tripe. Alas! how feeble are they whom the world calls powerful.

The evil he did will long survive him, the success he achieved tending to give false values to similar careers. The good he did will scarcely outlast the turning to dust of his mortal part. Our time has learned quite enough of the Harriman form of achievement and learned the lesson quite too well. We have accumulated riches at the sacrifice of justice and gained power at the cost of a wholesome contentment and the living of lives worth while. His is not the type of success the coming generation needs to have set before it for emulation. Therefore let him not be exalted unduly, but rather suffer the attention to be turned to more important affairs. The civilization that produced such a character and career is not healthful. Let us therefore give the greater consideration to that pregnant truth.

What E. H. Harriman was as husband, father, neighbor, friend, those know best who were nearest to him, but there is no known reason for suspecting that, in these relations he was other than exemplary. It was only in the world of finance that H. H. Rogers was flint or that John D. Rockefeller is adamant. It is with his public character that we have to do.

The good he did was incidental rather than intentional. His powers of organization were not employed that the public might benefit but primarily that his properties might be built up and the value of his investments doubled. Instead of effecting economies that transportation rates might be lowered he raised them and raised them that his vast fortune might be made more vast. He worked like a packhorse that the proceeds might be spent in indulging the intoxicating satisfaction of success, just as many another squanders his substance in drink.

It is well to value such characters at their true worth. To gloss over and glorify and do the conformable thing is to mislead youth and misguide manhood, of which there has been too much. And this we may do without abating our sympathy for the sorrowing family.

It was characteristic, too, that the masters of finance have known of his condition for months, and so have forfended themselves against peradventure, while the investing public were kept in the dark until the last and for some hours after he had breathed his last.

TAKE ONE OR NONE.

For three hundred years the world has been putting up with "Hobson's Choice" and, in the present mayorality contest, San Francisco fares no worse than many another. "Where to elect there is but one, his Hobson's choice—take that or none." That is what the voter will have to do in this election.

Let us give ungrudging credit to political manipulators for their cunning in bringing about this condition. The thing did not come through inadvertence. It was done a purpose, and the men who did it had more than one conference before the consummation of their enterprise.

Let it be confessed, too, that the better element, as represented in the Good Government League, has lacked the political efficiency to bring out the man who could command the esteem, the confidence, the enthusiasm of straight voters. There has been more of negative goodness than of positive among available men and San Francisco suffers the humiliation of an array of unfit candidates because the fit man, with courage and self-denial equalling his fitness, could not be found.

The Good Government League is considering the matter of endorsing Dr. Leland as the least unfit of the three misfits. The endorsement, if made, will do the League more harm than Leland good. It will aid him little. There was one good thing the Good Government League might have done. Failing that it will best do nothing in regard to the mayorality.

This is not saying that there is no choice between the three candidates, but only that no one of those nominations was fit to be made. That we may judge wisely, where fine discrimination is necessary, we must look behind the candidates to see who their sponsors are.

Dr. Leland is vouched for by Gavin McNab, and Gavin McNab represents those materialistic financiers of San Francisco who are open to no considerations other than financial, with the saving grace that dollars must be made according to recognized rules, that is, legitimately. They are opposed to the prosecution, not because they believe in graft but because their friends and business associates are in the toils of the law. Were Mr. Heney directing his energies toward putting the members of the Boode Board into prison he would be heartily supported by McNab and his following, but to stand for imprisoning Calhoun, Glass, Drum, and the rest of the higher-ups would be "going back on men of their class" if not of their type, and this McNab's supporters cannot bring themselves to do. In the event of his election Dr. Leland and his advisers will do all they can to thwart the prosecution and bring it to an inefficient end. It may be remarked also that Mr. McNab and Mr. Herrin are seldom out of rapport.

Mr. William Crocker was nominated, and is vouched for, by as raw a lot of political and financial jilbusters as ever sacked a city. They believe in the wide-open town, morally, financially, politically, and every other way. The men they named for supervisors afford convincing evidence that they not only believe in graft, but want the former conditions restored whereby the city may be looted in private interests. Especially they want a stop put to all attempts to fetch a municipal water service from Hetch-Hetchy, and, if given the power, they will see to it that nothing comes of any municipal ownership enterprise whatsoever.

In justice to Mr. Crocker it may be said that it is not very probable that this element will stand by him now that it has secured his nomination. It will prefer Mr. McCarthy as the greater of three public evils, but will put up with the lesser if it must in order to come in on the winning side. Mr. Crocker's candidacy was planned, managed and consummated by attaches of the political bureau of which Mr. W. F. Herrin is the presiding genius. It is possible that, if elected, Mr. Crocker might forbear to disgrace his party, his family and himself, but his is not a strong character and if he were to turn out well the sons of iniquity would be fooled.

Mr. P. H. McCarthy owes his nomination to himself. His putative backing is that element in labor unionism that is political first and laborious afterward if necessity heartlessly compels. The grafters and all their friends are for him. The associated villainies are for him, so is the redlight district and every dive and den in San Francisco. It was out of that ilk that the Boode Board was produced. In working harm to moral values he will be restrained by no traditions and deterred by no associations. He will be elected by the Incorporated Plutocrats, if they can bring it about, with an eye to use thereafter. They will restore primeval conditions and undo the labor of the past three years. The charge made by the Call, that McCarthy was in secret consultation with Herrin's hired men, was not disproved.

If the reader can find in this analysis of the three claimants for mayorality honors anything to enable him to make intelligent choice he is welcome to avail himself of it. As for us, we find in the three candidacies nothing to appeal to moral impulses, nothing to inspire hope, nothing to stimulate enthusiasm. Like Paddy, we would "rather have a good breakfast in the stomach than whoever gains the day."

WHAT KIND OF REPUBLICAN?

The direct primary is projecting candidates for governor very early into the foreground. That is very well, providing it does not lead to a confusion of the issue by pretending there is no issue. It might as well be definitely understood now as then that next year will be no time for merely personal candidates for governor. It will not be sufficient for any candidate for governor merely to proclaim that he is "a Republican," and then adduce his personal qualifications. The question, What sort of a Republican? is going to be asked of every candidate, and it must be answered, or else the answer will be taken by default.

There are two sorts of Republicans, and there will be no patience or silence under the pretense that there is only one sort. There are machine Republicans and anti-machine Republicans, and only an anti-machine candidate running as such, will get the anti-machine vote at the primaries. There will be no machine candidate avowed as such, but there will be one or more candidates who notoriously represent the machine. No one can get the machine vote away from them, and any candidate who makes the blunder of a merely personal, ostensibly neutral candidacy, will find himself slaughtered between the two fires.

It is perhaps superfluous to analyze the so-called "machine vote." Most of it does not really belong to the machine. It consists of those numerous voters who imagine that the sole purpose of a party, in going into an election, is "to win," and who have observed, quite correctly, that the machine has been an extremely efficient tool to that end. It consists of the multitudes of the indifferent, who follow whoever takes the trouble to go in front. It consists of those other multitudes, whose ideals have never risen above the mediaeval standard of personal loyalty. By the judicious distribution of personal favors, the machine establishes a whole feudal system of personal obligations, which it capitalizes into votes and offices. These, the good, the bad, and the indifferent, are the private. The officers belong to the machine, because they find it profitable. One of them, perhaps two or three of them, will run for the nomination for governor. No man who runs, under that sponsorship, should expect any votes except what his sponsors can deliver to him. These will be a very small part of the existing machine votes, if the intelligent and patriotic but hitherto inert among them can be aroused to a realization of the situation. To arouse them, and all others to that situation is the supreme purpose of the primary campaign, and there will be no clouding the issue.

MEN AND HORSES.

San Francisco has this week witnessed two master parades, one of men and the other of horses. Both were industrially employed, both make their livings by labor and both are dependent upon someone else to furnish them with work that they may get a living. Splendid men, splendid horses. The beer barrels many horses hauled were not as inspiring.

There are those who would like to carry the parallelism farther. A horse is worth what he can be had for. So, according to the Harri-man philosophy, is a man. The man is entitled to all he can get, the employer to get him for as little as he may.

The horse has some advantages. Most owners of horses are sufficiently prudent to refrain from using their horses up before they reach what should be their prime. Most large employers of men crack them through with the view of getting out of them as much as they can as quickly as they can and then turning them adrift to hunt more poorly paying jobs elsewhere. The great corporations have little use for a man of fifty. The reason for this discrimination in favor of the horse is that he has to be purchased all at once, while the man is bought on the instalment plan, a day or a week at a time.

The law has, it is true, been called upon to intervene in the case of the horse for the prevention of cruelty, while the man may contract away his immunity from cruel treatment if he will, and the employer generally insists that the man shall "preserve his freedom to contract" though he lose all else.

The employer is boss of the horse and wants to be boss of the man. If a horse does not suit him there is a free market in which to dispose of him and buy another, and, for the life of him the average employer cannot see why he should not get men in as free a market as he buys and sells horses. Is not labor a commodity?

Those two thousand horses were well groomed, well fed and well content with their lot. It was to the interests of their masters to have them so, for so they would serve them longer and better and prove the more profitable as an investment. The twenty-five thousand men were well groomed and well fed also, but they had fought for that as the horses had not. It is a painful admission to make, but not one upward step has been taken by labor that was not fought for, and fought for hard, because resistance against it was hard. While self interest tends always to make the condition of the horse better, that his life of usefulness may be prolonged, self interest on the part of the employer has made him fight every progressive step that labor would take. Scarcely one device for saving life and limb of the employed, preserving his health or morals, has been adopted without the command of the law or the open warfare of laborers and their friends. The cry for dividends has drowned the cry for justice. There are some advantages in being a horse.

But the horse is not a living soul! The man is, the workman as certainly as the employer. Neither employer nor employed appreciates this fact to the full. The employer too often thinks of labor as a commodity. The employed too often restrict the sentiment of brotherhood to their fellows among the employed, whereas, in truth, both employers and employed are brothers in one humankind.

The two thousand horses which paraded the streets of San Francisco Thursday meant nothing to the other horses of the city, but the twenty-five thousand men who paraded the streets on Monday meant everything to all the rest of the workers in the city. They meant as much to the stay-at-homes as the union soldiers, who went to the Civil War, meant to the stay-at-homes in that crucial trial of the nation for its life. They are fighting battles for the good of all who work with their hands.

We fear much more of the tyranny of labor than of the tyranny of capital, because it is a newer thing. Capital has been tyrannous so long that tyranny at its hands is accepted as a matter of course, while labor has only lately dared to look its employers in the eye without cringing, and, like other persons who have newly found their liberties, it has found them often to abuse them.

The "scab" is the person who wants his share of the victory without doing his share of the fighting. He wants the shelter of the industrial umbrella without supporting any of its burden, but he does not deserve to be killed and he must not be bludgeoned into doing his part. As God Almighty does not compel any soul to be saved, so unionism cannot compel any unwilling person to become a unionist without tyranny, and what cannot be done without tyranny must not be done at all. Everything to persuasion, nothing at all to compulsion.

When organized labor forgets this it forgets its own best interests and loses ground. When organized capital forgets this truth it forgets its own highest interests and makes enemies as implacable as itself. There are grounds for hoping for better relations between capital and labor than we have known, but the degree of progress will be measured by the ability of organized capital to humanize its attitude toward men as it has humanized it toward horses. Organized labor, being better drilled in thinking out hard problems, and less oppressed with a dreary Bourgeoisism, will be ready to meet capital more than half way in every upward movement.

This talk of dismembering the state because it has been equalized, even dubiously, will come to nothing. The wound will feel so much better after it is done hurting that the wounded will be glad of the hurt.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

There is a man in this state who might have had almost any position of honor or profit within the gift of a grateful people if, as child, boy and young man, he had not been mentally more acute than any of his fellows. By reason of his greater mental dexterity he was able to "fool" them all and, inasmuch as he could not resist the temptation to fool them, he became thoroughly insincere, untrustworthy and discredited. He possesses some notoriety but no renown.

There is in this state an orator, a man of splendid physique, fine abilities, and, but for one thing, he would be now, in reasonable likelihood, have reflected credit upon this or some other commonwealth in the United States Senate where he could easily have made himself among the foremost in debate and very likely in statesmanship. He, too, has more of notoriety than of renown, and the honors that have come to him have been few and not very important. All for the reason that he attached himself to the selfishly powerful, and loaded to their interest under the mistaken impression that his bread would get the most butter on that side.

There was a politician in another state having great powers. He had a brain fertile in resources, possessed that subtle quality known as magnetism, enjoyed the gift of leadership and, allying himself with every unhealthful element in the public life, was, for a term of years, politically invincible. But he had his day, his power was by and by broken and with it his spirit and he became a "has been." In bitterness he decry in a speech: "They have called me everything except a fool," whereat a newspaper writer retorted: "They saved that for you to call yourself for not having been honest, sincere and true to the common interest."

And what a fool he was, to be sure! And what fools these other men referred to have proven, in that they have not stood, stanch and strong for what they knew to be right! It is with integrity, or the want of it, something as it is with profanity. Of all men who can least be excused for employing profanity we must designate those to whom heaven gave a fluency of speech, an ability to express themselves adequately. What need have they for profanity? With one who emits words with travail a few round oaths may go far in facilitating expression and if this be not excuse enough, as it is not, at least it must be held a mitigating circumstance.

That there are tricksters who do get on and/or forces us to admit, but scarcely one in a thousand of them falls of being known for the trickster he is, and the publicity of that knowledge should make a self-respecting person miserable the rest of his days.

Therefore, young friend, if you do find that you are smarter than others, and that you can make that seem to be true which you know is not true, and so beguile your associates or the people at large, put that temptation behind you as you would flee from the wrath to come. There are a thousand chances to one that the trick will do you more harm than it will do anyone else and it may send you to your grave a disappointed and embittered soul.

Per contra, there is no grace like that of sincerity, that sincerity which makes one as open as all out-of-doors, transparent as the sunlight, true as the ethereal blue. Many a man of mediocre abilities has capitalized frankness, with courtesy, and made it the stepping stone to fame and fortune. He may come to be known as "Old Reliable," and his friends may wish that, for his own sake, he could now and then dissemble, just a little, in the name of tact perhaps, and yet he goes right onward and upward, gaining new friends and holding the old ones more closely because, as the world expresses it, "he will do to tie to." The person who, as boy, youth and man, will do to tie to somehow never yet became a mere hitching post.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Man's Progress Toward the Pole.

Now that two American explorers—Cook and Peary—are reported to have reached the north pole, it is of interest to note the slow and painful steps in that direction which have been taken during, say, the last two decades. It was during 1892 that Robert E. Peary, one of the two men who have stood on the north end of the world, charted the northern coast of Greenland, thus making a known region of a theretofore terra incognita. Three years later, or in 1895, Dr. Fridtjof Nansen of Norway, with one companion, reached latitude 85 degrees and 14 minutes. In July, 1897, Salomon-Auguste Andree demonstrated that the trade winds blow to the pole by traveling 200 miles due north of Spitzbergen in a spherical balloon. In 1900 the duke of Abruzzi attained latitude 86 degrees, 33 minutes and 49 seconds, or 19 minutes and 33 seconds beyond the farthest point reached by Nansen. In 1903-06 Captain Roald Amundsen, of Norway, discovered and passed through the northwest passage in the Gjoa, now in Golden Gate park, San Francisco, and in 1905 he established the location of the magnetic pole. In 1906 Robert E. Peary discovered fertile land, on which flowers were growing, in an island which he found north-west of Grant Land, and in the same year he reached latitude 87 degree and 6 minutes, or 32 minutes and 11 seconds beyond the duke of Abruzzi's utmost point. Thus slowly—not to speak of expeditions farther back in the past—have we progressed to double possession of the pole.

Ashes of the Buddha Found.

An event of unusual interest to all civilized mankind is the alleged finding of a portion of the ashes of Gautama, the Buddha, by Dr. Spooner of the Indian archaeological department. For some time past the doctor has been excavating on the site of the Emperor Kanishka's great pagoda, near Peshawar, and there he has made his discovery. From a casket of rock crystal, which was found beneath a bronze casket, were taken three small pieces of charred human bone, and the seal of the casket, as well as various inscriptions, are supposed to indicate that these bones were of the ashes of Buddha. It long has been established that Buddha's body was burned, and the ashes distributed among eight claimants—this nearly twenty-four centuries ago. Is it one of these allotments which Dr. Spooner has discovered? There does not appear to be much doubt of it. At any rate, so eminent an authority as L. D. Barnett, head of the department of Oriental books and manuscripts in the British museum, says that there is no reason to doubt the genuineness of the discovery.

"The Beneficence of Swearing."

Probably the quaintest, not to say the most absurd, theory recently aired in public is that of a doctor who, in a recent issue of the London Mirror, advocates swearing as a preventive of disease. According to this savant, there is a profound reason for the cursing habit, as it acts as a safety valve for the rending emotions. When a man is annoyed, the doctor says, he starts to produce superfluous mental and physical energy, and, if he does not rid himself of it by smashing things and swearing, blood poisoning follows and he does not recover from it for a day or two. Moreover, he continues, resolute suppression of temper puts a serious strain on the brain. The direct inference from all this is that he who ruleth his own spirit is not better than he that taketh a city, and that the foul-mouthed blasphemer is the wise man. The whole thing sounds farcical, and must be considered so, and yet it is said that the theory is being discussed with more or less solemnity. Verily, when little man is at his theories, he sometimes also is at his funniest.

Big Warships for Little Brown Men.

Japan certainly shows a tendency toward "going some." The government of that island empire has announced its intention to build cruisers of 36,000 tons each. Now bear in mind that the British Dreadnaught is a vessel of but 17,900 tons burden, and it will be realized that the little brown men are aiming high in the field of warlike competition. Moreover, the superdreadnaughts are vessels of 20,000 tons or less, while the British invincible class of cruisers are of but 12,750 tons. Uncle Sam has been talking of building a war vessel of 25,000 tons, and he flattered himself that that would be pretty hard to beat. And now comes this small brown person and raises his highest by 11,000 tons! And this from a party who barely was on the world's map two decades ago! It is hard to realize. A 36,000-ton cruiser would be larger than any vessel now afloat except the Lusitania and Mauretania. The fact that Japan is hard up financially does not appear to be interfering largely with her world-wide plans.

Growth of Church Membership.

Whatever may be the fact in relation to church attendance in the United States—and some doloed reflections upon the situation in this respect have been heard—it is a fact that church membership is increasing more rapidly than is our population. This assertion is made upon the highest authority, that of the United States census bureau, which, in a recently issued summary, compares the church membership according to its census of 1906 with that of its census of 1890. In these sixteen years the total church membership has increased from 20,597,954 to 32,936,445, or 60.4 per cent. The increase in Protestant membership has been from 14,007,187 to 20,287,742, or 44.8 per cent.; in Roman Catholic membership from 6,241,708 to 12,079,142, or 93.5 per cent. In this connection it should be said that, as the Catholics include all baptised infants, while the Protestant membership is mostly adult, the census bureau has deducted 15 per cent. from the returns made by the former in order to equalize the returns as nearly as possible. In 1890 32.7 per cent. of the population were church members; in 1906 the percentage had increased to 39.1, a gain of 6.4 per cent., of which 4.4 per cent. was Roman Catholic and 1.8 per cent. was Protestant. In sixteen states and territories the Roman Catholic church population is in the majority. These states and territories, with the percentage of Roman Catholics to their entire church population, are the following: New Mexico, 88.7; Rhode Island, 74; Montana, 73.1; Massachusetts, 69.2; Nevada, 66.7; Arizona, 66.2; New York, 63.6; New Hampshire, 63; Louisiana, 61.3; Connecticut, 59.6; California, 58; Vermont, 55.9; Maine, 53.3; New Jersey, 51.5; Wisconsin, 50.5; Michigan, 50.1. Roman Catholics also outnumber Protestants in Colorado and Wyoming, although having less than a majority of all church members. During these sixteen years the membership of the Church of Christ, scientist, increased from 8,724 to 85,717, or nearly tenfold. The total church membership of the country is 43.1 male and 56.9 per cent. female.

Depletion of Our Forests.

Heretofore, in this department, has been considered the rapid depletion of the forests of the United States, a depletion which threatens us with a lumber famine in a not distant future, but certain facts brought to the attention of the public by the forest service are entitled to further consideration. For instance, says the service, white pine, which once was considered practically inexhaustible, has fallen off 70 per cent. in cut since 1890, and more than 45 per cent. since 1900. The cut of the most valuable hardwood lumber has decreased 16 per cent., and that of yellow poplar 22 per cent., and these are but samples of a general trend. We have become careless with our timber, and how largely so is indicated by the fact that we take 250 cubic feet of wood per capita annually, while Germany uses only thirty-seven cubic feet and France but twenty-five. Moreover, the Germans and French see to it that theirs is replaced by new growth, while we do not. It certainly is full time that a halt were called, and, as the forest service says, "to reach the necessary condition of equilibrium between timber production and consumption will take many years of vigorous effort by individual forest owners, by the states, and by the national government."

Widespread Posts of the Grand Army.

Although Time is working his will with the survivors of the civil war, and they are but thinning ranks of veterans who gather about the camps of the Grand Army of the Republic, the posts of that organization to-day are more widespread than they ever before have been. Quite recently, at Oldham, in Lancashire, England, where twenty former union soldiers reside, a post was organized.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "craft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Perry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a square deal plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

WILLIAM WINTER'S RESIGNATION.

His Statement of the Cause.

William Winter, the Grand Old Man of American dramatic criticism, has resigned from the staff of the New York Tribune after nearly forty-four years of continuous service. The public has been made aware of the fact that his resignation was due to friction with Hart Lyman, acting editor of the Tribune in the absence of Whitelaw Reid. Mr. Winter's own statement of the causes of that resignation appears below in the form of a letter to Mr. Lyman. If his statement is not so greatly charged with personal feeling as to give a wrong coloring to the facts, those facts are a reproach to modern journalism and a blot on the fame of the Tribune that would make Horace Greeley turn in his grave. They indicate, furthermore, that the commercialization of dramatic criticism is now practically complete.

But whatever the merits of the dispute, with Mr. Winter's resignation comes the passing from a position of unparalleled independence and influence of the shrewdest, most idealistic and the best all-around dramatic critic America has produced in two generations. Mr. Winter has venerated the art of acting as few men have done. He has done a vast deal to dignify it as a calling and to raise it to its just respect in the public mind as one of the nobler fine arts. A great career is coming to a close. The pity is that it should be embittered at the end by a dispute with an unimportant nobody who happens to be for the moment the chief functionary on the Tribune.

Mr. Winter's letter to Mr. Lyman is, in part, as follows:

Since July, 1865, up to about two years ago, I opposed and denounced in the Tribune every bad, vulgar, indecent play, and every person and every proceeding in the theatrical world injurious (in my opinion) to the public welfare. In doing so I not only did not incur censure from the editor, but I was often encouraged and sustained in that, obviously, right course.

About two years ago there came a change. Many articles of mine, dealing with manifest abuses in the theater, have been, within that time, rejected altogether. Many others (some of the same kind; some containing critical condemnation of plays) have been cut or modified in important passages.

In protesting against that injustice I wrote to your managing editor, Mr. Brown, January 17, 1909.

"My articles, relative to indecent and therefore reprehensible plays have been, and are, framed for the purpose of doing as much injury to the business of the persons exploiting them as is possible; of informing respectable persons of what is going on in the theater, and of keeping as many readers as possible away from obnoxious and injurious plays."

In reply to that letter your managing editor wrote (January 20):

"In making the decision which I did I acted under instructions in the carrying out of a distinct and unmistakable policy, laid out for me by Mr. Lyman. . . . I might have gone much further than I did in literally complying with my instructions. . . . Your policy of placing, on the Sunday theatrical page, beside our theatrical advertisements, matter 'framed for the purpose of doing as much injury as possible to the business' of some of our advertisers (business, that is, of advertisers of indecent and therefore reprehensible plays), may or may not be the right one, and the publication of such articles may or may not be the duty of the journalist to society. I do not attempt to decide the question. All I say is that my instructions with regard to that page are that the articles are not to be framed with any such purpose, and the excisions which I strike are in accordance with the necessary accordance with those instructions."

That appears to be as explicit a statement as the English language can be made to convey. On January 26, you, referring to the same articles and to my protest, wrote to me: "I have a duty to this paper, which I must discharge according to my own judgment and conscience, however fallible. . . . It is my opinion that the theatrical news published on Sunday should not be condemnatory. . . . That a play is well attended, that there has, or has not, been a change in the cast, etc.—these are facts which can be properly stated, whether the play is good or bad, and the paper does not demean itself or do an injustice to its readers when it records them, and does no more."

I am not a reporter; that is one reason why I declined to write such "notices." I told you then, and I repeat now, that it is my explicit belief that plays of the kind specified by me should never be mentioned except with condemnation, and in such a way as will arouse and stimulate public contempt for persons who are responsible for their production. In my judgment the Tribune does demean itself whenever it mentions such plays, or their producers, in any other spirit.

I have never questioned your technical right to cut or reject any, or all, writing offered by me to the Tribune. To allow me freedom of expression on week days, when the circulation of the Tribune is small, and to forbid anything condemnatory on the Sunday page, when the circulation is much larger, marked a vital change in policy, and practically took the dramatic department out of my hands. The one thing I now regret is that I did not resign my position instantly upon receipt of your letter of January 26.

Californian Poets' Corner

This tender poem by Mrs. Mary H. Field has long been a favorite with those who know it. Some time ago, I received it, making the first and last lines rhyme as well as the second and fourth, in each stanza, but the original version seems to us the best, and we give it in preference to the other.

MOTHERHOOD.

By Mary H. Field.

Far, far away, across a troubled sea

My wistful eyes espy

The quiver of a little snowy sail,

Unfurled against the sky.

So faint, so far, so veiled in soft obscure

Its quiet shimmering.

Sometimes methinks no mortal thing it is,

But gleam of angel's wing.

And yet the currents of my life so set

Towards this vision fair.

I know, I know for me it pales and glows;

It will not fade in air.

With my own heart-throbs, throbs the tiny sail.

My sighs its pennons move;

And hither steadfast points its magnet towards

The pole star of my love.

What precious gifts do freight this mystic bark

There is no sign to show;

What frail, small mariner is there enshrined

No mortal yet may know.

I only know the soul divine moves there,

'Mid two eternities;

Before the secret of the Lord I bow

With veiled and reverent eyes.

And vainly does my restless love essay

To haste the coming sail;

Dear God! Not even to save from sunken

Can love of mine avail.

Yet, will I keep my vigil, and in peace,

Like Mary, "dwell apart"

Close to the mysteries of God art thou,

My brooding mother heart.

Ah, heavenly sweet will be thy recompense,

When, every fear at rest,

The little bark all tranquilly shall lie

Safe anchored on thy breast!

PERSONALIA.

A revival of the play made out of Bret Harte's "Miss" is planned for the autumn, with Nellie McHenry in the title part.

Sir Arthur Pinero has completed his new play, "Milk and Honey," which will be produced in this country, with Miss Ethel Barrymore in the principal woman's part.

Miss Mabel Taliaferro, the very popular actress wife of Frederic Thompson, will hereafter be featured on the stage by only one name—Nell, not Nell Taliaferro, but just Nell.

Frank A. Vanderlip, once newspaper man, later secretary of the treasury, and now a New York bank president and society man, has adopted Mark Twain's style of white evening clothes.

David Belasco, after many experiments with the male kind, has engaged a woman press agent. She is Miss Dorothy Richardson, for eight years a member of the staff of the New York Herald.

Charles Klein is now working on the third of a cycle of plays dealing with problems of present-day interest. The first two plays of the series, already produced, are "The Lion and the Mouse" and "The Third Degree."

Mark Twain's new country home near Redding, Conn., is modeled largely after a famous Florentine villa, La Cafoncella, in which he and his family lived while Mrs. Clemens was in search of health in Italy. This villa is now occupied by Gabriele d'Annunzio, the Italian dramatist.

George Lincoln Walton, M. D., is the latest of the Woods Hutchinson type of doctors who are popularizing medical knowledge. Dr. Walton has a gift for selecting titles for his books that challenge attention, such as "Character-Leave," "Why Worry?" and "Those Nerves."

Booth Tarkington and Harry Leon Wilson, joint author of "Cameo Kirby" and "The Man from Home," will see four of their plays staged before November 1st. These are "Foreign Exchange," "If I Had Money," "Springtime," and "Your Humble Servant." Ouis Skinner will appear in the last-named play.

The story by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, which the Harpers are to issue this month, will be called "Jonathan and David." It is a village story, with an old man's gentle character, a dog's devotion, and a woman's sympathy for the governing motives. A novel with no dog in it would hardly be characteristic of Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.

Miss Carolyn Wells, when about to begin a new book, buys a five-pound box of chocolates and a pint of ink. When she has used up the pint of ink and eaten all the chocolates she knows that her manuscript is long enough. She then packs the manuscript in the empty chocolate box and mails it to her publishers. At least, all this is the story that Harpers' press agent tells.

S. R. Crockett, who with his "Stickit Minister" followed J. M. Barrie so closely into fame as a leader of the "kall yard movement," has written little of late, but he has now a new novel ready which the Harpers will publish soon. It is called "The Men of the Mountain," and is a tale of the Swiss mountains and neighboring regions in the darkest days of the Franco-Prussian war.

Mr. Clemenceau has spent a good part of his life in journalism, so that there is nothing mysterious to explain in the fact that he had offers from five important Paris journals within forty-eight hours after his fall as premier. His case is the most notable one on record of a journalist showing great ability to govern a country as well as to advise others how to run it.

A TRIUMPH OF PERSONALITY

THE UPLIFTING INFLUENCE OF MISS BRIGGS' WORK.

Many a reader who was reared in the country or in a small town will recall some one family in the neighborhood around which centered the most enjoyable social life and from which radiated the strongest influences for better things. The neighbors all looked to this family for leadership. They brought to it their perplexities, their weaknesses, and their sorrows. Usually that family centered around a woman who had the time, the force of character, the skill in housewifery, and the imagination to project her interests beyond her own home after the demands of that home were fully met.

The reader who recalls such a character will remember the influence that such a woman had. By her tact, she was able to dispense charity without touching the tender self-respect of spirited people in misfortune. By her intimate acquaintance with every person in her community, she was able to obtain a more harmonious social life among her neighbors. Because of the affection and respect with which she was regarded, she was able powerfully to influence the boys and girls who frequented her home, in morals and in directing their studies for their life-work.

Then imagine this woman in a large modern city, trying to make herself useful, in a similar way, with the difficulties presented by a dense population in which the lines of race and wealth and social class are sharply drawn. Instantly she loses her most effective weapon, the intimate personal acquaintanceship by which she formerly inspired respect and confidence. If you would realize how completely this type of woman has been routed by the conditions of modern industrial cities, look at the character of the channels through which the gentler acts of life are performed in cities. These channels are "institutions," founded on the example of old industrial institutions, in which an exact "system" provides for handling large charitable works as the executive of a great business handles a large commercial mechanism. These institutions do a great service in the cause of humanity. They lack one thing, the intimate personal touch of the woman first spoken of in this article.

And this is not a small thing. It is vital. Institutions can and do relieve immediate wants and supply immediate deficiencies. But an institution cannot and does not become a member of the community in any such way as to be a force for moral building up. It can never be near enough a human being for that purpose.

All this long introduction leads up to the work of the Nurses' Settlement in the Potrero district of San Francisco. It is something new in "settlement" work. Ask a resident of the Potrero where the Nurses' Settlement is, and he will probably shake his head. Ask him where you can find Miss Briggs, or Miss Haggerty, or Miss O'Connor, and he will direct you at once.

That illustrates the difference. Miss Briggs and her assistants have a home at Iowa and Nineteenth Streets, where they actually live—cook their own meals, do their own housework, sweep their own rooms, eat, work, and sleep—and keep open house to their friends and neighbors, the inhabitants of the Potrero. Each of these women is a trained nurse, each is at the call of any person in the district, at any hour of the day or night, for any useful service they can perform for their neighbors, from nursing a mother at childbirth to getting a job for one of the men out of work.

These women know practically every man, woman, and child in the Potrero. They know them not merely by sight; they know Mrs. Smith's personal peculiarities, and Mrs. Jones's dislike for the Russians, and Mr. Johnson's weakness for whiskey. The chances are good that one or another of them has seen one of the children through scarlet fever or nursed the man of the house through a seize with a broken back, or, in some desperate case, literally bossed the house-keeping and finances of a whole family during a period of stress when sickness and lack of work had broken the executive nerve of them all.

Miss Briggs has lived amongst working people for twelve years, as she now lives amongst them in the Potrero—nine years in Tehama Street and three years at her present home. In that time she has made 16,000 calls as a nurse. That fact alone means that she has had a wonderful training in dealing with people who labor. It means the possession of an understanding of their point of view, of their household economy, of their ambitions and their needs. If any one could be useful in helping these people to a higher plane of morality and a higher usefulness, surely such an equipment should make her that one.

She has chosen, as the best means of attaining these ends, the making of a home amongst working people, where any woman or man is made as cordially welcome to call as sincerity could make them. By her work, and that of her assistants, as nurses, she has inspired that confidence and respect and personal intimacy with her neighbors by which the exceptional woman of the country town made herself a powerful influence in the community.

The result is, that the residents of the Potrero have come to look to Miss Briggs for guidance in a thousand and one ways in the emergencies of life. They bring her their sicknesses, they look to her to relieve distress, she arbitrates family and neighborhood disputes where tact and a Christian spirit can prevail to heal the breach.

In other ways her influence is potent for better things. She saw certain deficiencies in the life of the neighborhood. There was no free library. She organized a neighborhood women's club, and pointed out to them that lack. The club asked for a sub-station library, and got it from the city, the club paying part of the expense. Miss Haggerty pointed out to her that the foreigners in the district were unable to get work because they could not speak English. Miss Briggs pointed out this condition to the club, and the club got the board of education to start a night school for foreigners. This suggested the necessity of a night school for American children. The club obtained this. Park facilities are needed in the Potrero. At Miss Briggs' suggestion, the women's club called a mass-meeting of the men, which resulted in the formation of the Potrero Promotion Club, which will, in time, undoubtedly get, not only a park, but other civic advantages for the district. The settlement maintains a free kindergarten.

The settlement is not an institution, although, since the fire, it has incorporated. It has no regular fund for its maintenance. It is simply the home of four unselfish trained nurses to whom people who have become interested in their work, from time to time entrust the expenditure of money for the betterment of the nurses' friends, their neighbors of the Potrero. It is a family, consecrated to the work of doing whatever they can to be useful to these neighbors. It is a centre of personality from which radiates the influence of an example of unselfishness and workday helpfulness to a working people.

This work is hampered by a lack of funds. More nurses could be employed if the money were available to pay them. A social hall could be built, if a few thousand dollars were to be had, in which the social life of all the young people of the district could be centred and so wholesome that the depraving influences of the public dance halls and cheap amusement places would be neutralized. Any one who wants to be a factor in the development of a better life for a large share of the population of San Francisco could do no better than

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The Automobile Ride.

The vine-clad cots of Stoughtonville were smiling to the sun
When William J. Bloxam told his wife he guessed they'd take a run;
So Mrs. Bloxam donned her hat, with hair to match its shade,
And Bloxam got his auto out. The gentle zephyrs played
As down the valleys the auto ran, a thing of life and glee,
And Bloxam said, "Now this is great!" and madam said, "Te-hee!"
And swift they flew, and glad they flew, along an airy track—
But, oh, it was so different when they went limping back!

So fast they flew, as flies a bird that seeks its waiting mate,
That scarce it seemed their equipage could for its shadow wait.
Ten miles from home, another mile, another still, and then
The auto gave a dying gasp and never moved again.
Oh, drip of tears, and haunting fears, and woe we cannot rout,
How spoke you all in Bloxam's words, "The gasoline's give out!"
Still shone the sun, and laughed the world, but, oh, alas! alack!
It was so very different when they went limping back!

Ten weary miles, twelve weary miles, ('twas even more, they said)
And every mile was salted down with tears the lady shed,
And every mile seemed all ablaze with words that Bloxam spoke.
Yet sang the wind, and every song was as a taunting croak;
Still shone the sun—yet bet it shone, the skies a fiery blur!
And sometimes Mrs. Bloxam walked, sometimes he carried her.
His friends all cried: "How's walking, Bill?"
Ah, gay the outward track—
But, oh, it was so different when they went limping back!

Probably a Clear Case.

"The court decided that he had paresis."
"On what grounds?"
"Oh, sufficient."
"Yes, but what were they?"
"Well, if you must know, it was proved that he lent me money."

An Invitation Respectfully Declined.

"Let the skeptics who disbelieve my story go to the North Pole."—Dr. F. A. Cook, in an interview.

Dear Doctor:

I am writing this Brief note of declination
To breathe the elements that I cannot Accept your invitation.
My winter overcoat's in pawn—
'Tis an unpleasant topic—
And I have heard the polio dawn
Is really none too tropic.

I hear the walking 'round the Pole
At times is far from pleasant,
And, as my shoes are thin of sole,
I cannot go at present.

It must be nice a pole to find,
Whate'er the effort cost one,
And yet I'd fain be left behind,
For I have never lost one.

Yet your expression, I admit,
Is full of good suggestion;
If wicked men gave heed to it
'Twere well, beyond a question.
For oft such men bad language throw
That shocks and pains the ladies,
And better "To the North Pole go!"
Than sinful, "Go to hades!"

The Opinions of Rufus.

I b'lieve that energy an' persistence orto be praised—but with some limits. Frinstance, the gigler showed he had 'em when he broke into the bank vault.

The devil got tired an' didn't want to work one day, so he tossed a lot of dollars into the world. "There," he says, with a restful sigh, "my business 'll be tended to all right." And I've never heered that he had to complain that it wan't.

I don't b'lieve that goin' to church hurts any man, but I've knowed some cases where I thought p'raps it strained the church a leetle.

Es I understand it, after listenin' to sev'el arguments, the reason saloon-keepers are opposed to prohibition is because it don't prohibit. It wrenches their hearts to feel that it might fail.

They's one feller that I never try to convert to the wimmen-suffrage idee, fer I've found out it's useless. He's the chap that has a dark suspishun that his wife knows more'n he does.

They's such a thing es bein' too kearful of a child. The oak that's stronger than God's winds ain't a hothouse plant.

I b'lieve it's every man's duty to vote first, an' then use a disinfectant afterwards.

I b'lieve in risin' with the lark—of the lark has been given chloroform or a good, strong opiate the night before.

I reckon that the predatory int'rests' demand to be left alone orto be complied with—say, by solitary confinement or somethin' like that.

The Automobile and the Airship.

The man with the receding forehead is out for a joy ride, and, to the throbbing of his mighty machine, is blithely cleaving the ambient atmosphere. (I do not know what the ambient atmosphere is, but poets almost uniformly use the expression, and so I follow no hesitation in doing so.) "Whoop!" says the joy-rider, "we're making sixty. Let's touch 'er up to seventy till we get to the next roadhouse!" At this psychological moment he runs into a wagon, and scatters Ezra Jones, his wife and seven beautiful children, in various stages of dissolution, over the sword. The wagon had no right to travel in the road, and so the chauffeur pulls the string that reverses the number of his machine, and hilariously chugs away.

"'Tis pitiful!" the people say, and they earnestly hope that the joy-rider will be caught and haled before some just and discerning magistrate, who will fine him fifteen dollars.

Sometimes, however, the man with the receding forehead miscalculates, and hurls himself, instead of Jones and family, into eternity. "This is undurable," the people say, and they mean it.

'Twill be different in the use and abuse of the airship. To be sure, its manipulator occasionally may drop a sack of ballast on your head and cause you to be carried to the hospital when you are least able to pay for the operation of removing your vermiform appendix which the doctor will consider essential to your salvation; but the fields are broad, and your chance of being hit is proportionately reduced. 'Tis not the same with the aviator. "Oh!" he will cry, "let's speed 'er up!" Then the incubator will buckle, the foldase will sidetrack and collide with the pollihinkus, there will be a sickening thud, and it will take several days to pick up all of the air-irider.

This is the difference that I foresee between joy-riding on the earth and in the clouds. The former too frequently kills the wrong person; the latter rarely will. Therefore, brethren and sisters, let us welcome the aviation which will divorce some fools from the automobile. Occasionally it may be hard on the aerial joy-rider, but it will be a great deal easier on the individual who feels a hesitancy about becoming mixed with a hilarity-buggy of either the heavens above, the earth beneath or the waters under the earth.

A Talk With Lyncurgus.

It is a fairly safe proposition, my Lyncurgus, that the world will not be ridden to death to gratify the selfish pleasure of any man. He may wish to spit it for a time, quite regardless of the feelings which it expresses in laws, but sooner or later it is likely to rebel against the goading, buck and kick, and leave its rider lying on very rocky ground.

The case of William J. Bradbury is in point. He is that thing of general envy, a millionaire, and much of his million, more or less, of dollars was made in ruthless disregard of the rights and feelings of others. He whipped and spurred the horse right mercilessly, and the horse bucked. Now, old, broken and despised, he toils behind the locked gates of a prison, and I would sooner be the humblest laborer who earns scanty living, yet allows some regard for his fellow-men to touch and glorify his life, than William J. Bradbury, millionaire. You feel the same, do you not? Then suppose you make a note that the privilege of goading the horse sometimes comes high.

Another instance: There is a man named Patrick Calhoun. He comes of a line of ancestry which should have made noblesse oblige the rule of his life, but somewhere in his veins—perhaps inherited from some nameless ancestor—was a current of off-colored blood which prompted him to hold dollars higher than honor. He stooped to criminality that he might be registered among financial magnates. His best friends do not deny it, although they dignify his bribery by the name of "hold-up," and so we need not hesitate to say it. In other words, Patrick Calhoun set at defiance the laws of mankind in furtherance of a selfish end. What has it cost him to goad the horse? Let us see. He may, or may not, go behind prison bars, but he has earned that which he has, the knowledge of that large proportion of Californians who feel no doubt that he belongs there. Thick-skinned though he be, the dread of what might be before him must have been as a constant nightmare to him, and that first $200,000 of bribe money has been followed by a senseless stream paid to lawyers, newspapers and others in an effort to avoid at least a part of the price. Ah, his goading of the horse in the interest of self has come high.

So, the man who runs might read the moral. There is such a thing as an over-reaching greed, a callous indifference to the rights of others which reacts. In the long run it pays to be regardless of the feelings and privileges of those about us. Goad the horse too much, and he bucks. Better have less than the more which is paid for in tears and misery. Does the proposition seem sound? Then govern your life accordingly.

Worry Is a Phantom.

Oh, I don't know why, and I can't say why. Though I guess that the good Lord knows, But I know it's true, as I sing to you,

That Worry is a phantom that goes.
We have worries to-day, then they go away,
And we wonder whence they came,
For the skies are bright with a tranquil light,
And life is a cheery game.
When a worry's dead, then its ghost is sped,
But a good deed's blessing stays
To give us light in the darkest night,
And its memory cheers our days.

Why Cook Discovered the Pole.

"Did you hear why Doctor Cook discovered the North Pole?"

"No; why was it?"
"He thought he had better. You see, he had been away from home all night the night before, and the night was six months long, and he knew he would have to tell his wife what he had been doing, and—are you a married man?"

"Yes."
"Well!"

HOW SHALL WE RECEIVE MR. TAFT?

THE EXAMPLE OF THE RECEPTION TENDERED MR. ROOSEVELT.

Last week, in referring to the forthcoming visit of President Taft, we called attention to some former receptions to visiting presidents in this state, and to the statement so often made that where there exists a warm feeling of welcome in the hearts of the people, that feeling usually finds expression somewhere. We referred to the great reception to General Grant, at the capital in 1879, and quoted Henry Edgerton's splendid address of welcome upon that occasion.

When President Roosevelt was the city's guest in 1903, a like outpouring of feeling greeted him on every hand. We give this week the address of welcome delivered by John F. Davis upon the occasion of the farewell banquet accorded the president by the Union League Club, at the old Palace Hotel, on the evening of May 14th. Here is another example of how the personality of the recipient inspired and dominated almost every sentiment.

President Roosevelt had been in San Francisco four days and was about to depart for the Yosemite. A citizen's banquet had already been given him in the same banquet-room upon the evening of his arrival four days before, the elaborate golden setting of which had been intended to be in every way emblematical of the golden wealth of California, and this was the allusion in the sly comparison of the rival color schemes of the two banquets contained in Judge Davis' address. As the president's visit was toward the end of his first term, before his triumphant renomination and re-election, the sentiment that in the clear vision of that evening political destiny was as manifest as political duty was prophetic. Is it possible that in these days of controversy concerning the conservation and control of national resources, there may be still a latent prophecy in the last line of the address?

JUDGE DAVIS' WELCOME TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

Mr. President: Words are feeble things in which to express the welcome to you that is in the mind and on the lips and in the heart of every man in this room.

Mr. Toastmaster, when the Union League Club of California welcomes the President of the United States it welcomes him, first of all, as an American. We who live upon the soil of California feel a more intense state pride than any other section of our favored land—more intense even than Massachusetts, New York, Virginia or Kentucky—yet when the call comes for volunteers in a war in the Orient, California is the first state to answer the summons and send to the Philippines the first California Volunteers. When you travel through this country you will find that in some places the bands play "Yankee Doodle," and in others "Dixie," in some places "My Maryland," and in others "Marching Through Georgia," but put them all to the touch, and every last man of them will play "The Star-Spangled Banner." And so it is, when we welcome the President of the republic to our hospitality, while we might have decorated our tables with the golden hue of our poppies and laden them with the gold of our mines and the golden oranges and the golden wine of our soil, the old paramount feeling of loyalty to the flag wells up from the depths of our heart of hearts, bursting all other bonds, and we garland our feast and make radiant our banquet-board with a gleaming glory of red, white and blue.

We greet our guest as the President of the nation—the of the republic in the zenith of its power. In honoring him we pay our tribute to the exalted office, than which there is none of greater dignity and, within the limit of its term, none of greater power on this earth. No other civil ruler holds his tenure under theegis of a constitution of checks and balances where, in practice as well as in theory, the sanction of the executive is equal to the sanction of the legislative power. In every constitutional monarchy the ministry depends for its tenure on the last vote of the last parliament, and no ruler dare more than once or twice at the risk of his crown resist that mandate. High as is the dignity of this great office, awful must be its responsibility; yet with such wisdom have the people exercised their choice that the proud boast of every American is that it is the only seat of power in the world's history that has never caused humanity to blush for the private life of any of its occupants.

And while our welcome is to our President, none the less earnestly it is extended to the man. We would make it impossible for him to say that he accepts our cheers simply as a tribute to the dignity of his high office. Beyond all that, we tell him that he is in the house of his friends, and we desire him to know it. We greet with gladness a President who personally knows that the United States

By THE WATCHMAN.

Work him off On to Congress

San Diego hardly knows what to do with Leroy Wright. The better element regards him as a thorough "organization" man, very subtle and keen, capable of donning the mask of an independent Republican the better to serve the organization interests at the crucial moment, as he did in regard to the direct primary law and the railroad regulation bill. They do not want him to go back to the state senate where he will prove dangerous, and, to keep him out of the senate, they are inclined to further his ambition to go to congress in S. C. Smith's place, thinking that he cannot do very much mischief there anyway and may do some good for San Diego. Wright has the congressional bee in his bonnet and can have the full strength of San Diego county if he wishes to make that fight. If, on the contrary, he makes a fight to go back to the state senate, the better element will see to it that he has all the fight he can attend to. He is a first-class explainer, and, if the people will let him tell it, he will square his record with the public interest and prove that he was the most effective enemy the Herrin organization had to contend with. Although at the tip end of the state, San Diego is not out of the world, and the status of Wright toward Herrinism is too well established in the state to leave San Diego in the dark regarding him. If he is returned to the senate it will be because San Diego people want to be governed by a railroad.

Some Herrin Idiosyncrasies

There are those who marvel that William F. Herrin should permit his own men, such as Lynch, Crimmins and Tim Sullivan, to whet their knives and go after each other's lives when there are many good men that they might be fighting, but how is Mr. Herrin to judge of the relative merits of his men-of-all except as they prove out on each other? Besides, a bit of rivalry, and a hearty scrap with one another, warms their hearts for taking the scalps of Herrin's political enemies. It is with the Big Boss as it was with Weyler in Cuba; by permitting his soldiers to accentuate the mortality of the reconcentrados by sniping, they warmed to the work of fighting Cubans in arms. That Lynch and Sullivan are making each other's fur fly no one can question, and the more of it that floats out upon the bay breeze the more delighted reputable persons will be. Moreover, if the Sullivan knife reaches the seat of biliousness in candidate McCarthy, and that of Lynch becomes imbedded in the political vitals of Crocker, what harm has the "organization" sustained? Is not McNamara's man Leland left to comfort the Big Boss? Finally, Mr. Herrin has been in Europe during the preliminary campaign, and when the cat is away the mice feel especially free to frolic. This much we can count on, Lynch is for McCarthy and Sullivan for Crocker. Who the Big Boss is for and, consequently, will get the controllable redlight and barroom vote, cannot definitely be known until a night or two before the election, though it is not likely that Lynch's man will be thrown down unless a fourth man, likely to prove dangerous to the worst of the bunch, is put up.

Same With Candidates As With the Bosses

Mr. Herrin does not always designate the winner in a scramble for nomination or election. Often he is sure of his man however the election goes, and, in such cases, it is good politics and good policy to let the boys fight it out in a fair field with no favors. As likely as not it may prove so regarding the pending scramble for Secretary of State. Mr. Herrin is not unlikely to say to Stafford, Hilborn, Jordan and Price, in effect: "You are any of you bad enough to suit me, go to it and may the worst man win." Unless, of course, some really reputable candidate for the office takes the field, in which case the Big Boss will take action very suddenly. That office is too important to the "organization" to allow it to fall into reputable hands if such an eventuality can be prevented. Its patronage leads that of any other state office except governor. Curry has not worked it up all these years to no purpose. There is little question that, with any one of the four persons above mentioned in the office of Secretary of State, this patronage would as certainly be used to advance the interests of the "organization" as it has been so used during the incumbency of Charles F. Curry.

While the people select many men who fail them at the crucial test and/or compels the admission that the "organization" men occasionally get fooled, too. No doubt Hardy, Herrin boss of San Diego, found it embarrassing to explain to the Big Boss how it was that Assemblyman Hinkle made a perfectly clean record in the last legislature, but he did. He was on the right side of things from beginning to end. Nor could the Herrin government have been more surprised at this than was the better element in San Diego. To this day the minds of clean citizens are haunted with the fear that there must be something up somebody's sleeve regarding it, some deep laid scheme, some bad reason for being good. Yet the record is fine nobody questions, but how came it so? Was not Hinkle always a Hardy man, and a very active one, and was he not nominated by "organization" influence and elected by "organization" votes? It is not well to be too suspicious. Of course a man will occasionally make a fine record in senate or assembly, as one. N. Gillett is known to have done, only to go over body and soul to the incorporated plutocracies at the crucial moment, but one seldom comes out of the "organization" camp to do a thing like that. The people of San Diego will do well to take Hinkle by his record. That record is unlike Leroy Wright's in that it does not need any explaining.

Something to Make A Good Laugh Come

A certain "Esquire," writing to the Los Angeles Times under the purloined penname of The Watchman, declares that Mr. Patrick Calhoun is not only not opposing the election of Francis J. Heney for district attorney but, so far as the city election interests him at all, he desires to see Heney elected. He wants an acquittal of the charge against him and wants it when Heney has done his worst. That, he thinks, will restore him to favor socially, financially and morally, in fact, will prove a complete vindication. Passing over the fact that nothing on earth can ever vindicate the reputation of Patrick Calhoun except his taking the stand and telling exactly what became of that $200,000, and proving that it was innocently used, the action of Calhoun's subsidized press and the activity of his next of financial kin speak louder than any words that Calhoun himself, or the "Esquire" watchman can utter. Not one man whom Calhoun or the hosts of Mammon in this city can influence will vote for Heney for district attorney or fail of working and voting against him. In fact, the whole Crocker, Leland, McCarthy primary election was engineered with a primary purpose of putting an end to the graft prosecutions by making it impossible for anyone to prosecute. A secondary purpose of at least two of the three campaigns was to open the way for some "good graft," for which there was been a positive hungering now these three years.

The South Was Caught Napping
Los Angeles has been making something of an uproar concerning the State Board of Equalization which has been expected to increase the assessment rolls of that and other southern counties. But if the southern portion of the state believes it has a grievance, why does it not reach forth and grasp an available remedy by securing more representation on the board? There are five members of the board, four being elected from districts and one (the controller) at large; but the fourth, or southern district, which includes all of the territory south of San Francisco and San Joaquin counties, is so populous that it casts not very far from as many votes as the other three districts combined. For example, take the vote cast last fall for justice of the supreme court; it aggregated 365,308 votes, of which 56,749 were cast in the First Equalization District, 72,647 in the second, 68,840 in the third, and 170,072 in the fourth. An average of the four was 91,327; so it may be seen that, on the basis of votes cast, the fourth district was pretty nearly entitled to two members of the board instead of one member.

How it All Came About

And here is a rather singular chapter of political history. It was by the constitution of 1879 that the State Board of Equalization was created, and at the time California had only four congressional districts. As an easy way of distributing the membership of the Board of Equalization it was provided that one member should be elected from each of the congressional districts as they then stood, although it might be supposed that the framers of the constitution knew the state would grow and would eventually be entitled to a larger number of congressmen. We now have eight congressional districts but the four elected equalizers still continue to be chosen from the districts as they were constituted in 1879. Not long after the constitution was adopted the justice of providing for a reapportionment of the equalization districts engaged attention, and in 1884 the constitution was so amended as to authorize the legislature to make a reapportionment. But it has never made it, and the strangest part of it all is that Los Angeles and the rest of the south appear never to have raised any clamor for the larger representation to which they are entitled. If they had clamored, and clamored long enough, the legislature would have given them what they asked for.

Victor Woods Not the Man

Now cometh Victor H. Woods, ex-Surveyor General of California, and announces himself a candidate for another term in that office. We say that he has done this, because we have read of it in the newspapers, and Mr. Woods has not arisen to challenge the statement, which seems to be in all respects probable. Now it is to be supposed that outside of the limited number of people who know Mr. Woods there is much interest in his personal political ambition; if that sort of ambition were all there is to it, Mr. Woods might be as good a plug as any other to fill the hole. But it is most probable that there is more to it. Mr. Woods held the office from 1903 to 1907, and during that time the Hydes and Bensons and the other land grabbers never appeared to be dissatisfied with the way in which the office was run; they had no occasion to be, because it was run in just the same way it had been for twenty or thirty years before. But since the beginning of 1907 the land grabbers have been filled with disgust at the manner in which the office has been managed, because Surveyor-General Kingsbury has been so inefficient as not to operate it in their interest. Naturally they want a change; they desire a return to the good old ways, and they do not expect to secure this if Kingsbury remains in. The question is, are they backing Victor H. Woods in his efforts against the office of the "organization," slipped up on Kingsbury and that is why Kingsbury should be retained and Woods turned down.

Extradition Was The Object in View One of the best known writers for the San Francisco press, writing over his own name, recently made sarcastic reference to the last California legislature because it enacted a code amendment making wife desertion a felony, although most of us will be inclined to think that if the legislature never passes a worse law than that it will be entitled to be called blessed. What is the derided statute? Merely a provision that if a husband who is able to support his wife shall desert her (such desertion not being due to conduct on her part which would justify it) and fail to supply her with food, shelter and other necessities, he shall be guilty of felony and upon conviction he shall be punished by confinement in state prison or in county jail for not more than two years. Similar desertion of a minor child has long been a punishable offense, but it was not until 1907, if we recollect rightly, that the legislature recognized that he was equally base and criminal to desert a wife; at that time the offense was made a misdemeanor merely. In 1907 the grade of the offense was raised to a felony, and it was done at the request of some of our leading charity workers, who had seen so much misery caused by heartless desertion of wives by brutal husbands that they realized the need of severer penalties. The particular point made by the newspaper critic is that the law cannot be enforced, since, he says, deserting husbands will flee to other states, which will not return the fugitives because wife desertion in such states is not a felony. But this argument exposes a misunderstanding of the law of extradition; the question is not what is a crime under the laws of the state which is asked to extradite a fugitive from another state; it is purely a question of what is a crime under the laws of the demanding state, and since wife desertion is a crime when committed in California, it follows that we can secure the return of persons committing this crime when they flee to other states.

The Whirlwind Candidate Judging by the Not the Man Wanted latest announcements of prospective candidates for the office of secretary of state, the notion still prevails that the office in question is mainly a clerical one and that any competent clerk ought to be qualified to fill it. We infer this from the calibre of the candidates offering themselves. The California Weekly has already endeavored to make it clear that while a great many clerks are employed in the office of the secretary of state, the head of the department is something vastly different from a clerk; that he is one of the two or three most important officers of the state government—perhaps only second in importance to the governor. This is so true that it will justify us in saying it all over again. Through his membership of the board of examiners, the lunacy commission, the forestry board and other commissions, the Secretary of State becomes a large factor in the government of the commonwealth, and according as he is able, independent and honest, or weak and time-serving, the state is helped or is injured. Judgment and character are the qualities needed in a secretary of state, and the people should select him with as much care as they would exercise in choosing a governor. If during the next few months the reader of this paragraph should chance to encounter, as he well may, a wild sort of harlequin going about making what he calls a "whirlwind campaign" for secretary of state, and soliciting votes in a manner which would better befit a candidate for constable, let him (the reader) pause and ask whether that is the guise in which the character and judgment of a statesman are most apt to reveal themselves.

No Fourth Man For Mayoralty

The local situation in San Francisco is no less confused than it was a week ago. The Good Government League has made strenuous efforts to decide whether or not it shall put a fourth candidate for mayor into the field. Everything indicates that it will not do so. Walter MacArthur has definitely refused to run, on the ground that his candidacy might confuse the Heney issue and offend Heney Democrats, Heney Republicans and Heney Union Labor voters, with the result that Heney would lose votes.

McNab's Hope of a New Machine

It is just possible that the Good Government League will be convinced by Leland's frantic effort to prove that he will abide by a platform which the League shall write, and that the League will endorse him for mayor. Leland's effort to effect this result is the only noteworthy political event of the week. The success of his effort would be sincerely regretted by a large body of people who look to the Good Government League for guidance and sound political advice. It is pointed out that Leland is a man of small calibre. He has always been McNab's man. McNab is the astutest politician in San Francisco. If McNab could control Leland's appointments to commissions, police commission, and board of education, he would be able to build up a political machine that would make him invincible in city elections for years to come.

TAG DAY FOR YOUTH'S DIRECTORY.

The California Weekly is glad to announce that a "tag day" will be observed in San Francisco on Saturday, September 18th, for the purpose of raising funds to liquidate part of the debt contracted in replacing the building of the Youth's Directory. This is the charity through which Rev. D. O. Crowley has rescued hundreds of boy waifs, and it deserves the hearty support of all citizens.

AMERICAN SHIPPING IN AMERICAN SHIPS

II. ATTITUDE OF GREAT BRITAIN TOWARD AMERICAN SHIPPING.

By G. W. DICKIE.

We have seen that to secure the American shipping trade Great Britain brought about the War of 1812. At the close of this war an ultimatum was presented by Britain demanding that the United States discontinue her policy of protecting her shipping by commercial regulations or continue the war. In 1815 the United States government gave way and submitted to a convention for four years; the principal stipulation in this convention provided for a mutual suspension of discriminating duties in the direct commerce of the two countries but closed the ports of the West Indies and Provinces to American ships, as they had been since 1783.

In 1818 Great Britain insisted on a continuance of this convention for a further period of ten years and again in 1827 for still another period of ten years. From this arrangement a condition was brought about very unfair to American shipping and it resulted in a great decrease in the amount of American tonnage. A British ship brought such goods as the American market would take and, having discharged her cargo at an American port, loaded a cargo for the West Indies, whither American ships could not go; having discharged her cargo in the West Indies, she loaded for the United States again, where, having discharged the cargo she brought from the West Indies, she loaded a cargo for the British Isles or some European port and sailed homeward.

The American ship could take a cargo to Great Britain, but she usually had to return in ballast, as there was no discriminating duty in the direct trade between the two countries to induce the British merchants to give them cargoes in preference to their own ships. American vessels were further hindered in their employment by the fact that they could not take a cargo to the West Indies from either the United States or Great Britain under penalty of confiscation of ship and cargo. In 1819 Congress, discovering how hardly the convention bore upon the interests of America, repealed the act of 1815. This repeal was to go into force in 1824, but in that year the old convention was re-enacted, owing to some obscure understanding, hope, or promise that Great Britain would open the West Indies ports to the shipping of the United States. This hope was never realized.

Abandonment of Ship Protection.

Under strong pressure from outside interests, strongly urged by John Quincy Adams, Congress, which up to this time had sought to protect American shipping, at last gave way and in May, 1828, the United States offered reciprocity in shipping to any country desiring it. It is curious to note that the same notions prevailed regarding the impossible superiority of American workmen over all others, as prevail to-day. The passage of this first bill contemplating the abandonment of American shipping was managed by Senator Woodbury of New Hampshire, and in his speech he said:

"We are known to possess a skill and economy in building vessels, a cheapness in fitting them out, an activity in sailing them, which, without discriminating aid, would give us an advantage in coping with any commercial power in existence.

"Such are the accurate calculations of our merchants, the youth and agility of our seamen, and the intelligence of our shipmasters, that American vessels can, on an average, make three trips to Europe while a foreign vessel is making two.

"It must be manifest to all that circumstances like these, rather than any discriminating duties, must always give and maintain to us a superiority and protection which leaves nothing to be feared from the fullest competition."

In spite of this supposed wonderful superiority the removal of a protective duty of less than one-fourth of the then prevailing freight rate on the Atlantic drove the American ships out of that trade. If the eloquent senator's claim for the superiority of his fellow-countrymen in the business of international trading were founded on facts it is hardly possible that the result of his measure would have been so disastrous to the interests of those whom he praised so lavishly. This is the kind of oratory that doomed the foreign shipping of America to an early death and is still indulged in over its grave. It is curious to note also that this confidence in the ability of American shipping to hold its own against any competition found its expression through the same men who enacted the tariff bill of 1828, and they expressed themselves loudest at that same session of Congress; here we find the statesmen eloquent on the helpless condition of the American industries in facing the fierce competition of the European factories with their generations of experience and with labor having more efficiency and less pay than that of America. Such is the strange inconsistency of law makers, ancient and modern.

Loss of Shipping Through Reciprocity.

From 1828, when the bill was passed abandoning the protection of shipping in the foreign trade and offering reciprocity to any country desiring it, to 1848 eighteen countries had made reciprocity treaties with the United States, and during that time she lost in the carriage of her own commerce 12.9 per cent of the imports, and 18.6 per cent of the exports. From the records of this period it does not appear that there was any one in the United States Congress competent to perceive the danger of the course then pursued. Britain, however, was not so destitute of far-seeing men. At that time there was in parliament a man, David Ricardo, noting the effect of American legislation on her own shipping, and he took occasion to point out that the indirect voyages paid best and that the British shipowner was losing a great deal of very profitable business in not being able, owing to her own shipping laws, to take advantage of the United States act of 1828, and share with other nations in the indirect carriage of American commerce. For generations British merchants had been established in every port of the world; when they wished to make shipments to America they were compelled by the law of 1817 to charter American vessels, for, by that law, British vessels could not enter and land cargoes in the United States from non-British ports. It was Ricardo's aim to get this protection to American shipping done away with as to British vessels, as it was already suspended as to eighteen other countries, and thus to give new life to British shipping at the expense of the foreign shipping of the United States. Ricardo took heed to the wise counsel of the United States government, and the famous old navigation laws of 1651-1656 were remodeled to suit the conditions of 1849. The United States promptly reciprocated; the Secretary of the Treasury issued a "circular" without even waiting for the President to comply by proclamation. Such was the extent of the Americans' fall into the trap set for them by Ricardo. From that date American shipping in the foreign trade went steadily down. In four years there was a loss of 10 per cent in imports and in twelve years over 21 per cent.

Shipping Always Needed Protection.

I have gone into this history sufficiently to show that the foreign shipping trade of the country never prospered, even in the wooden ship days, without substantial protection, and that this is true due to the fact that other nations were to be prominent in the carrying trade and were willing to pay for it.

I am not, however, advocating a return to the kind of protection that built up American shipping in the foreign trade during the thirty-eight years between 1789 and 1828, when the shipping trade increased from 17.5 per cent of the imports and 30 per cent of the exports to 95.2 per cent of the imports and 89 per cent of the exports; today we have the small per cent of this American carrying trade that foreigners had then and they have the large proportion which our forefathers managed by their fostering laws to reserve for themselves.

I must state, however, that those who advocate a return to discriminating charges against foreign ships and their cargoes entering any port of the United States have done a very great service to the cause of shipping by removing, where they could get to the ears of the people, a false impression which has been held tenaciously and is still held in some quarters, that there was a time in the history of this country when no protection was needed for ships sailing to any port of the world under the Stars and Stripes. This belief has been fostered by generations of orators, political and patriotic, whose statements have nourished the pride of the people until they have become blind to the plain teachings of history. It is a pity that there should be any controversy as to the method or treatment that should be used to revive our shipping. As a citizen of this country, I like the plan of discrimination against the foreign ship, but, when I consider myself to a citizen of one of the family of nations comprising the commercial world, I hesitate to apply a remedy or stimulant obviously bound to stir up discord in the family.

Two Proposed Remedies.

There are two methods to which it is worth while to pay much attention, as one or the other of these methods must ultimately be adopted, and I will briefly outline the principles which form the basis of the proposed legislation.

First: It is proposed that government aid be given to the ship owners in the foreign trade sufficient in amount to enable them to buy American built ships and operate them in competition with cheaper built and cheaper operated foreign built ships and to insure them a reasonable profit.

Second: It is proposed to charge foreign built and owned ships at all American ports where they seek entry, extra tonnage rates on the ships and extra tariff duties on their cargoes, so that the cost of importing on the foreign ships will exceed the cost of importing on American ships and thus the carrying trade will be forced into the hands of our American shipowners.

In regard to the economic effects that would follow the adoption of either of the proposed methods I am convinced that either method if successfully enforced would produce the same ultimate result; the cost would have to be borne by the people of the country.

If government gives direct aid to its own shipping, as other countries are doing to theirs, that aid will have to be sufficient to enable the ship owners to run their ships in competition with foreign ships that cost less to build and less to operate and that receive substantial aid from their governments, and freights will be low on both foreign and American vessels, but the apparent advantage of this low freight would be offset by the increased federal taxes to provide the funds to pay the subventions or other aids given the American ships.

The People Pay Either Way.

If, on the other hand, discriminating duties were enforced against the foreign ships, the amount of discrimination would have to be added to the freight charges on all goods imported on a foreign ship, and the amount of the discrimination would have to be enough to raise the freight rate to a figure that would enable the American ship to figure profitably operated against the foreign ship; but this higher freight rate would add to the price of imported goods and reduce the price obtainable for exports and thus indirectly the people would have to pay the same.

Of the two methods thus outlined the distinction is simply one of method with no difference in the result sought or in the final settlement of the cost of obtaining it.

I do not believe that any bill providing for the restoration of discriminating duties for the protection of American shipping can be passed unless the entire government as it stands today be changed. I have been assured by those Congressmen and Senators with whom I have corresponded on this matter that no such bill could possibly pass, and, if by some remote chance it did pass, then it would be vetoed. An effort was made lately to have discrimination favoring American vessels in the trade of the Philippine Islands; this was promptly quashed on account of the existing treaties with other nations, which treaties stand in the way for some time to come. Why should not the coastwise trade apply to this outlying territory of the United States? This country pays the cost of government those islands and should control the trade between them and all home ports as well as the interisland trade and coasting trade of the islands themselves. I am afraid, however, that want of enterprise on the part of ship owners has something to do with the conditions that obtain in the Philippine shipping trade. Generally speaking, the adoption of discriminating duties for the protection of American shipping would require the abrogation of nearly all the existing treaties with other nations and would place us at variance with the rest of the world, and I cannot think that the American people would stand alone among the nations in regard to a method of fostering shipping when the cost of carrying out that method would be the same as that of another method which would be in harmony with the spirit and custom of our time.

Another method of helping our merchant shipping in the foreign trade which has recently been brought very forcibly before the public and ship owners of the Pacific coast in a speech by Mr. Robert Dollar, of the Dollar Steamship Line, is that of permitting the ship owner to buy his ships where he can get them cheapest and use them in the foreign trade only. We will consider the free ship question in our next article.

A NEW MAP OF CALIFORNIA.

Just off the press, a revised edition of the map of California has been published by The California Promotion Committee, and copies are available at its headquarters in the Merchants Exchange Building, San Francisco, at the rate of ten cents a copy, including postage and mailing tube. The committee is prepared to send the map, as the orders are received, to those who not only wish copies for themselves but desire it sent to their friends in the East and abroad, whom they wish to bring to California, and who will be attracted by the resources as shown on the map.

Distinguishing it from the ordinary map, this publication has statistical tables showing, under headings of the products of agriculture, state that are of commercial importance, the chief producing counties, the classification being agricultural, horticultural, mineral and miscellaneous. A list of the counties and county seats is given, showing the distance of the latter from the metropolises.

Chapter V. AN ACT OF TREACHERY.

IT was Gabriel's privilege and delight occasionally to ride to his father's lake camp Friday evening after school to remain with the vaqueros until Monday morning and a part of this pleasure was due to the opportunity for riding all the way home by the school of Helen and Roanoke. He always made that part of the lake ride a trial of the speed and endurance of the two horses, Clay Babe and Roanoke, with what joy only a horse-mad boy can ever know. If he was discomfited in the knowledge that Clay Babe was outmached by Roanoke he was still able to indulge a family pride in the belief that at least Peacock was unapproachable.

The maraudings of his father's cattle, and the death of the night guard, troubled the boy, and he knew that among his father's vaqueros were one or two thoroughly lawless men. These men said to the others talked often and boastfully of the trouble they would make for the "sandlappers" when their grain fields got along a little farther. Once, as they were riding along at an easy canter, Gabriel confided to Helen his belief that her father and the other settlers would never make anything out of those dry plains, and yet it was said, "Dad ain't doing right about the cattle, and there ain't nobody who knows it better than Dad."

The next afternoon, Saturday, the head vaquero called Gabriel to one side and said: "You've got to pike out for home. Can't have you here over Sunday this year. Ask me no questions and I'll tell you no lies. Hit the trail." And there was nothing for it except to do as he was bidden, but, as he rode along, he pondered the thing over with more of deliberation than was his wont. He knew that it was in the dark of the moon. He saw the beautiful grain fields of the settlement, and as he cut across lots along an old trail, and reached out his hand for some of the wheat heads, now nearly ready for the harvest, he found that he could tie the heads of the grain together right over the withers of Clay Babe. And there were hundreds and hundreds of stalks of it. It melted road to him and the rustling of the stalks in the gentle wind sounded good in his ears. Then he thought of the injury that several hundred head of cattle, ravenous for green feed, now that the plains grasses were dry as hay, might inflict; but he rode on home, ate supper and went to bed early.

Boy like, tired with his long ride, he fell off into a deep sleep almost as soon as he had touched the bed, so deep that when, before retiring, his mother came into his room to look upon his face by the light of a tallow candle, and stroked his temples and kissed his forehead, he knew nothing of it. Often, at such times he had awakened and thrown his arms about his mother's neck, and they had loved each other for a moment or two in sincere abandon. It was that that either of them was loved by both Helen and Clay Babe. With the boy there were other interests every waking minute. With the mother there was only her boy, the Chinese cook, her poultry and garden. Her husband's interests were all apart from hers and there was a little comradeship with him as with the Chinaman, who also was dogged, taciturn and did his work with the faithfulness and spiritlessness of a machine. But that night her boy was dead to the world and the mother dragged her dispirited footsteps to her own couch, the recipient of no love, taken for granted and left. And then the boy awoke and sat bolt upright in bed. What was it that aroused him? There was no sound save the tapping of the window shade against the casing as it was stirred by the gentle northwest breeze. Or was it the rustling of great fields of grain into Enterprise settlement ten miles away? Did he hear the lowings of an oncoming herd half way to the lake? Whatever it was, there he sat on the edge of his bed as wide awake as ever he had been in his life. He tiptoed to the door of his room and listened. The dogs were all asleep, but the breezes might course unobstructed through the house. His father's breathing was thick and disturbed, but that of his mother was regular and faint. He slipped on his clothes and, reaching out of the window, grasped the upper limb of a walnut that grew hard by, stepped out upon a lower and stronger limb and made his way noiselessly to the ground. The hounds came bounding toward him, licked his hands and wagged their tails in greeting, and followed him to the barn, where he threw the saddle on Clay Babe and led him out into the pasture through a back gate, avoiding the road. There were bars at the far corner. He let down the top one, leaped the horse over the other and struck a cow trail leading to Enterprise settlement.

The boy swung well around the settlement between it and the lake, stopped and listened. All was still. He got off the horse and lay with his ear against the ground. A coyote called in the distance, the little night owls wheeled through the air and made a noise like the cracking of corn by the teeth of a hog. Clay Babe nibbled at the dead grass, and the three hounds that had followed lolled at his feet. Suddenly one of them sprang to his feet and gave a low bark. Clay Babe lifted his head and nickered. Horse and dog both poked their noses into the southwest. Gabriel mounted and rode forward at a trot. Presently his ear caught the sound of lowing cattle, for cattle will talk more or less, especially if there are cows among them. He rode into the dry bed of a slough and hastened forward, hitched Clay Babe to a willow, climbed the bank and listened. Now he could distinctly hear the murmuring of the herd and, after waiting a quarter of an hour, he could see shadowy forms moving between him and the sky line. There could be no mistake. Dashing back to where Clay Babe waited restlessly he called the hounds to him, pointed in the direction of the cattle and "sicked" them on. There was a dash, a yelping and, a few moments after, a stampeding of many hoofs and the voices of swearing men.

Mounting Clay Babe, the boy dashed up the opposite bank of the slough and halted a moment. A pistol shot rang out, two of the dogs came bounding back and Gabriel was off.

Arrived at the building, he sought for the bell-rope. It lay cut into fragments on the stoop and the remainder dangled out of his reach. Nothing daunted, he brought Clay Babe in through the gate and, standing upon his back, reached the bell-rope. The first twang of the clapper carried Clay Babe out from under him in a twinkling, but he clung fast to the rope and, going up it hand over hand, soon stood on the platform. The bell now rang with a furiousness it had not voiced before. The dogs howled. Clay Babe tried to find a way out of the yard, the boy came down the rope, dropped to the ground, mounted his horse and sped down the road like a whirlwind.

As Gabriel dashed by the first farm house the back door opened and the farmer and his son hurried toward the barn. The boy took to the fields at the first opportunity and made tracks for home. Arriving at the far end of the pasture he turned his horse loose there and, taking the light racing saddle on his arm, hastened to the barn, not noticing that only two dogs followed him. In a moment he had off his shoes, was in at his window and back in bed refreshed only by a good drink of water at the garden hydrant. After tossing a little while he was asleep as sound as ever.

He was awakened some hours later by loud talking in the front yard. His father was furious about something. Lifting the shade slightly, Gabriel saw the head vaquero in the roadway, his horse in a reeking sweat and much jaded. He was cautioning his father not to say too much about what had happened lest they get into a worse trouble than losing a few cattle. The vaqueros were only armed with pistols, the foreman said, while the "sandlappers" all had rifles or it might have been different, but, anyhow, there were nearly fifty head of cattle dead on an alkali patch between the settlement and the lake and the "sandlappers" had captured one of the vaqueros and strung him up to a limb of a lone oak and held him there until he confessed to the herd having been driven there by Brayton's own orders. He was then turned loose and instructed to report to Brayton that the next time the cattle came in that direction there would be men in the camp, killed.

The boy remained discreetly sleepy until his father had mounted his horse, which the vaquero had brought in from the pasture. "Somebody must have been out on Clay Babe last night," the vaquero said. "He appears to have been hard ridden."

"Don't see how that can be," was the reply. "Gabe went to bed early last night, and, his mother tells me, was so sound asleep that he was dead to the world. I looked in on him when you called, and he was sleeping like a saw log. You don't think he suspects anything do you?"

"Well, he did not want to go home when I sent him, said he'd bet a hoss that I was up to some deviltry, and rode off in bad humor. How do you suppose that infernal schoolhouse bell got rung so? I cut the rope off up as high as I could reach from my horse I back, but I heard it before we were within two miles of the settlement. It sounded like a fire alarm. By the way, where's your other dog?" "I don't see but two about the place this morning."

"Don't know. I had to get up in the night to drive the low out of the garden. Recount Gabe must have left the gate open into the pasture when he came in, but there wasn't a dog in sight. I wondered at it at the time; they are all three always at my heels if I go into the yard at night."

"We shot a dog out there last night—came bounding at us out of nowhere and nearly stampeded the cattle, but Jack fetched him the first shot, so that he never even whimpered." With this the two men rode out along the road toward the open plain.

It was more than four hours before Moses Brayton returned, and when he did his countenance was black and lowering. The first thing he did when he swung from his horse and entered the yard was to demand to know where Gabe was. Gabe was out at the barn at the time the Chinaman was sent to fetch him. He came like a thief in the night, and his father collared him upon the instant.

"Where were you, young fellow, last night?"

"In bed, sir."

"Like hell you were! And you had Clay Babe in bed with you! I suppose, for somebody rode him half to death betwixt dark and morning. And where is Zip?"

"I don't know, sir."

"Well, I can tell you. He is out on the plains the other side of the 'sandlapper' settlement as dead as a mackerel. Explain how that happened, you! And what was it that you know is who rang that schoolhouse bell and let all those damned 'sandlappers' know my cattle were coming so that they could go out and shoot down fifty of them before they had touched their grain, and while my men were trying to round them up to drive them back."

"Your men were not trying to round them up and drive them back. They were driving them straight toward those wheat fields as fast as they could make them go."

"So it was you, was it, that rang the schoolhouse bell. And you was you, was it, that went interfering with my business, you infernal traitor!"

"Yes, Dad, it was I. I knew that you were doing wrong. I could see that our men had deviltry on their minds and I know that those 'sandlappers' had got in a case of Winchester's right after their water was killed, and I wanted to save trouble. It all came to me in the middle of the night, and I did it."

"Well, I bet there's not nothing of that kind ever come to you again, day or night. I'll teach you to meddle with what's none of your business."

With that the father laid his riding whip over the boy's shoulders and back as though he were whipping a balky horse. The boy screamed with pain and there was an answering cry from the house, a rush from the veranda, and his mother had him in her arms. Still the blows fell alike upon mother and son until the son, breaking away, straightened up, with eyes flashing, and breast heaving with passion. "Dad," he said, "you strike me again with that whip and I'll shoot you dead."

Moses Brayton witheld his hand, drew back, turned black in the face, then white, sank upon the porch and buried his face in his hands. He had not meant to strike his wife, and the sight of blood trickling down her sleeveless arms unnerved him. "Go and get your gun, son," he said. "I reckon Dad deserves it."

For more than two hours mother and son, locked in her room, cried their troubles out in each other's arms, while Moses Brayton paced the fields alone. The boy had the satisfaction of being told by his mother that he did a brave and manly thing, but that he was too young to interfere with his father's affairs and that it was their duty to try to save father from himself if they could, for he had not been just the same since poor Helen died.

Never after that did Moses Brayton's cattle "pester" the "sandlapper" settlement. The no-fence law became thenceforth effective. There was talk of prosecutions, but none were instituted. There was also talk of the ugly taking-off of the night watcher. When in his cups in town one night one of Brayton's made some damaging declarations that went far, in the minds of many, to confirm the no-suicide theory. With much to conceal on both sides, it was perhaps not unnatural that common consent should keep the issue out of the courts. Anyhow, it was kept out.

Chapter VI.

A RACE LOST AND WON.

It was in the late fall of the bumper crop year that the people of Tulare county resolved to hold a county fair and thanksgiving harvest festival all in one. Roanoke had, by that time, been given more than a year of training at the hands of Gabriel and his own mistress. One morning Gabriel came cantering up to join Helen with a new light in his eyes.

"I say," he called, "I have a great idea. I want you to ride Roanoke at the fair. There is to be a premium for the best woman rider and a race between the best women riders at the close. The last dash will be only for a quarter, but I believe you can get Roanoke off quick enough to beat the best of them even for a quarter. It will be for the honor of the school, you know. I am going to win on Roanoke in the free-for-all and if you take the premium for the best woman rider, and I for the free-for-all, Professor Hamilton will be the proudest man in the county and we can do just as we please in that school for the rest of the year."

Professor Hamilton was a strange being. Born in mid-ocean on a stormy voyage of his parents to America, he was a man without a country that he cared especially for. His one love was for his school and he loved his school only that it might send more graduates to the state university, prepared to take its entrance examinations, than any other school of its size in the commonwealth. To this end he knew no mercy to his pupils, save as they performed some signal service, it mattered little what, to attract attention to his school and confer honor upon it and himself. Even the winning of a horse race by one of his pupils, "for the honor of the school," and not for money, would suffice to insure the winner an enlargement of liberty and special consideration until such time as some more signal achievement eclipsed the old.

Helen was dubious of so much publicity. She did not know, or rather, feared that she knew too well what Papa and Mama might say. Silas Singham's opinion of horse racing and horse racers, even under the most innocent conditions, was entirely unfavorable. That pastime did not comport with his essentially deep, although little cultivated, religious nature. However, she carried the project home with her that night, and after much persuasion, and with a solemn assurance that there was to be no betting in that race, extracted a reluctant consent. At once the work of preparation began. Gabriel devoted all of his intermissions to polishing Roanoke up and rubbing him down and in coaching Helen on how the fair would be managed.

The great day came and the whole county was at the fair at the county seat. An early start had to be taken, the family in the covered road wagon, Helen on all her Roanoke. It was, in those days, a slim enough excuse for a fair. The agricultural products could have been hustled into one wagon, the stock show was mainly of horses, but the fakers would have filled the county jail to overflowing if they had received their deserts. It was, however, the one great outing of the people for the year, unless a circus chanced along, and they made the most of it.

Gabriel lost no time in seeking out Helen and in providing a stall for Roanoke upon whom he fell immediately that the horse might be in trim for the riding contest and race. His glossy chestnut hide was rubbed until it shone like a mirror, and Helen's saddle was dusted and rubbed until it was faultless, after which Gabriel disappeared to look out for his own horse and the chief event of the day, the free-for-all.

It was mid-afternoon before the ladies' race came off. Gabriel was on hand to give his final words of instruction to Helen, "for the honor of the school," as he was careful to explain time and again, and to see that Roanoke was properly caparisoned. The girl took her horse out on the track with the others to warm him up, and as the contestants, a dozen or so, were being put through their evolutions Helen gave some exhibition drills in higher education for the horse. Roanoke answered "yes" and "no" to questions asked him, knelt for her to alight and to mount, backed at the word of command, geed and haw'd as ordered without touching the reins, dashed forward at high speed only to stop stock-still within three lengths, and so won much applause without reference to the race with which the contest was to conclude.

But the crucial event came. They were to canter around the track in good order until they reached the home stretch when they were to come in under whip and spur for the final dash.

The track was too full of horses for comfort or safety and the eager crowd encroached upon the roadway. Helen, by preference, took the outside of the track, though it made farther to go. The quarter pole was reached, the starting pistol fired and off they dashed. Cries of "Here they come!" "Clear the track!" "Get out of the way!" filled the air, and then a wail of horror went up. A little 'sandlerapper, not above three years old, had somehow eluded his eager mother's grasp, dodged under the protecting make-shift for a fence and, far down the track, had run a third of the way across it. There he stood dumbfounded.

The horses were almost on him, Roanoke and Clay Babe, with a Visalia lady on his back, distinctly in the lead when Helen caught sight of the child. She bore directly down upon him as if to ride him down, brought Roanoke to a dead stop in three lengths, leaped to the ground, swung the child into the saddle, leaped into it herself, somehow, anyhow, gave the word to Roanoke and passed under the wire third in the race.

The cheers that went up from that crowd rang in her ears long after. The people poured into the track in front of the judges' stand to shower their congratulations upon her so that neither horse nor rider could move. Many mothers were crying, but not the mother of the adventurous boy. She made her way to the horse's side, took the child from the saddle, spanked him vigorously and with a "thank you, miss," made her way out of the crowd.

When the crowd stilled a little, so that the decision of the judges could be heard, they awarded the premium for the best horsemanship to Helen Singham, but the race to the rider of Clay Babe. This did not at all suit the temper of the crowd, who hooted and hissed the decision soundly. One tall man sprang into the crowd and demanded the making of a purse for the real winner. "Make it up, gentlemen," he called to the horsemen and stock owners around the judges' stand, and it was made up. By the time the crowd could be cleared away so that Helen and Roanoke could make their way off the track this tall man, who proved to be the sheriff of the county, dropped a purse containing more than a hundred dollars of shining gold into the hand of Helen.

It was now Gabriel's turn. Riding out into the track, which she could watch the race to advantage Helen waited with eagerness for the appearance of Gabriel and the far-famed Peacock to enter the free-for-all. She had not long to wait. Ever since Helen's race had been lost and won, much to the disgust of Gabriel, he had been warming up the pride of his family on the back stretch.

Peacock proved to be all that his name indicated. He was so light a sorrel as to be almost a cream color, with abundant mane, and a tail almost white, and the way he cavorted around, first on one side of the track and then on the other, with head down as though he had half a notion to buck, and then reared high in air as though he would fly, showed how eager he was for the test of speed. And through it all Gabriel sat him as unmoved as though he were some part of the animal. For the first time a sense of pride in Gabriel came into the heart of Helen. "I declare I like the boy," she said to herself; "he is not one bit like his glum old father, nor, not one little teeny-tanty bit, so there!"

There was a trouble in getting the horses off. There were a half dozen of them on the track and Moses Brayton was going about among the betting men, carrying a sack of gold in his hands and offering heavy odds on Peacock. As Helen watched him she liked him less than ever. He was of few words and only called: "Money, take it, gentlemen. Put up your money if you want to take a chance at mine."

After starting and being called back half a dozen times the horses finally got away. They came from end to end of the valley and the belief was widely entertained that a "ringer" had been imported to "do Moses Brayton up." It was a pretty race, but a very narrow one, with a bay in the lead, a dark sorrel next and Peacock third hugging the inside of the track. As they went down the back side of the track Peacock took second place, but he was a full length behind the bay and apparently not gaining. They were ready toward the home stretch. Helen could scarcely keep the tears from her eyes. She would have liked well enough for Moses Brayton to lose his money, so she did want Gabriel to win, "for the honor of Tulare school," as she assured herself.

The horses passed out of view as they approached the turn, the great crowd intervening. Then came the cries of "There they come!" "Clear the track!" "Get back there, won't you," and Helen could hear the rhythm of the hoofs of the flying horses. The next instant Peacock shot by the judges' stand like a thunderbolt a full length ahead, and the "honor of Tulare school" had been upheld by Gabriel if not by herself, was the rueful way in which both of them looked at it. "If that mother had only given me that little 'sandlerapper to spank," Gabriel explained next day, "you bet I'd a fixed him a-plenty."

extends west of Buffalo, and who, though of the sixth generation born on Manhattan, belongs West of the Missouri river. We yield our heart's homage to one whom in public station and in private life we have found in every way so successful, always brave. We acclaim his exhortation to a higher and nobler conception of citizenship. When he preaches that we cannot raise the standard of our citizenship if in private life we shun the rugged ways, and cease to practice the old homestead virtues, he reaches every conscience. He stirs every soul that makes for righteousness. God bless him, God bless every man who sublimates from all the dross of earth and holds high—"high above the eternal stars"—the priceless love of home and wife and children.

And may I not, in this presence, also welcome him as a Republican? In no vulgar vaunting of party organization, in no bitterness of partisanship, but as the incarnation of the truth that he serves his party best who serves his country best, of that higher politics which puts above all things the betterment of his countrymen, we hail him as the leader of those principles upon which at this time that betterment rests. Those principles need not be repeated here. They are graven on the tablets of our memory. They are the banners beneath which we march. They are the signs in which we conquer. In the clear vision of tonight political destiny is as manifest as political duty. In your name, my brothers, Republicans of the strenuous and upbuilding West, I welcome as your guest tonight the leader of that great party to which we all belong, in the person of Theodore Roosevelt of New York.

And now, Mr. President, I welcome you to our hearthstone. Your visit will soon be over. We hope and trust your stay with us has been a pleasant one. And as the hour of your departure draws near I know of no better way of expressing our sentiment than to repeat that contained in the old Scottish song—"Don't forget the words—they come from full and loyal hearts by this Western sea:

Will you not come back again?"

to invest in this practical and established medium of influence upon the "other half."

Miss Briggs has in mind a plan that should be taken up by the hospitals of San Francisco. She needs more nurses. The nurses that are trained by the hospitals need one kind of training that they cannot get in hospitals, the experience of nursing in the families of the poor where they are called upon not merely to handle the technical problems of nursing under hospital conditions, but to handle the human problem of taking charge of a sick person in the conditions of poverty, ignorance, and obstinacy. Miss Briggs could use nurses from the hospitals, and at the same time the nurses would be gaining a month or six weeks of invaluable practical training. Some arrangement to make this mutual benefit possible should be made by the hospital authorities.

Miss Briggs' settlement is inspiring. It is an adaptation of the beneficence of home influences to the needs of a populous city district. Its success, within its possibilities of expansion, has been amazing. Those possibilities could be widened by the judicious aid of a little money, even of a few dollars a month.

The New Constitution and Corporations.

A prime charge made against the new constitution of California was that it "leveled attacks upon corporations." It will be instructive to see whether these attacks were justified.

The new constitution fixed the liability of each stockholder in a corporation for all its debts at the ratio which the shares of stock held by each holder bears to the whole subscribed capital stock. The old constitution expressed the liability as being merely "in proportion" without stating how that proportion should be arrived at. Certainly this was not "leveling an attack."

The new constitution went further in safeguarding both public and shareholders in corporations by providing that directors and trustees shall be jointly and severally liable to creditors and stockholders for moneys embezzled or misappropriated by the officers of a corporation. It has been too frequently the case that directors and trustees have allowed the officers of corporations to conduct the whole business of the corporation without any directing or trusteeship of any kind, whereas their fiduciary relation to the public and the shareholders should be of the most exacting kind. It would be hard to find fault with this provision of the constitution except that it may not have gone far enough in preventing dummy boards of directors and trustees.

Some fault has been found with Section 7 of Article XII in that it does not allow the legislature to extend charters and franchises after they have expired. The law does not confiscate the property of corporations when their charters run out. They may be reincorporated, but under such laws as the experience of half a century shall have determined to be salutary. Influence might be brought upon legislatures to induce them to extend charters and franchises that were opposed to the public interest in the first instance. Indeed, there is nothing more clear than that the future should not be greatly mortgaged to the present, that each generation should be free to deal with its own problems in the way that its own time to the end that the living may not be ruled by the dead, often greatly to their injury. Again are we unable to find in this section anything like "leveling an attack" at corporations.

Section 11 of Article XII prohibits the issuance of stocks or bonds of corporations except for work done, materials furnished, money paid or other property actually received. This was aimed at the practice of distributing stocks and bonds among promoters and fellow conspirators to be worked off on the public for the advantage of favored individuals and unconcerned interests of the corporation itself. That this worked against crooked corporation financing cannot be denied, but it has never harmed any bona fide corporation. Nor has that other provision which forbade the creation of corporate stock and bonded indebtedness without a majority vote of the stock held and after sixty days of public notice. This has tended to prevent the looting of corporations by insiders and for insiders to the injury of outsiders, but cannot be construed into an attack upon corporations.

Section 8 of Article XII forbids the public against the power of a corporation to resist the right of eminent domain, but places corporate rights in that particular on the same basis as the rights of private individuals, a thoroughly sound doctrine without mistake.

The latter half of the same section holds corporations to such a conduct of their affairs as shall not infringe the rights of individuals or work against the well-being of the state. There were cogent reasons why this provision needed to be written into the organic law of the state.

The reader may remember that, last week, a quotation was made from an utterance of Theodore Hittell, the historian of California, in which he declared that "corporations were no more unconscionable than by their nature they are compelled to be." This invites us to a brief study of the nature of a corporation and in what it is different from a human being.

Whatever an individual does he is held accountable for, but a corporation savors of absentee landlordism. It is in a measure not responsible to the public. The acts of corporations are the acts of its officers, not of its stockholders, yet the officers of a corporation are held accountable to the stockholders for results obtained rather than for how they obtained them. The corps of officers that pays the largest dividends is most likely to hold places in the corporation, although those dividends may have been obtained in part by dodging taxes, debauching courts, securing special privileges by bribery, preventing effective regulation through controlling political parties and legislatures. The doctrine of moral responsibility of shareholders is being preached more and more and, sometime, will be fixed in the law and in constitutional amendment, but that consummation has not yet come. The ultimate ownership is irresponsible and the public is advised to look for redress to irresponsible officials who may be discharged any day.

The foregoing are the principal provisions which the new constitution contains, relative to corporations, that the old constitution did not. There are some others, relating particularly to railroads, which will form the subject of another lesson, but in all good conscience not one of those above mentioned can rightfully be characterized as "leveling an attack" at corporations.

There is a state, or quality, of mind that looks upon all regulative measures as hostile when they may be only defensive, or as revolutionary when they are only progressive, and the more wrong one has the more he seems to be inclined to that opinion.

No Successor to Harriman.

There has been much curiosity to know who will succeed E. H. Harriman as head of his great railroad system. No one will succeed him. No one can. Some other man may build up another system as strong as his, or tear his system to pieces and construct another out of the fragments of that system and others, but no one will step into his shoes and go right on doing the things that he did. Genius is not to be hired or to be found by looking for it. It grows on what it feeds on and is not to be constituted by election. What is more likely is that, in succession to Harriman, there will come to be a dead-in-the-shell bureaucracy which may be alive enough at the bottom but will die off at the top, with advancement in accordance with seniority of service. Such an organization, the foundations of which Harriman laid, will be stronger than Harriman ever was, but stronger to resist advancement than decay. It will be governed by professional traditions, whereas Harriman broke with all traditions in railroading. Peter the Great built such a machine for the government of Russia and no sovereign since Peter has been able to control the living-dead bureaucracy which he created. It has ruled Czars, grand dukes and the hundred million Russians with bars of unbending cast iron and, except some other Harriman rises to usurp the Harriman system, this will be the destiny of that system. The Vanderbilts have gone that road. We are to witness the evolution of some powerful railroad bureaucracies in this country, bureaucracies that will make other Harriman's impossible. Their termination may be in government ownership, which will then become the worst bureaucracy of all.

Westward-Ho.

President William Howard Taft has "done started" on his great swing around the circle. May no collision encounter him or flanged wheel dare to climb the rail. The good wishes of the nation will attend him all the way.

The nation will also hang upon his words. More than platforms, more than special messages to congress, will these train-end talks to the people, and after dinner addresses to frock-coated men, be looked to to furnish forth meat fit to set before a multitude hungry to know just what to expect from this administration. The people have not had their faith in their president shaken, but they have become distrustful of some of his advisers. They distrust Ballinger, they are questionable as to Wickersham, they look upon Hitchcock as nothing but a machine politician, and the situation has been further complicated by the attempt which the President made at Boston to give a certificate of character to Nelson A. Aldrich. All these things tend to make the people impatient for a heart-to-heart talk with their chief executive, and he is coming.

He has promised to listen, too, as well as to talk. Will he get a chance to listen to the right people? Very many of the titled functionaries with whom he will be brought into contact are not right people. The federal brigade of office holders especially are not right people. They were put into the places they hold by corporate influence to do Roosevelt, and Taft himself, all the injury they dare. They are as unrepresentative a lot of persons as could be gotten together, take them as a whole. Will those who are a bit solicitous that the President shall stand firm for the Roosevelt policies have the courage to make their state of mind known, or will they shrink into solitude and suffer the opportunity to pass unimproved? The occasion is not one for negative righteousness, but for positive. Those who have faith in them should manifest the courage of their convictions when opportunity offers, with a courteous, clear and unmistakable frankness.

We, the people, really want to know what to expect from this administration.

California.

Of course the present ebullition in Southern California is to be looked upon as a tempest in a teapot. That portion of the state has been rather shabbily treated by an incorporated sovereignty, whose pleasure it has heretofore been delighted to do. If the smart of the hurt shall inspire it to throw off the yoke of corporate domination the gain will be worth the price.

But the carving of a new commonwealth out of south of Tehachapi and Arizona is another matter.

Why should the rest of California look askance at it? The increase of the assessment by the State Board of Equalization would not justify any such procedure, either as occasion or cause, but what of the idea considered upon its own merits?

We divide counties in this state, and rightfully enough, whenever the economy of doing business at an adjacent county seat overbalances, to the citizens concerned, the cost of maintaining two county governments instead of one. Why not apply such a rule to the dividing of a great and unwieldy state? California is such a state and Texas is another.

Fix the northern boundary of the new state at the thirty-fourth parallel of latitude and yoke it to Arizona, or Arizona to it, and there would be created a great and homogeneous commonwealth with two more senators representing the Pacific Coast. And "Calizonia" would not be a bad name for it.

There is a difference between Southern California and the rest of the state, a difference in interest, in spirit, in ideals, in industry, and in commerce. The people south of the Santa Inez and Tejon mountains are as much cut off from the rest of California as the rest of California is cut off from the remainder of the United States. They are living their separate lives south of Tehachapi as certainly as California, as a whole, is living its separate life apart from the Middle West. This does not make a federated union incompatible in either case, but there is too much of incompatibility to warrant north and south of Tehachapi dwelling together as one in body, soul and spirit. Pretense of any sort is not a likeable quality and when one butts up against anything as big as Tehachapi mountain and then has the assurance to declare that there is nothing there it is to laugh.

However, this is a matter that primarily concerns Southern California and Arizona. If they can come together in a bond of unity why should the rest of California, north of Tehachapi and the Santa Inez mountains, stand in the way of their happiness? California would then be as big as it needs to be, perfectly homogeneous in topography and character. What more?

But Southern California should not saw itself off in a spirit of rebelliousness. It has had its full share in the government of this commonwealth. It has, within less than thirty years, supplied the state with three very bad governors (Stoneman, Markham and Gage), beside one indifferent one (Waterman), all of whom served the Southern Pacific company first and the people afterward. It has filled many minor offices with men who did likewise. If it had a smaller representation on the board of equalization than it might properly have been accorded the fault was its own. It did not ask for more.

It is not very likely that anything will come of the movement toward state division, but supposing that something should come of it and a new state be formed as above suggested, who would be harmed? Certainly not California. If Southern California were to undertake to cut itself off and become a state without Arizona it might be necessary to prevent it for its own good and the good of the nation. The nation already has enough of pocket-boroughs masquerading as commonwealths, and a state government would be too costly for the people of Southern California to support.

With the atmosphere laden with the smoke of a hundred forest fires, and with many a living fortune reduced within a few days to blackened remains, it would seem that the policy of conservation should receive added impetus.

So the Man from Mars is a myth for the want of an atmosphere conducive to health. What a disturber of dreams these scientists are!

THE VINDICATION OF BALLINGER.

Nothing is more to be lamented than the failure of the facts to warrant statements made in the public interest by those who are battling for the public interest. There has been such failure in the case of Public Opinion vs. R. A. Ballinger. The word of the President will be accepted as final as to the facts.

Special agent Glavis jumped at conclusions. There were circumstances in relation to the Alaska coal lands cases which, upon their face, looked bad for Ballinger. His position was one of great delicacy, but he conducted himself with a sound discretion in the premises, whereas his traducer failed of acting in entire good faith toward the President. That was inexcusable and Glavis is properly to be dismissed from government employ.

In relation to the Montana power sites the facts failed again. The Forestry Service had wind of a movement to monopolize the reservoir and power sites of a district of Montana. In January, 1909, President Roosevelt hurriedly withdrew 1,500,000 acres of lands from entry to forestall the sequestering of these valuable privileges until the public welfare could be better protected by law. In April Ballinger restored this domain to entry. After restoring it to entry he caused investigations to be made as to suitable power sites, had them segregated to the extent of 300,000 acres and withdrawn in May. During this interval he ran the hazard of having these sites filed on. Here was a prima facie case against him. The act looked bad for Ballinger.

But none of those sites were filed on during the interim and the terms of the final withdrawal would have invalidated such filings if they had. This on the faith of the President.

It is up to Pinchot and Pardee to show how they came to be misled as to the facts. Both men are far above any intentional mistatement to the injury of any man or for the advantage of any cause. Someone has deceived them. Let the fault be placed where it belongs.

The California Weekly makes the amende honorable to Secretary Ballinger with the sincerest satisfaction, not that it cares especially for Ballinger, but because the clearing up of his reputation will give courage to those who hope for the conservation of the nation's resources in the interests of all the people of the nation, and not in the interests of a select group of multimillionaire exploiters. To feel that there is at the head of the Department of the Interior a traitor to the common good is to foster public discontent.

Let us repeat: If the facts are as the President has stated them the vindication of Ballinger, as to the specific charges made, is complete. It is not the President but the facts that vindicate him. If the facts are otherwise, then the President has himself been deceived, but it will take strong evidence to prove that the President's findings of fact are not to be relied on. The whole incident is lamentable in the extreme.

BUTTRESSED BY THE LAW.

The sole note in the letter of the President, vindicating the conduct of Secretary Ballinger, justifying a feeling of uneasiness in relation to the policy of the administration (in regard to conservation and the common wealth) is to be found in the concluding paragraph where the President affirms that "He is the best friend to the policy of conservation who insists that every step taken shall be within the law and buttressed by legal authority."

One cannot take exceptions to what this statement denotes, but only to what it connotes. It foreshadows what this paper has already pointed out as likely to differentiate the Taft administration from the Roosevelt. Taft would have the conservation service "buttressed" by the law. Roosevelt required those who would make headway against conservation to be so "buttressed." The one would construe the powers of government strictly, with the view of preventing all trenching upon individual or corporate rights, under the letter of the statute. The other construed the law liberally in the interests of the common good, and would have those whose activities were inspired by zeal for special interests held to strictest legal account for every advance made.

The difference between these two views of governmental policy may easily prove the difference between zenith and nadir, equator and pole, conserving and not conserving the nation's resources. The Taft mind is judicial, not executive. The Roosevelt mind was executive, not judicial, and in an executive office the judicial temperament is as much out of place as the executive temperament is out of place in a judicial office.

We have learned to our sorrow that, for our government to be safely within the law, is to twist its fingers from the tips of their noses in derision of the law. We have learned that the profoundest inequities of our time are "buttressed by legal authority." We, here in San Francisco, now, see successful rascality successfully defending itself against a punishment whose deserving few will question for the commission of crimes practically un-denied, and all because that rascality is able to "buttress" itself, by "legal authority," in "constitutional safeguards," meant to be "thrown about the innocent," for their "protection against tyranny." In all its iniquitous history the Standard Oil crowd, in common with other organized rapacities of our time, have been able, with the friendly aid of such judges as Grosscup, of Chicago, and Anderson of Indiana, to "buttress" themselves to the same effect.

The California Weekly stands for the policy of a liberal construction of conservation and other laws for the protection of the public against organized rapacity, with the purpose of making those laws effective for tying the hands of rapacity rather than the hands of justice, which is not always "buttressed" as it ought to be. If the Taft administration shipwrecks it will be on that rock of a too strict construction of the powers of government, and a too liberal construction of the right of organized and successful rapacity to work its irregularities with pleasure. The fear is that our able President has surrounded himself with legalists of a temperament similar to his own, in which case they will prove as children in the hands of giants as often as they have to try conclusions with the Incorporated Plutocracies of our time.

THE RIGHT TO BE RICH.

In the earnestness of opposition to that money-madness that causes some men to trample upon the rights of others, and to ride rough shod over the moralities of industrial and commercial life, there is danger of taking the untenable position that no man has a right to become rich. As long as there is prodigality in the world there will be rich men, and as long as men leave unlearned the mysteries of co-operation, rich men—reservoirs of capital—must exist or universal poverty result. The right to be rich, if one may become rich honestly, is unalienable.

Upon any street corner of any city at any time may be found a man gazing with staring eyes out into vacancy, seeing nothing because he is doing nothing. In the midst of a human beehive he is a drone for the reason that no one has set a task for him. Give him something to do, with fair pay at the end of the day, and lustre will come into those unseeing eyes and energy into the slack muscles, the drone becomes a worker, happy in his employment, conscious of usefulness, an exemplary citizen. Whoever comes along and finds for this man a task, whereby he can earn two dollars a day for himself, and half a dollar a day beside for his employer, is a benefactor to his race.

This will not be questioned so long as the employer finds capital, and something to do, for one man, or for a small group of men, taking to himself an average of 20 per cent. of the full earning capacity of the man to cover the use of capital and the executive ability needful for keeping the group busy. Where then shall the line be drawn? Shall it be drawn at H. C. Frick, who, at the coke ovens, kept 23,000 such men busy and made them earn him fifty cents per day per man? Why was not the profit made upon the labor of the 23,000th man as honestly earned as that of the labor of the first? But that meant that H. C. Frick, by his ability for organization, made $11,500 per day, $69,000 per week, $3,588,000 per year!

That wealth which is made, however great it may become, by so organizing the forces of industry as to furnish well-paid employment to those incapable of setting themselves profitably to work, taking for the service no more than a reasonable percentage of the worker's gross earnings, is as honestly accumulated as ever dollar was accumulated and, in the accumulation, as high a service is rendered to society as any man is capable of rendering.

It is just as honest and just as meritorious to fetch and carry to and from the markets of the world the products of industry as to create such products upon principles here set down. It is just as honest and as meritorious to facilitate these exchanges of products by banking as either to create or to fetch and carry them. In all cases the executive, the administrative and the financial services performed are worthy of a reasonable recompense and the magnitude of the recompense must be dependent upon the extent of the service. The Standard Oil company is as much entitled to a reasonable margin of profit on its thousandth million gallon of oil sold as upon its first gallon.

But the enormous fortunes of to-day, the fortunes that make the wealth of kings appear insignificant by comparison, were not created in this way. If work was found for idle men the percentage exacted for the service performed was usurious. If products were fetched and carried it was not done in obedience to the doctrine of reasonable rates, but for "what the traffic would bear." If vast fortunes were made in banking they were not compensatory for doing the bookkeeping of the business world. They were the result of financing speculative ventures whereby paper evidences of wealth were sold to an unsuspecting public for more than they were reasonably worth.

These are the methods which now cause every person to ask, in relation to the accumulations of a rich man, "how did he make his money?" On the answer to that question depends the honor that is due to captains of finance and industry, the homage we shall accord them in life, the veneration in death. Of mere antipathy to wealth, of the spirit of enviousness toward the rich, there is little and that little comes only from the vulgar and the mean. But against that brigandage in commerce, industry and finance which has made our hundred-million millionaires the conscience and the self-preserving hostility of the civilized world is in open revolt. And none too soon.

Predicts War.

Lord Northcliffe, owner of The Thunderer, sojourning in Canada, is reported to have predicted war between Germany and England. He lives in an atmosphere where the fear is not to the thought, and yet it is improbable that these nations can go on creating huge armaments that are never to be used. The rivalries of nations were never keener than now. There is no sea or land where Briton and German do not come into rivalry. Only America and Russia, perhaps, among the great nations, are content to haul down the flag from the open seas without an attempt to make a place for it.

Lord Northcliffe lives and moves among those who will make the war if it is made. His set are quite capable of forcing a war to prevent a commercial rival gaining equal station with their own country, and pouring out their country's blood to that end. It has been done in past times and may be done again.

Our danger is different. It is that our own people may force our nation into a war against the judgment, the inclination and the interests of the political powers that be. In such an emergency unpreparedness will be no bar to forcing hostilities. In Britain's case unpreparedness would almost certainly bar the event.

Lord Northcliffe may be no true prophet. It is to be hoped that he is not. A war between Britain and Germany might stop the clock of human progress for half a century. No conceivable result could be worth that price to either nation.

Religion and Health.

Rev. Charles R. Brown, of the First Congregational church, Oakland, recently announced a series of six Sunday evening sermons on "Religion and Health" in its several forms of discussion. The initial sermon was delivered last Sunday evening to a church crowded to the doors. Nothing except an oratorio by a great chorus has so filled the church on a Sunday evening. This furnishes an edifying illustration of the state of the public mind in relation to a very interesting phenomenon. It is not quite clear whether there is in the popular imagination an inkling that the age of miracle may not as definitely have passed as generally supposed, or whether there is a seeking after a sane and substantial basis upon which to found a relationship between holy lives and whole bodies. The tendency to follow wonder-workers is world wide and as old as humanity, and the growth of many healing sects in recent years shows that that tendency has not spent itself. Those who go to hear Doctor Brown go knowing that there will be no wonder-working attempted by him, that his appeal will be to ascertained knowledge and carefully trained reasoning. While the medical fraternity were never more intent than now in seeking material causes and cures for material ailments, there is a clientele that has grown impatient with their plodding ways and that looks trustfully to the substance of things hoped for and evidences of things unseen, yet clung to, regarding the possible relations between godliness and health, salvation and sound bodies. A thronged street as well as a crowded church may be looked for next Sunday evening.

The Central Bank Idea.

The idea of a great central bank of issue and discount is one that the experience of all the great nations, except our own, has proven to work well. This does not prove that it is the only way to create and maintain a currency at once flexible and sound, but it does prove that it is one way. It has the advantage over the independent treasury of being more responsive to needs for elasticity than the treasury can be, but far less responsive than national banks would be if permitted to issue an asset currency under safeguards as needful for governing the central bank as for governing the national banking system. There is but one place where the need for elasticity may be automatically and instantly supplied and that is at the counter of the local bank where the individual citizen comes with his needs for cash and with his cash for which he has no need. An asset banking currency the American people may sanction because they once had something analogous to it and, in the East, it worked well, but before they will consent to a central bank, to which all other banks must look for relief in tight times, they will have to unlearn all that "Old Hickory" taught them. Nelson A. Aldrich is not the teacher to help them to do that unlearning.

It is shrewdly surmised that the equalization cinch had for a purpose the making of the "lowest tax rate ever," in the interests of the candidacy of Governor Gillett to succeed himself. That card was played once before when the Southern Pacific Political Bureau undertook to renominate Henry T. Gage, of San Quentin furniture fame, but it did not work. Gage's method of securing a low rate by leaving the state without a working balance in the treasury was too raw to go down with the people.

If, as suspected, the purpose of the cinching of Southern California, by the three Southern Pacific members of the State Board of Equalization voting thereof, was to force that part of the state to vote for the constitutional amendment providing for a new system of taxation, it will be in order to scrutinize that measure with renewed care to see where the "bug" is.

The Pacific Rural Press notes that, at Sheephead Bay, New York, twelve California colts, only one year old, brought an average of $1,488 per head and quite topped the market. That does not imply that the outlawing of racetrack gambling in this state has worked serious harm to the industry of rearing fine horses.

Men may smile at the disquieting observations of James J. Hill on farming in America, but the unpalatable truth is that not even James himself has skinned the farmers of the Northwest as artistically and effectually as the farmers have skinned the broad acres they have tilled.

Mr. Tomalty quite agrees with the Republican platform, and promoters of the Crocker candidacy, that "civic peace" is extremely desirable, and he looks with signal disfavor upon this raking up of old personalities.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"Whosoever loves the golden mean is secure from the sordidness of an antiquated cell and too prudent to have a palace that might expose him to envy." So wrote Lord Julius Flaccus some years before the dawn of the christian era. Many hundred years earlier than Horace, however, another wrote "Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me."

This is the wisdom of the ancients and, judging from the spirit of our own time, chiefly of the ancients. There are whole literatures today whose purpose it is to exalt the man who, from youth up, sought only to rise above his fellows, to hoist himself upon their shoulders, to reap where he had not sown that he might at length die in the midst of a four million dollar estate, "burnt out" at sixty, not a stranger to vanity and powerless to buy for "convenient" for him.

There never was a time when there was greater need for correct views of life than now, and if the wisdom of the ancients can contribute to that saner view by all means let us make their wisdom our own. Unfortunately, however, their precepts were more valuable than their practices, for both Horace and Solomon were "burnt out," dead and buried before they were sixty years old.

The world has need for men of executive capacity, but it may be doubted if it has greater need for Napoleons of finance than for Napoleons of politics and war. The Napoleons the world has known have left more sorrows than happiness in their track. It is not the land that has the highest peaks and the most of them that is most fortunate, but the land that has the widest expanses of arable, fertile acres. So is it with nations of men, the most fortunate is not the one that can boast of the most Rockefellers, Harrimans, Morgans and Sages, but rather the one that has the greatest percentage of well-to-do, self-reliant and self-sustaining citizens, equal before the law and facing an equality of opportunity. We are in error when we esteem great immoral forces as great human benefactors merely because they have wielded great instrumentalities. The world is not a pennyworth richer for the late Mr. Harriman's four million dollar home.

But poverty is as much to be dreaded as great riches, shiftlessness as an overweening ambition to acquire. If we would avoid poverty, as certainly as we should not give our lives wholly to money-grabbing, we must be diligent in business. Security from the "sordidness of an antiquated cell" (a poor house,) is not to be insured by financial carelessness. There will be no dearth of heartfelt ambition even if no American youth sets out to become a Carnegie, a Ryan or a Rogers. Better have in any community ten men each worth a hundred thousand than one alone worth a million. The thing that will make our land happiest, healthiest and best to live in is the thing upon which the youth of the land should fix their ambitions. We increase our national wealth by leaps and bounds to small purpose if ninety-five hundredths of it is to be reserved in the preserves of 5 per cent. of the population.

Let us teach our youths that they must, first of all, pull their own weight, then lend a hand to those who try to pull their weight cannot. Adjure them that they are not to strive to be masters of men, but soldiers for the common good; that the progress of the race is not to be measured by the achievements of a few, but by the moral and industrial uplift of the whole human level. If our father's days were happier than our own it was because the millionaires of those days could be counted upon the fingers, whereas, now, men who are millionaires a hundred times over can be so counted. Equality of opportunity is passing away. We have pursued false ideals, and the wisdom of the ancients may help us to correct our reckoning.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Savings Bank Deposits Increase.

On November 27th of last year the 2,011 national banks of the United States, having savings departments, reported deposits there amounting to $331,562,688. On June 23d of this year, or less than seven months later, they reported deposits amounting to $380,494,598, an increase of $48,931,910, or 14 1/2 per cent. Applying this ratio of increase to all the other savings institutions of the country, which last year reported deposits of $3,560,837,916, and adding the result to the amount of savings given above, the increase in savings thus deposited would amount to $820,223,459. A pretty good record for seven months, being, as it is, an average of ten dollars apiece to every man, woman and child in the country, or fifty dollars to every family of five persons. Of course, that the ratio of increase is about the same in other banks as in the savings departments of national institutions, is assumed, but it is not probable that such a presumption is far wrong. At any rate, it gives room for faith that the cry, "hard times!" soon will be "heard to cease."

Sheep as Range-Regenerators.

Experiments made by the forest service promise to be of great benefit to stockmen, who have been injured by the disappearance of mountain bunch-grass on overgrazed ranges. The problem that has confronted the stockmen, and to which the forest service appears to have found an answer, is that of successfully reseeding the barren ranges. The service tried three methods. In the first the ground was seeded, and not otherwise treated. In the second brush or a harrow was dragged over the seeded tract. In the third a flock of sheep was driven twice over the treated area. The sharp little hoofs of the sheep produced by the best results. The growth on the ground which was seeded and not otherwise treated was scanty. In the beginning the other two methods showed quite equal results, but when drouth came the growth from the seed beaten into the ground by the trampling of many tiny hoofs was that which endured investigation revealing that the roots extended one-half to one inch deeper in the soil than those from the brushed or harrowed seed. The information thus obtained has been given out by the forest service, and the moral is so clear that all stockmen may profit. First scatter the seed of the bunch-grass over the depleted ground, then drive the sheep over it, and leave the rest to nature.

Sowing the World With Bibles.

The work of sowing the habitable globe with Bibles goes strenuously on, and whatever the attitude of the reader toward the old book, he cannot fail to be interested in data relating to that world-sowing which have been promulgated by the British and Foreign Bible Society. According to the society's report there were given out last year complete or partial Bibles to the number of 5,934,711. Of these 884,195 were complete Bibles, 1,116,674 were New Testaments, and 3,933,842 were other portions of the book. Note, then, that in a single year one Bible, or part of a Bible, were distributed to about every 250 people, civilized, barbarous, or semi-barbarous, on the face of the globe. The books thus scattered were in 418 different languages, six of these being new translations. Besides these, entire or partial Bibles were printed in embossed letters of thirty-one different languages for the blind. Portions of the report relating to the work of colporteurs were interesting, various of these Bible-disseminators having been arrested as spies in Nicaragua, robbed in Burmah, driven out of Peruvian villages by priests who burned their books, stored in the Philippines, mobbed by Social Democrats in Germany, and beaten by Moslems in Baluchistan. Perhaps, after all, it does not matter greatly what our attitude toward the Bible, for, quite regardless of it, the world more and more is placing it on its "five-foot shelf."

Suppose the World's Iron Gives Out.

M. Sjogren, a Swedish expert, estimates the world's supply of iron ore at 9,250,000,000 tons. At first thought this may seem a rather liberal supply, but the international geological congress, which will assemble in Stockholm next year, will devote a large part of its session to an investigation of Sjogren's data in the none too justifiable hope that it may be able to demonstrate that he has largely underestimated the supply. We say "in the hope," for, if the Swedish expert is right, the finish of the world's iron ore is unpleasantly close. At the present time such ore is being used at the rate of 150,000,000 to 180,000,000 tons annually. Now divide the world's supply, given above, by the lesser of these numbers—so as to hold our iron as long as we can—and you will find that the entire supply will be exhausted in sixty-one years and eight months, or less than two generations of men. And "after that the deluge?" or—what? It is not strange that the geological congress will interest itself in the matter; it would appear to be advisable. Nor that the congress will tend to or subtract an ounce from the world's ore, but perhaps it could suggest something that could be done to relieve the situation.

Japan an Apostate from Vegetarianism.

Heretofore vegetarians have "pointed with pride" to the hardy Japanese, who perform have been almost exclusively vegetarians (except for fish) in their diet, as a peculiarly happy demonstration of the virtue of their theory. Go to the Japanese, thou meat-eater, they said, consider his everlasting rice, and be wise. Now their "striking example" is to be lost to them, and far as the Japanese diet is concerned, at any rate. During the war with Russia the little brown soldiers were much afflicted by the disease known as beri-beri, and since then Baron Takaki, a prominent Japanese scientist, has been investigating the sickness and has demonstrated by many experiments that it can be eradicated by a diet of meat and barley in the place of rice. Accepting the proof as conclusive, the Mikado has sent to England for stock cattle, and soon meat will be on the army bill of fare. It is expected, by some, that meat will increase the stature of the Japanese, but this remains to be seen. As to adding to their hardihood and endurance, the best Russian authorities claim that it cannot be done, and it is generally realized that they are qualified to give expert evidence on this subject.

What the Women's Clubs Are Doing.

Women's clubs, which were first organized, apparently, with the idea of endeavoring to ascertain what Browning meant, or to listen to essays on the Social Life of the Singhalese, to discuss the nebular hypothesis, have taken long steps since that early (although comparatively recent) day, and now have become an important factor in the betterment of mankind. Browning is growing dusty on the shelf, the Singhalese are allowed to lead their own social life, and women are doing the good things that men too long had neglected to do. So multifarious and variform are their helpful labors that it is impossible to enumerate them, but here are a few instances. Leave what they have done in San Francisco out of consideration, for we should know what it is, whether we do or not. In Dallas, Texas, which had suffered annually from yellow and other fevers, it was the women who put an end to them by seeing that pools of stagnant, mosquito-breeding water each spring are covered with oil. In Dallas, too, the excellent bill of health to the women. Pittsburgh and Allegheny are dotted by children's playgrounds and recreation parks practically all secured through the efforts of women, and yet they began this splendid work barely thirteen years ago. In only less degree a similar work has been done by women in Philadelphia, Detroit, and, indeed, in a large number of the cities of this country. In Harrisburg, Penn., they went further, and began a work of street-cleaning which the men at the women's instigation, since have continued. In Carlisle, Penn., Cranford, N. J. and numerous small cities they have insisted on town-cleaning, and have secured it. It is reported that women's clubs have established more libraries than has Mr. Carnegie, although they have not so well advertised the fact. The list might be continued almost indefinitely, but this should be enough to convince the most Doubting Thomas that women's clubs, although a new, are a most potent factor in the betterment of conditions under which the people of this nation live.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not put a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk or employee that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

Hamerton's "The Intellectual Life."

Do not be frightened at the name. It is not a "high-brow" book in any sense, abstruse or austere. It is rather a series of gossiping letters, addressed to people in various walks of life who love books or pictures or science or any other intellectual exercise, whether they practice literature or art as a profession, or simply employ their leisure in adding to the riches of their minds.

To such persons Philip Gilbert Hamerton wrote the fruits of his own full experience as a student and bookworm, artist and author. He wished to help others gather the enjoyment he had achieved by the exercise of the higher powers of the mind. He told how various of his friends surmounted the obstacles of poverty, lack of leisure, unpleasant environment, and the like, in their search for the opportunity to enjoy "the golden books." He added his own experience and the helpful suggestions that this experience brought to his mind. He illustrated all with examples from the lives of the conspicuously successful artists and authors and scholars. The result is "The Intellectual Life."

Here is a book that is primarily entertaining. It abounds in anecdotes, witty, humorous, and wise. Its helpful hints to the student are in no way "advice" or moralizing. They are friendly suggestions, offered mainly by indirection as the obvious conclusions to be drawn from the experience of the great. Incidentally, the reader learns an amazing lot about the habits and personalities of famous men.

But best of all is the intimate acquaintance one makes with Hamerton himself, a sincere, generous, hard-working lover of the beautiful, whose life was an incarnation of the best of men in his own generation. He has a chair close by the fire where men of like minds meet to enjoy the gentle fellowship of books.

AN AUTHOR'S AFFECTIONS.

Maurice Hewlett, the English romancer, made a pregnant statement recently in the course of a newspaper interview. In effect, he said that the most vital prerequisite to the writing of a truly successful book is that the author shall have a profound affection for his subject.

This sounds like a truism. But consider the avalanche of production of books to-day, and try to imagine that the writer of each is an ardent lover of his subject. E. Phillips Oppenheim publishes two novels a year. Either he has an amazing breadth and depth of human sympathy, or else he hits only the shallows of affection for his characters. And the latter is the truth. And the same truth applies to most of the writings of the day—or of all time, for the matter of that.

Observe how nearly all the writings of all great authors, less than the superficially great, follow a recognizable channel which is easily associated, in each case, with the author's profoundest interests and fundamental affections. Walter Scott, to whom medievalism was the incarnation of poetry and chivalry—see how his works cling to the age. See how religious and moral in color the works of George Eliot's work. See Dickens always in his London and amongst his poor.

"A man of great passions, who knows his dictionary and grammar," is Taine's definition of a poet. Anybody with a moderate degree of talent can learn to write a reasonably clear and sound English prose. No man can learn to be a lover. A man may deceive a hundred women with false pretenses of love. But a writer, placing his record of affection for his subject on the printed page, submits that record to a million eyes in every stage of coldness, doubt or criticism. He need not think that he shall escape detection if he feigns affection. The human heart is a subtle and discerning member. It does not long mistake affectionation for affection. And it detects insincerity. It will only one reward for it, neglect and oblivion.

THE LITERARY CONSCIENCE.

The word "moral" has been so restricted in meaning by common usage that it now hardly signifies more to the popular understanding than the condition of being chaste in the person and observant of the Ten Commandments. Its full meaning is much more comprehensive. To be moral is more than to be merely in harmony with the generally accepted code of action. It is to be, in addition to this, in harmony with the dictates of one's own conscience.

Thus, it is immoral for a man to do less than his best. Great writers have been peculiarly sensitive to the voice of their literary conscience in this respect. They have realized that it is immoral to offer to the public less than the best work they could possibly do. They have listened to their literary conscience in other ways. They have felt deeply that it is immoral to attempt a deception of their readers by feigning a belief in pleasant lies instead of in the naked truth. The greatest writers have told the whole truth of life with a frankness so complete that it startles the reader into acquiescence.

The literary conscience, then, is an individual writer's code of ethics for his own guidance; a subtler and more difficult code to follow than conventional morality; epitomized in Shakespeare's "To thine own self be true."

THE POETS LAUREATE.

The complete list of poets laureate of England is as follows: Edmund Spenser, 1591-99; Samuel Daniel, 1599-1619; Ben Jonson, 1619-37; Sir William Davenant, 1660-68; John Dryden, 1670-89; Thomas Shadwell, 1689-92; Nahum Tate, 1692-1715; Nicholas Rowe, 1715-18; Lawrence Eusden, 1718-30; Colley Cibber, 1730-57; William Whitehead, 1757-85; Thomas Warton, 1785-90; Henry James Pye, 1790-1813; Robert Southey, 1813-43; William Wordsworth, 1843-50; Alfred Tennyson, 1850-92; and the present poet laureate, Alfred Austin, who was appointed in 1896 to succeed Tennyson.

There have been only three interregnums in the succession, the longest being the twenty-three years following the death of Ben Jonson. The other two were: two years between Davenant and Dryden, and four years between Tennyson and Austin.

It is interesting to note, from this list, how often a contemporaneous judgment of poetic worth—and a partly political judgment at that—has been sustained by posterity.

The character of Rebecca in "Ivanhoe" was drawn by Sir Walter Scott upon the description given him by Washington Irving of Miss Rebecca Gratz, of Philadelphia, who did a great deal of kind, unpretentious work among the poor.

Californian Poets' Corner

Emma Frances Dawson, who holds a recognized position among the versifiers of California, is best known by her more ambitious efforts; but some readers will probably prefer the following simple lines, which, however, abound in poetic fancy.

TEA-TIME.

By Emma Frances Dawson.

The kettle sings a sweet and ancient rune,
Gives gurgling hint of not recalling tune,
Tries diverse keys, to then ere long begin
A hum like giant top in dizzy spin.
Not sad like cricket's file, or wind's whist—hoos—
Or what the fire may be roaring impetuous
Of mine or forest till it fall a swoon—
Our cares float from us in its vapor thin.

The kettle sings—
With arm akimbo, cap awry, buffoon,
Of merry hompne mien, and jolly croon,
No hint of room outside the pane, wherein Move mockingly our mystic shadow-kin
But home and mother's smile, this blessed boon

The kettle sings.

IMAGINATIVE LITERATURE.

The function of imaginative literature is to amuse, using that word in its highest sense. A poem, a drama, or a novel is a mental diversion, designed to lift the reader or spectator out of himself and out of the shackles of actuality, to live for a few hours in a realm where speech is rhythmic and felicitous, where the dreams of an ideal life come true.

That this diversion may grip the reader's mind, the author must create the illusion of reality. His story must have a beginning and an end; it must move rationally through plausible actions in a manner to justify the end as a believable and natural conclusion. The composition must, in short, however preposterous the premises upon which it rests, "hang together" as a logical product of those premises.

In human affairs, nearly all the incidents of life rest upon the actions of individuals. Nearly all actions are the projections of human thoughts. Nearly all human thoughts are actuated by a motive. All actions affect the actor, and other people, for good or evil. Thus motives have a moral significance. Hence actions have a moral significance. So the illusion of reality in literature must take cognizance of moral forces in shaping the destinies of characters.

Every writer takes account of this moral element of life in proportion as it appeals to him individually. Not even the most frivolous writer of the lightest comedy can escape it entirely. His novel or play must be moral in the sense that it must not condone actions or motives that are destructive of society. This limitation makes it inevitable that every piece of imaginative writing shall point a moral lesson, that is, that it must always reflect correctly the profound result of human experience, which is, that virtue and justice must ultimately prevail. Any breach of this limitation is instinctively repugnant to the mind, and the work that sanctions it is quickly repudiated by the public as unfit for preservation.

On the other hand, writers of a serious cast of mind often subordinate everything else to the moral issues in their work, and grow bitter when the world refuses to read. These writers have not realized the primary function of literature, its mission of diverting the mind by creating the illusion of reality. Life is action, and morality appears in it only when we pause to contemplate the sequence of causes and effects as they are illustrated by events. So, to produce the illusion of life, it must be done by the presentation of action. To produce the illusion of the moral principle involved, the presentation of actions must be in such sequence as would, in actual life, compel the inference of the moral. But the moral itself must not arise from its natural position of an inescapable inference from the facts to a position where it predominates over the action itself. Where the moral issue overshadows the panorama of incidents the work ceases to be imaginative literature and becomes an abstract argument in philosophy. Such a work fails of public approval because it is fundamentally an imposture, it is morality in the guise of entertainment, with the element of amusement left out. That the author is sincere in his mission to reform is no remedy. He is, unconsciously, perhaps, but none the less actually, insincere in attempting to disguise morality as entertainment.

This is no argument that imaginative literature ought not to seek to be instructive. It should. Indeed, it must. But it is merely a statement of a principle, a principle that is too often overlooked by both authors and critics; that the diversion or amusement of the reader is the primary and inescapable function of imaginative writing, with instruction as a secondary and wholly inferential function. The public, in the long run, never fails to demand the recognition of this principle. It has relegated to oblivion every fiction that did not measure up to it.

AN APPEAL FOR THE PUBLIC SCHOOL

By MARGARET MAHONEY, M. D.
President San Francisco Teachers' Federation.

The Public School system is the most important and should be the most cherished institution of our country.

The schools prepare the citizen for his place in life. They mould the individual for good or bad. To them must the masses look for intellectual development. They set our educational standards.

It is an acknowledged fact in pedagogics that as the teacher is so is the school. She is the living, active factor in directing the destiny of our country in so far as it depends on the proper education of our children. The teacher in fact and in law is the class teacher, the one who does the instructing, the one who comes in constant contact with the pupil. Too long have the public schools of San Francisco been conducted in the interest and for the benefit of a few school principals, who have shaped the policy of the department none too wisely and who too often terrorize their assistant teachers.

This attitude that results in paralyzing fear is also adopted by school boards, the personnel of which seems to make little difference, so that we must look to those who shape the policy of the administration for redress.

There is in our schools a continuous reign of terror. Teachers trembling for the tenure of their positions are unfitted to properly fulfil their daily work, which should be carried on in calm and security.

The School Board claims the right to transfer teachers without giving any reason for so doing, personal spite oftentimes being the motive disguised by the phrases "discipline" and "good of the department." Transfers of this kind are often but a preliminary to a berth on the unassigned list, which in some cases amounts practically to dismissal. Unassigned teachers are paid only when they teach, are substitutes, and if the call is a long one they receive only the minimum monthly wage scheduled for the class.

There are two factors to be considered—the rights of the teachers as American citizens and as human beings and the welfare of the pupils. That teachers who ask for a leave of absence on account of sickness should be granted the same with a proviso that they be put on the unassigned list is a refinement of cruelty. It is scarcely necessary to mention that teachers receive no pay when out on sick leave.

If our teachers are to train honest, independent, fearless American citizens they must be untrammelled in the performance of their duty. They must be assured security in exercising the rights of American citizens without fear or favor as guaranteed by the Constitution of these United States, not hampered by petty rules made by despotic principals.

It is also requisite that the salaries of class teachers be advanced to a figure equal to that paid firemen and policemen. No class teacher of five years experience should receive less than $1200 a year. An increase on a basis of 20 per cent means that those who already have large salaries will receive a substantial increase, while the poorly paid teacher will receive but a small advance.

It is the salary of the class teacher that should be increased, not the salaries of principals who are already receiving from $200 to $300 per month, although if the recipients of those salaries are qualified for their positions the amount is none too much.

Night Schools.

No branch of the service deserves more attention and receives less than do the night schools.

It is here that the young boy and the young girl who are forced to go out early into the world to commence the battle for existence have an opportunity to fit themselves to cope with the more favored children of fortune. It is here again that the heterogeneous mass of foreigners who come from all quarters of the world to supply the manual labor needed to develop the country are moulded into American citizens.

In the night schools we need the very best teachers that the country provides.

The hours in the class room are necessarily short, but the outside preparation for the work is most important and takes long hours of study.

Pupils giving their leisure hours, after a day of hard work, to self improvement cannot afford any waste of time. Trained teachers of exceptional ability are indispensable, and such teachers deserve and must receive proper compensation, not the miserable pittance now paid. Night school teachers are the only teachers whose salaries were not advanced to meet the advanced cost of living in San Francisco after the disaster. If a night school teacher is absent from school for one night she loses one twentieth of her monthly payment, while a day school teacher for absence loses but one thirtieth. No reason for the discrimination has been vouchsafed those most concerned. To ask questions concerning such matters is looked upon as insubordination.

The plan is to keep teachers silent through intimidation and thus the only persons who know the workings of the schools are advisedly kept in a state of subjugation and fear that prevents their advocating needed reforms.

Anyone fitted to fill the responsible position of a class teacher is entitled to a reasonable discretion in methods of teaching and discipline of pupils.

As a proof of the intolerable conditions, I call your attention to the following resolution of the board of education which appeared in the San Francisco Call of September 9, 1909:

The rules regarding probationary periods for teachers of the department, which have been in effect for some time, were drafted yesterday into definite form. The resolution reads:

Resolved, That the following regulations are hereby added to the rules of this department:

Teachers assigned for the first time to regular positions in this department, and teachers of the department assigned, by promotion or otherwise, to positions in which their ability had not previously been tested, shall serve a probationary term of two years, and until their instructions and discipline in such positions are shown to be satisfactory, before they become eligible to rank as approved, regular teachers.

Probationers who have served a term of two years as such, shall be entitled to rank as approved, regular teachers, when their instruction, discipline and the example they set to their pupils, shall have been reported to the board as fully satisfactory by their principals, by the superintendent and the school committee, and said reports shall have been approved by resolution of the board of education.

In case the work of any probationer is reported unsatisfactory or poor, the board may, in its discretion, extend the term of probation, or discharge the person reported against.

Assistant teachers whose instruction, discipline or example is reported unsatisfactory or poor, by their principals, shall be transferred to another school. Teachers transferred for these causes, shall be on probation for at least one school term.

That means that every teacher is at the mercy of the principal whose report at once imperils her position. No matter how competent she is, no matter how satisfactory her work may have been for years, she is immediately on probation. No wonder that class teachers are nervous wrecks! No wonder that women of ability are seeking occupation in other lines! No wonder that our schools are falling into disrepute!

The position of every class teacher in the San Francisco school department is in jeopardy.

Miss Sophie Wright, founder of the first night school in New Orleans, is one of the few women who have received the loving cup which is annually presented to the citizen who has done the greatest public good for the city during the year. In this cup was a check for $10,000, which had been subscribed by the citizens of New Orleans to pay the debt Miss Wright has assumed in enlarging her night school to make room for the pupils who were clamoring for admission.

CLAY, FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH STS.
OAKLAND, CAL.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

When Ma Cleans House.

She takes up carpets and the rugs,
And puts them down again;
Picks up old bottles, scraps and jugs,
And puts them down again;
And when my pa says, "Goodness me!
Where I shall eat I cannot see."
She turns upon him then, and sighs—
She puts him down again.

A cloud of dust is in the air,
To settle down again,
And wildly waving is ma's hair—
It may come down again—
And pa, he heaves a bitter sigh,
And seeks a place he knows near by,
And orders balls—the kind called high—
And puts them down again.

The bedsteads lie in scattered heaps.
For they come down again;
Ma's skirt above her ankles keeps,
And don't come down again.
And pa, he says he'd gladly pay
To hear the words that Job would say
Upon his wife's house-cleaning day.
If he came down again.

She gets up everything, does ma—
And puts it down again—
"Including of her back," says pa,
"Which don't come down again."
He really said it, yes, he did,
And then he dodged a kettle-tild.
I guess he's in the attic again,
And won't come down again.

New Test of Spiritual Character.

"George Sterling," says Michael Williams, "once said to me that he considered a man's attitude toward Ambrose Bierce a criterion, in many respects, of that man's spiritual character."

That was right, pretty and just that the bouquet passed by Bierce to Sterling should be thus lightly tossed by Sterling back to Bierce, but, George, dear George—with much admiration for the splendid imagery and magnificent verbiage of your finer poems—are we to believe that you meant the tommyrot which Williams attributes to you? Mind that you did not say that a man's literary taste might be judged by his attitude toward Bierce, but that it was a criterion of his spiritual character. Why, George!

Is the highest admiration of Bierce to be found only in heaven, the utmost condemnation only in hell? If a man esteems Bierce's intellect, but holds to an old-fashioned notion that it is unmanly brutally to attack and satirize women, (numerous poetesses then of California, from Charlotte Perkins Gilman down) and to besmear the names of the whose writings, if homely, have appealed to the better emotions of mankind (Riley, Wilkins-Freeman et al), does he thereby prove that he is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils or does he merely show a readiness to be so fitted? Shine the gilt of high talent never so brightly on Bierce's coat, must we close our eyes to the smirch of grosser human clay upon it, and must we do this or so warp our spiritual character that it will be damned? What is the direct relation between Bierce and our spiritual characters, anyway?

George, I refuse to believe that you said it, or, if you did, it was on some occasion when you talked, and talked, and talked, until you emitted words that came from your tongue instead of from your back. There is no connection between any man's spiritual character and his attitude toward Bierce. Indeed, I understand—although you may not believe it—that there are several persons of very exemplary and admirable character who never have heard of Bierce. Perhaps, however, they are like the heathen, who, according to the old doctrine, were to be damned, not for their actions, but for what they didn't know. I fancy you would better call Michael Williams in, George.

The Opinions of Rulus.

Some men fool their teller mortals so easy they can't help feelin' an abidin' hope they'll be able to pull some wool over the Almighty's eyes, so they serve God on one day an' Mammon on six, trustin' their labors'll be duly recognized by the int'rested parties.

I haven't heered anybody say 'twas so, but I reckon Dr. Cook found the north pole by tracin' a line due north from the top of Mt. McKinley.

If you want to realize how transient earthly glory is jest reflect that three generations of Harriman's children may make them what the Vanderbilts now are.

I'm some int'rested in all this talk 'bout suppressin' fires, but I ain't goin' to reely wake up till the massaker includes Reas.

I b'lieve in wimmen's moral superiority, but 'tain't es noticeable es 't would be ef they hadn't 'sociated with men es much es they have.

Faith without works is dead, but works without faith want well 'nough to attend the funeral.

Concernin' the Fathers' Day that's proposed, I can't think of any better way to celebrate it than by chloroformin' some fathers we've all knowed.

'Tain't fer me to suggest to Mr. Roosevelt, but I calculate that, es between attackin' elephants in Africa an' the purgatory int'rests in America, the balance favors the latter sport. A "Anxious Inquirer" writes me to tell him how he can pick out them that are called "Christian nations." I don't know of but one reel certain way: Let him hunt up them that has made the most 'rangements to kill their feller men.

The Hopeless Imbecile Heard From.

"Who is this that is dead?" the Hopeless Imbecile inquired.

"It is," the Wise Man responded, "Edward H. Harriman, that peerless strategist, that financial genius, that railroad colossus, that—" "Is it for him that so many flags are at half-mast?" the Imbecile interrupted.

"Certainly. All men unite to honor his memory: to his shade, the people lift their hallelujahs of praise, while the newspapers unite in proclaiming his glory."

"Is he the same Harriman who was responsible for a 10 per cent. raise in freight rates a few months ago, regardless of the fact that he already was receiving double interest on his investment?"

"Well, yes, but he is dead now, and—" "And is he the man who floated the Alton deal on a flood of stockholders' tears, and did various things of the nature of—"

"No doubt he is, but he is de—" "And are the newspapers that now unite in proclaiming his glory the same that bitterly denounced him for these things that he did?"

"I guess they are, but he is—" "And are the people who are lifting hallelujahs the same people who had to go down into meagerly lined pockets to pay increased freights he had decreed or to offset a squeeze of stockholders?"

"Of course they are, but he is—" "Say," the Hopeless Imbecile interrupted, "I want you to notice that I am not lifting a single hallelujah. I had to choose between hallelujahs and memory, and I chose the latter." "Yes, but you are a hopeless imbecile," the Wise Man retorted.

"Sure!" said the Hopeless Imbecile, and he was so foolish that he looked as if he were glad of it.

The One Drawback.

"I hear that Mabel did very well—married a title." "Yes, it would have been very nice if it had not been for one thing." "What thing?" "Why, the man that was thrown in with the title."

Thoughtful Man on Mayoralty Situation.

"How true it is," the Thoughtful Man remarked, "that all things work together for good, especially if they have been worked by the right people and in the right way. Take the mayoralty situation, for instance. How delightful it is to see it fermenting. We have three candidates, and any one of them will do. Stand with me, in imagination, and watch their cohorts pass."

"The battalions of McCarthy march before us, having been placed first because the wind was blowing from the other direction. The sight is inspiring. Never have more stalwart companies been turned out of the tenderloin or adjacent districts. Proudly, magnificently, fearlessly, they march beneath their carmine banner bearing the patriotic slogan:

If Any Man Attempts to Interfere
With Business
Chloroform Him on the Spot.

"Now come the battalions of the peerless Leland, who resides in San Francisco except when a killing in high life does not prevent his going to Santa Cruz. How valiantly they march, how fearlessly, how—yes, how, beneath the lavender banner bearing the perumed wary of the people:

If Any Man Attempts to Interfere
With Business
Asphyxiate Him on the Spot.

"And now come the glittering cohorts of Crocker, each and every man of them guaranteed to serve both God and Mammon with phenomenal success. Glad in spotless white artistically shaven into black, they march onward, and ever onward, proud and unblinking, beneath the banner bearing their mystic shibboleth:

If Any Man Attempts to Interfere
With Business
Administer Gas on the Spot.

"Can't you see how all things work together for good? Who gives a whoop which one of them is elected? We don't, and if the blinded wretches who prefer justice to business have any choice they can take it. There was a time when we feared that the weak-minded justice-worshippers would put up a man who would back the unnatural Heney, but we unduly flattered them by the fear. You bet all things work together for good, don't they?"

"The Bible says, 'to them that love the Lord,' said I. 'Well, they're not working much in this case,' said he.

What Would You Expect?

"The 'interests' in Congress shot tariff reform full of holes, didn't they?" "Of course."

"Why of course?" "Well, would you expect them to have their Cannon on hand and not use it?"

When You've Made a Million Dollars.

When you've made a million dollars, and the public bows to you—Or, at least, unto your dollars—as the public's bound to do:

When you're feeling somewhat "chesty" at the thought that facta est res publica.

In the little game of grabbing you are counted of the best. Then oftentimes you feel a symptom which you look upon with dread. And the doctor, being summoned, feels your pulse and shakes his head. And a startling something happens which your heirs, perhaps, deplore—And no more you're worth a million when your hearse is at the door.

TALKS WITH OUR READERS.

Editor, California Weekly.

Some weeks ago you invited criticism from readers and that they might share in making the paper what it should be. Your invitation may excite a comment.

Coming as a human being, I was deeply offended by something on the line of your article, of September 10, in Harriman, and, particularly by one short paragraph, which seemed to show a strange lack of common sense, weakness and failure.

It is not by blaming and the restraint of decency that you can make a newspaper. Journalism can gain no honor from punishing people. Your public feels every thing that is done, and withdraws a corresponding amount of its confidence.

No one is not concerned with your summary of the "wreck" of the California. I do not even print against the San Francisco a vendor. But to have taken in respect for personal disaster and death is, I think, safe to have surprised painfully a great number of your readers.

Yours respectfully,

E. S. T.

N. H. Smith, Cal. Sept. 18, 1909.

There is no way of foreknowing just how the written word will impress the reader when it reaches him, but we anticipated more unfavorable comment, and less of commendation, than we have received on the article above referred to. It was extremely unconventional. By all the canons of propriety it was in bad taste and known to be so when it was written, but it was believed then, and believed now, that the end justified these faults. That end was to help to unmask the false ideals which an unregulated thirst for power has caused to be set up in this country. The literature of the last half century has over-exalted the kind of success that Mr. Harriman achieved and inspired emulation of men of his character. Our purpose was to help to shatter that ideal and to do it at a time when it would be most effective.

The particular paragraph to which our correspondent refers, the paragraph relating to the surrender of this mighty man to a sick stomach, was repulsive, almost brutal. It takes a good deal to justify it. Perhaps it cannot be justified, but it was penned with premeditation, not because of any lack of sympathy for a sick man, be he rich or poor, but to set out in a striking way the essential vulnerability of those before whom we too often stand in an attitude of submissive and humble vassalage.

However lovable E. H. Harriman may have been as husband, father, brother, friend, he was, to our way of thinking, an enemy to society. His life was a culpable mistake. His ideals were false, his influence upon the affairs of men was pernicious. The time to say so is when syphantic prelates are lauding his character and hired eulogists are spreading a glamour of wizardry over his achievements.

Herodotus somewhere tells of a people who bowed themselves down in slavish idleness before an image that they had themselves made and set up. An iconoclast came along and, springing upon the shoulders of the statue, smote its head with a hammer and crushed it. The multitude would have torn him limb from limb had it not been that rats ran out of the holes his hammer smote and broke the idolatrous spell and the minds of a people were liberated. That was an ungracious task, but there is need for many a breaker of false images when a wrongly directed ambition has built for us Colossuses of Railroads and other Mighty Men whom we value beyond their deserts and fear beyond necessity.

We confess the impropriety and indelicacy of the article which our correspondent criticizes, and acknowledge his point as well taken, but, in avoidance, we plead the urgency of even a brutally frank treatment of the event in the interests of good faith toward those of the rising generation whose ideals are still in a formative state. Unless these considerations justify the article under discussion, then there was no proper justification for it and it must be conceded a mistake of judgment.

The Thing We Strive For.

Sacramento, Cal., Sept. 9, 1909.
The California Weekly,
San Francisco, Cal.
Gentlemen—Go on with the good work. The California Weekly has the highest tone of any secular paper it has been my privilege to read. The "Deeper Significance of Living" has frequently contained a personal message to the writer.

Yours very truly,

JOHN H. WENTZ.

We have received many, very many, assurances to the same effect as that one so frankly given us. We appreciate it. It is a thing we have striven for and we are rejoiced whenever we have reason to feel that we have been able to hit the mark. One disadvantage there is to the maintenance of an almost constant high tone of expression. When there is a fall from grace the effect is something awful to contemplate.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

The Gold Mountain mine, in San Bernardino county, formerly owned by "Lucky" Baldwin, has been sold by Joseph De la Mar to Thomas H. Oxman, who expects to work the mine on an extensive scale.

It is expected that the picking of cotton in the Imperial valley will begin next week. The work will be done by Mexicans from Texas and Lower California.

The Oroville chamber of commerce has decided that citrus fairs shall be held in that city annually, beginning in 1910.

E. B. Willis, formerly managing editor of the Sacramento Union, and more recently of the Auburn Republican, is about to begin the publication of a weekly newspaper in Sacramento.

Demetrius Constable A. E. Woods has been arrested at Chico on a charge of murder. Woods shot and killed an insane Chinaman while attempting to take the latter into custody, and it is alleged that the circumstances did not justify the deed.

The Sonoma and Lake County Railway company has reincorporated under the name of the Highland Pacific company. It proposes to build a line from Santa Rosa to Lakeport, with branches to Upper Lake and Kelseyville.

By a vote of nearly five to one, citizens of San Diego county decided to bond that county in the sum of $1,250,000 for building a system of macadamized highways.

The state fish commission recently distributed 30,000 young rainbow trout in various creeks near Paskenta in the coast range mountains.

F. S. Granger has been granted a franchise for the construction of a railroad from Fresno to Hanford by way of Summit Lake.

Two sons of James Norrington, aged seven and five years respectively, recently were burned to death in a fire which consumed the family residence near Clovis, Fresno county.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

The Loyal Heart Of Gov. Gillett Governor Gillett is reported to have professed great indifference as to whether he, or another, is to lead the hosts of Republicanism to the polls in 1910, but one hope there is for whose realization he positively yearns. He wants the Republican party to stand united. So well he all, but under whose control? Aye, there's the rub. Does Governor Gillett's united party require obedience to the command of one W. F. Herrin, to whom Governor Gillett yielded the appointive power appertaining to the executive office? Does it contemplate handing over the institutions of the state to Warren Porter? Are Walter Parker, John C. Lynch and Tim Sullivan to be the grand marshals and cavort along the line of march bedecked with the regalia of authority and honor? The politician whose first thought is for harmony commonly has small regard for moral principles as applied to political affairs, and would as soon serve under a foreign over-lord as by the sovereign will of a free and independent state.

Peril of Party Disintegration The fear that direct primaries may tend to the disintegration of political parties is the burden of the report which New York's legislative commission is carrying back from the West where it has been making investigations. This fear is not groundless. Friends to the direct primary may as well confess the fact as to deny it in the face of cumulative evidence to that effect. Nor is that tendency to be looked upon with favor. Our government is, or should be, (more should be than is) by majority rule. If majorities are to rule there must be majority parties. If there are no majority parties then factions less than majorities must take their places, and factional control of government means government in the face of, and in opposition to, majorities. This is the fault with representative government in continental Europe. Every responsible government is made responsible to a temporary coalition of mutually antagonistic factions and is therefore unstable. Party government makes for stability of policy. Factional government for instability and irreconcilable opposition to control. But who made the direct primary inevitable? Those, and those only, who, by an intolerable manipulation of caucuses and conventions, rendered representative government misrepresentative. They were the Herrins, Parkers and Gilletts of this and other states.

Ballinger to Be Gently Bowled Out While there is much of political rumor that cannot be strictly verified bits of important public information have a way of leaking out from cabinet, executive session, or what not, and so filtering through the public mind with a close approximation to the truth. Therefore, the report that Secretary Ballinger will soon be allowed to bow himself out of the President's cabinet, vindicated, mollified and smiled upon benignantly, has a better foundation than fancy could give it. But he will probably go despite his vindication before the new year waxes old if not before the old year gives place to the new. At best he is a mere legalist, always indicative of a non-progressive if not a reactionary spirit.

That Tariff Commission Lately a down country journal took The California Weekly to task for making the blunder of stating that the Aldrich-Cannon congress cut out the tariff commission plan. It was not worth while to set our critic right because he knew better already, but it is worth noting that the tariff commission, such as it is, has already been constituted. The commissioners are Professor Henry C. Emery of Yale, James B. Reynolds of Massachusetts and Alvin H.

Sanders of Chicago, and their duties are to investigate foreign and domestic tariffs, not foreign and domestic industries, in order to assist the President in applying the maximum and minimum schedule of duties, not to assist congress, the President and the country in preventing higher rates of duty than will suffice to equalize the labor cost at home and abroad, together with a fair profit to American capital. It is specifically instructed not to do exactly what the tariff commission idea, and the good of the country, needed to have done. A tariff schedule constructed, on lines laid out by the Republicanism, in the light of exact knowledge instead of by logrolling methods, would look about as much like the Aldrich-Cannon iniquity as the latter resembles the Westminster confession.

What If Taft Were To Do It? It has been reported that the burden of the President's great swing-around-the-circle talk is to be the tariff, and squarely up to the people in concrete form. "Are you willing," he is to ask them, "to send men to congress who will stand squarely for the difference-in-cost-of-production idea of protection and have that test applied to the articles that you produce as well as those produced by other people elsewhere in this country?" The test is a fair one, and neither the lemon grower, blanket weaver nor wine maker has any right to dodge it. But what will that issue do to our present stand-pat California delegation in congress? As for The California Weekly, it is not only willing to stand by that test as a measure of the protection to be afforded, but it wants a commission of experts to find out what that difference in labor cost is in each instance.

State Printer and Supreme Court Clerk As good examples of state offices which should not be elective, take the state printer and the clerk of the supreme court. For years the state printer was appointed, and nobody was the worse for that, except possibly the candidate who failed to get the appointment. But along about 1890 there arose a clamor to have the state printer elected, and we were told that this desire was very strong on the part of the labor unions. There are as many politicians in labor unions as in any place on earth, and these politicians can manipulate the unions just as easily as politicians who do not belong to unions succeed in managing the rest of us. So the labor union politicians said the state printer must be elected, in order to give the toilers a chance to say by their ballots who should hold this job, and of course the next legislature changed the law. Since 1891 the state printer has been elected, and how much have the toilers had to do with the matter? Just as much as we did in the terse expression of a distinguished political boss, who, referring to his party's selection of a candidate for printer, remarked: "It is a paper house fight"—meaning that the issue would be fought out by the wholesale stationers who desired to sell paper to the state. As for the election of a clerk of the supreme court, that absurdity has existed since the earliest days of the state; the constitution of 1849 called for the election of the clerk, and the 1879 constitution retained the provision, though nobody can give a reason why the supreme court should not be allowed to appoint its own clerk, or, if not that, why the governor should not appoint. Still, the election of a printer and of a clerk is not much more unreasonable than the choice in the same manner of some of the other state officers.

The Short Ballot A New York magazine is carrying on a campaign for what it calls the short ballot—meaning a reduction in the number of officers to be elected by the people, and of course, a corresponding increase in the number to be appointed. Its best argument is the example of the United States government, which calls on the people to elect directly only members of congress and indirectly the President and senators. All of the other tens of thousands of federal officers are appointed, but practically the people elect them when they elect the President, and, on the whole, do it better than they could if they should have a multitude of names on their ballots when they go to the polls. The argument for the short ballot is that by concentration on a few officers, and to a still greater extent on one, the people are able to enforce their will, while, on the other hand, every increase in the number of officers to be elected means lessened ability to concentrate the popular will in an effective expression.

The Direct Primary Compels Short Ballot It is in point to compare with a presidential election what happens in a state election in California. From governor down to clerk of the supreme court, the people have ten executive or administrative officers to elect at large; seven others—three railroad commissioners and four members of the board of equalization—they elect at large; then they must renew some of the judges of the supreme court and elect superior judges, besides state senators and assemblymen and a dozen or fifteen county and township officers. The full list makes a very long ballot, and not one voter in twenty can obtain a clear idea of the personality of more than a few candidates. It is not too much to say that in a combined state and county election there is not a single voter in California who is posted on the merits of all of the candidates of all the parties. In the days of the nominating convention, when the politicians kindly took care of making the nominations for us, this multiplicity of offices to be filled by election was an evil, but it promises to be still more of an evil now that we have the direct primary and responsibility for all nominations is taken home to the mass of people.

Good Government League's Good Government Ticket After wrestling with the political issue in San Francisco as Jacob wrestled with the angel of the Lord, and coming out of the scrimmage rather worse crippled than Jacob did, the Good Government League of San Francisco has given to certain candidates on various tickets the high sanction of its approval. In most cases it has done what sane voters throughout the city will inevitably do on election day, and, if sanity be in the majority on that day, the Good Government League's candidates will be elected. The endorsement will help to that end. That is the purpose of it. Of Republicans it has found unobjectionable, if not in all cases positively and aggressively satisfactory, H. L. Mathewson for auditor, John F. McDougall for treasurer, David Butler for tax collector, John J. Griebner for county clerk, Percy V. Long for city attorney and John T. Dare for police judge. Out of the Democratic party, Edmond Godchaux for recorder, M. J. Hynes for public administrator, Frank T. Fitzgibbon for coroner and Robert Ferrell for the other police judge. So far so good. That much of the ticket ought to win. It probably will win if the voters all turn out on election day.

Its Supervisorial Endorsed Candidates The Board of Supervisors is to be the citadel of power during the coming two years. Without a sound board no good thing can be accomplished no matter who is elected mayor or district attorney. Of the existing board ten out of the eighteen have been renominated by their respective parties and endorsed by the Good Government League. Their record speaks for them. They are Paul Bancroft, James P. Booth, Geo. A. Conolly, Oscar Hooks, Thomas Jennings, James A. Johnston, Charles A. Murdock, Daniel C. Murphy, Henry Payor, W. W. Sanderson. From the names suggested to the people by the League of Independent Republican clubs, and selected at the primaries, there were chosen Edward L. Cullen, Fred L. Hilmer, Matt Harris Sr., and Thomas S. Williams. Out of the Democratic nominees were selected Edgar Apperson, Henry Colombar, J. Emmet Hayden. To finish the ticket Geo. W. Bell, the one Republican suggested to the people by the "Business Men's" primaries, was thought fit to sit on the board. By what mischance so good a man came to be selected by those "business men" has not been divulged. It is to be doubted if the most discriminating voter will be able to make up for himself a better supervisory board than this one endorsed by the Good Government League. It is a good list to take into the election booth to stamp from when election day comes.

Where the League Made Its Mistake

The work of the Good Government League has been conscientiously done. It has been governed by the material at hand to select from. But when it had nothing fit to select from it ought not to have done any selecting at all. It should either have found an independent candidate who was fit or washed its hands of the matter. The strength of the Good Government League lies in commending the clean, common-sense course to clean, common-sense voters, and in giving sound, common-sense advice for sound, common-sense voters to follow on election day. In endorsing the nominations of Thomas B. W. Leland for mayor, and Lawrence J. Dolan for sheriff, the Good Government League hurt itself and probably has not helped either Leland or Dolan. Both Leland and Dolan were McNab candidates and to be a McNab candidate is to receive a certificate of character to the extent of not being a thief. The quality of McNab's sensibilities is not strained, but he draws the line at larceny. This does not imply that rascals of quality and station, influence and social and political prestige, will not be protected if they blunder into the toils of the law and are not common, ordinary, unvarnished larcenists. While it is to be doubted if McNab's ancestors ever went hungry for meat as long as their lowland neighbors remained in the cattle business the assumption that the McNab race has progressed beyond the larceny stage is not violent. So much of endorsement to the two McNab candidates were properly entitled to, but not more.

Francis J. Heney Heads the Ticket

The Good Government League endorsed, but did not procure, the nomination of Francis J. Heney for district attorney. The Heney Club attended to that. None the less the Heney issue was, and is, the dominating factor in the making up of the Good Government League ticket. Its board of supervisors will presumably furnish the sinews of war for carrying on the graft prosecutions if Mr. Heney is elected district attorney. The candidacies of these gentlemen will be bound up with Mr. Heney's, but it may be doubted if any man will vote for Mr. Heney because the Good Government League endorsed Dr. Leland, or that any friend of Mr. Dolan will vote for Mr. Heney because the Good Government League endorsed Dolan for sheriff. Mr. Heney is the issue and the event will prove of tremendous importance to San Francisco, the state and the nation. If the people here stand firm they will stand firm elsewhere whenever successful rascality undertakes to break down the law and to secure immunity from punishment merely because it has been successful in acquiring great wealth. Give San Francisco Francis J. Heney for district attorney, and a board of supervisors that will support him, and, despite the want of a mayor and a sheriff to co-operate with him, headway will be made against graft and it will be a long time before another set of alleged "business men" will have the effrontery to offer a ticket of "negotiable instruments" to a San Francisco voting constituency for nomination to office.

POINTS IN CLYDE FITCH'S CAREER.

His full name was William Clyde Fitch. He was the son of Capt. William Goodwin Fitch, an officer in the Union army in the Civil War and of Alice Clarke Fitch, a daughter of the Confederacy, born at Hagerstown, Maryland. The meeting of his mother and father during the war, and their romantic courtship and marriage, furnished Clyde Fitch with the theme of one of his plays. He was an only son. He was known at Amherst College as Billy Fitch. In college theatricals he was active, preferring to play feminine parts. His plans for a career wavered between architecture and interior decoration. They were compromised on book writing, from which he branched into play writing. A story, "The Knighting of the Twins," and a novel, "A Wave of Life," were published in 1889. His first play was "Betty's Finish," which ran two months at the Boston Museum.

His first highly successful play was "Beau Brummel," written for Richard Mansfield. Edward A. Dithmar, a Boston dramatic critic, suggested Fitch to Mansfield as a good man to write the play.

Fitch wrote two other books, "Some Correspondence and Six Conversations," and "The Smart Set."

HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER IN CALIFORNIA

IV. FEDERAL REGULATION WITHIN THE NATIONAL FORESTS.

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

The first article of this series (published July 30th) described the magnitude of the hydro-electric power industry in California. The second and third articles (published August 13th and September 3d, respectively) pointed out, by the example of the three largest companies, the characteristic tendencies of the industry toward monopoly.

These tendencies toward monopoly suggest the necessity for safeguarding the public interest.

All the power sites have been acquired by the companies by filing upon waters that belong to the people at large as represented by their state government. The privilege of using these waters has been the free gift of the people to the companies. Every company has capitalized this free gift, franchise, at its commercial value, and has exacted from its customers, the public, interest upon this commercial value as if the company itself had invested the money equivalent of that value in the business.

The Necessity for Control.

Since, then, the companies are doing business upon an asset freely given them by the people, and since the people are being charged for service as if the companies had created that asset by their own efforts, it would not seem that it were either a startling or a revolutionary suggestion that the public should share in the profits derived from the development of these great natural resources which the public freely gave the companies. And yet, until very recently, nobody proposed such a thing. Not until more recently has either California or the national government tried to charge the companies for the use of these resources. The state government has not yet done so. Many power promoters still complain that it is an injustice to make such a charge and that it deters capital from investing in the business.

The purpose of the present article is to explain the methods by which the national government maintains the public's interest in the development of electricity where such development is made possible only by the use of the common heritage of the people. Its purpose is further to explain the principles upon which the government bases its right to exercise such control, and to explain the arguments of some of the power people against such control.

Jurisdiction of the State.

It should be understood that all the streams of the state are under the jurisdiction of the state government, and that all water diverted for power purposes is so diverted by appropriation under state laws. Even the United States government, where it wants water for its reclamation schemes, as at Lake Tahoe for its Truckee-Carson project, must acquire its water rights by filing claims under the laws of California.

But the national government owns forests within the state, which it has bought (or always owned) and set aside for the conservation of the timber and water supply. Within these forests the jurisdiction of the national government is supreme except over the water in the streams flowing through them. This water is under state control.

But electric power is hardly ever generated directly from the stream. The water is taken out of the stream at a suitable place and piped or ditched to a point where the longest, steepest drop is available, and there piped to the generating plant. The water is then returned to the stream. Thus it is necessary that a power company shall acquire, not only the right to use the water, but land on which to build a power house and other land over which to flume or pipe the water.

Federal Control.

Here is the opportunity of the national government to exercise control over power companies operating in the national forests. Before the national government (represented by the Department of Agriculture, which, in turn, is represented by the Forest Service) will issue a permit for the use of lands within the national forests by power companies, it demands that the companies shall sign a contract by which the government limits the rights of the companies in various regards and compels the companies to pay certain fixed charges for the privilege of generating power.

The principal provisions of this contract are as follows:

Provisions of Federal Permit.

The company receiving the permit to use government land for power purposes must agree to keep records of the amount of power developed, or the forester shall charge on the basis of an estimate to be made by the forester.

The company must pay for all government timber destroyed or used in the construction of the company's works.

The company must replace all roads and trails that are destroyed in the construction of its works.

The company must not enter into any unlawful combination in restraint of trade.

The permit received by the company shall expire at the end of fifty years, after which time the government may renew the permit upon the same terms, or upon new terms then to be named by the government, or it may issue the permit to another company, all at the discretion of the government.

The charges that must be paid to the government in consideration of its permission to use government land for power purposes are computed as follows:

Charges for Power Generated.

Gross operation charge for power generated, not to exceed for

Year.	Per 1,000 k. w. h.
1st	2 cents
2d	4 "
3d	6 "
4th	8 "
5th	10 "
6th to 10th	12½ "
11th to 15th	15 "
16th to 20th	17½ "
21st to 25th	20 "
26th to 30th	22½ "
31st to 35th	25 "
36th to 40th	27½ "
41st to 45th	30 "
46th to 50th	32½ "

It should be understood that 1,000 k. w. h. (1,000 kilowatt hours) is used as a unit of measurement of power generation thus: if a company is developing 1,000 kilowatts continuously (1,333 horsepower), the government charge could be estimated in that case by computing the number of hours during which that rate of generation is maintained and multiplying the result by the cents per hour. If the rate of generation rises, say to 2,000 kilowatts, the above total is multiplied by two, and so on.

For instance, suppose that all the plants of the Pacific Gas and Electric company came at once completely under national control and subject to these charges. The gross charge received by the government the first year would be about $20,000, and the gross charge received by the government the fifth year about $350,000—from this one corporation.

From the above gross charges, the government agrees to deduct annually the following sums:

1. A sum bearing the same ratio to one-half such gross charge as the area of unreserved lands and patented lands bears to the whole watershed.

2. A sum bearing the same ratio to one-half such gross charge as the length of conduit on unreserved or patented lands bears to the total length of conduit.

3. A sum bearing the same ratio to the balance remaining after deduction of (1) and (2) as the quantity of electric energy generated from water stored artificially by the permittee, over and above that generated by natural flow, bears to all energy generated.

These deductions are made to release the permittee from paying for something that the government does not supply and to reimburse the company for what its own expenditure adds to the value of the government's property.

Further Provisions.

A nominal construction charge is exacted by the government, only until the beginning of the use of the works, of one dollar an acre and five dollars a mile per annum for all lands occupied by such works.

Actual construction of the works must begin within a stated period from the granting of the permit and the construction work must be completed within a stated number of years, extension of time being given only because of physical obstacles.

The permit is non-transferable.

The main contents of the Forest Service in support of its charges for water power privileges are: that the government, by conserving the forests, thereby conserves the water which the companies use, and should be reimbursed for this service; that the government has the right to charge, for the use of its land, not merely the rental based on its value as raw land but a rental based on its value as a commercial possibility, i. e., its advantageous slope for the development of a commercial commodity—power.

In this connection, the following quotation (the writer has mislaid its origin at the moment) is much to the point:

"Those who want national forest timber for commercial purposes are required by law to pay for it at a price fixed by competitive bids. The grazers of stock in national forests are required to pay a reasonable charge, and so are all persons and corporations who use the land or resources of the forests for commercial purposes. It is not a defensible proposition that wealthy corporations should get privileges of immense commercial value free, while others who receive the benefits of the national forests are required to pay for them."

Objections of Power Companies.

The first objection that was raised by the power companies to the Forest Service permit was the limitation of the life of the permit to fifty years. The companies claimed that the fee simple title passed by the government to a homestead was exactly analogous, and that precedent should be followed. The fallacy of comparing the gift of homes to individuals and the gift of vast natural resources to corporations was soon exposed, and the companies next pleaded for perpetual franchises on the ground that capital could not be attracted to the development of water powers on any other basis. It soon appeared that this was not true, for in a conference held in Washington beginning February 27, 1908, between representatives of the Departments of Interior and Agriculture on the one part, and representatives of the more important power companies and of banking houses in New York and Boston, interested in financing power projects in the West, on the other part, it appeared after full discussion that the limitation of permits to a fifty-year term was not seriously objected to by the bankers—since bankers who raise capital for projects of this kind make such a wager in any event that the bonds will mature and be redeemed before the expiration of the fifty years.

A further proof of the fact that capital is not so hampered is the fact that the Forest Service receives an average of one application a day for permission to use forest lands for power purposes under the stipulations of the above permit. The truth is, most objections to the time limit clause now come from speculators or from men who are inherently impatient of restraint and oppose regulation of any sort.

Objections to Charges.

The next objection that was made to the form of permit was that the charges are prohibitive and confiscatory. This complaint was effectively met by the government representatives at the conference mentioned above, when they made the following offer: That the power companies should submit their business to the investigation of the Bureau of Corporations for determination of the question whether or not the rate of charge was unreasonable. No response has ever been made to this suggestion.

The legality of such a charge was affirmed by Attorney General Moody and Bonaparte, both of whom cited Supreme Court decisions in support of their conclusions.

One valid objection has been raised by the power companies. As the law stands, the Secretary of the Interior has the power to revoke a permit at any time, merely in his discretion. Though it is inconceivable that a Secretary of the Interior would ever abuse this power, none the less he ought not to have it, and the Forest Service itself has recommended that Congress pass a law relieving him of this power and making all permits irrevocable, except for breach of contract, during the fifty years.

STATE SAVINGS BANK OF OAKLAND, CAL.

Assets over $1,000,000.

The first bank in Oakland to pay four per cent on time deposits. This bank and one other were the only ones that did not call for clearing house certificates during the panic of 1907, and made all payments in coin when requested.

Loans only on real estate security. Its commercial deposits are kept in its vaults, subject to check. Has $100,000 paid up capital and $115,000 surplus. Has been offered 100 per cent premium for its stock. Makes a specialty of handling large sums for outside parties.

An Example to California.

The regulation of power companies on national lands by the Forest Service is important not only because by such regulation a certain proportion of the power companies are restrained from getting perpetual rights and restrained from entering into monopolistic combinations. Many more power sites exist outside the national forests than in them. The action of the national government thus becomes an example to the state. California has not yet made any provision to restrain or regulate the impending power monopoly. It must do so, or it will find itself woefully at fault. A study of the national regulatory measure may prove of great value to the state legislature.

Probably many more than half of all the commercially feasible power sites in California have been appropriated under the state laws. Those laws are very defective, and they have been so nearly unenforced that speculators have been able to control power claims for years without developing them. To foster legitimate development, to prevent monopoly, and to discourage fraudulent and speculative appropriation, the laws should be revised and enforced.

To conclude, the policy of the forest service, which, in some modified form must ultimately become the policy of the state, is as follows:

Policy of Forest Service.

1. There should be a limited or carefully guarded grant in the nature of an option or opportunity to develop within reasonable time for development of plans and for execution of the project.
2. Such a grant or concession should be accompanied in the act making the grant by a provision expressly making it the duty of the designated official to aid the grant if the work is not begun or plans not carried out in accordance with the authority granted.
3. It should also be the duty of some designated official to see to it that in approving the plans the maximum development of the navigation and power is assured, or at least that in making the plans these may not be so developed as ultimately to interfere with the better utilization of the water or complete development of the power.
4. There should be a license fee or charge, which, though future or nominal at the outset, can in the future be adjusted so as to secure a control in the interest of the public.
5. Provision should be made for the termination of the grant or privilege at a definite time, leaving to future generations the power or authority to renew or extend the concession in accordance with the conditions as they then exist.

THAT TAHOE CONTRACT AGAIN.

The California Weekly, through the courtesy of Dr. F. A. Lacey, is privileged to publish the following interesting letter in connection with the remarkable contract whose terms were recently published in these columns, by which the government appeared to be giving a monopoly of the Lake Tahoe and Truckee river watersheds to the Truckee River General Electric company:

The Secretary of the Interior, Washington, September 9, 1909.

Dear Sir:—I am in receipt, by reference from the President, of your letter of September 1st, enclosing clipping regarding the proposed contract with the Truckee River General Electric company, as recommended by the Reclamation Service. The execution of this contract has been held in abeyance pending a careful investigation of its provisions.

Very truly yours,

Chapter VII.

LEAN AND HUNGRY YEARS.

NO one who has not lived in a semi-arid region can appreciate what a dry year means to a farmer who has made no adequate provision for meeting it, and it was ever the weakness of the San Joaquin valley "sandlapper" to farm upon the hypothesis that he was living in a wet country, whereas he was living in one of the driest in the world that makes pretense of being agricultural. The watching for the fleecy flocks drifting up out of the southwest and across the azure field to the summits of the Sierra, in the hope that they may concentrate there, condense and be turned back to deluge the valley; the measuring of every hundredth of an inch of precipitation of moisture, as an anxious physician takes the temperature of his fever-smitten patient; the awakening out of a sound sleep by the pattering of rain upon the roof, to dash out of doors in one's night clothes to see if the prospect be for a down-pour or only for the dimpling of the dust with peck marks in the morning; the wetting finger thrust into the soil to see if it has veered with the view of following the sun around a boxed compass instead of holding hopefully in the southeast; the scanning of the newspapers to see if it has rained in San Francisco and the calculations made to know when, if it has, the storm may be expected to reach Tulare; the confusion of prayer with profanity, of supplications with imprecations, and the strain upon the heart-strings as the grain droops from day to day, yellows, fires—dies for the want of such a little moisture, as compared with other countries, to make it thrive and yield sixty, perhaps a hundred fold! How it all does wear away at one's life! But when it is all over and the grain is dead, how lifted is the burden of care! Anything is more easily to be borne than the waxing and waning of the "ferry season," for it is that which wrinkles the visage and prematurely whitens the hair and beard.

The bumper crop year, a crop that sent out enough grain from Tulare county so that, if corded in two and a half buel sacks along the side of the railroad track, it would have reached unbroken to tide-water, more than 200 miles away, was succeeded by a half-crop year, and that by a drought that scarcely started the grass, and that by another dry year that nearly reduced the country to primal conditions.

Silas Singham had been more provident in the years of his prosperity than most of his fellow "sandlappers." He had set his header as low as he could that he might take as much of the straw as possible, and, with the straw as it came from the thrasher, he had filled his barn to the brim and stacked the remainder in long ricks outside. Moreover he had combed the thickest of his stubble with a hayrake and the proceeds, heavily loaded with wheat heads, he had carted stacked up for poultry. The typical "sandlapper" pastured his stubble until it was time to plow and then burned it over to get rid of the straw.

Silas Singham also did better work than his neighbors. He harrowed lightly and cross harrowed, after the grain had come up, and then ran a big roller over it to prevent evaporation, so that his grain remained visible during the entire succession of a hundred rainless days that followed the inadequate mid-winter rains, for he knew his study must be to retain in the ground what moisture there was in it, as well as to hold all that fell upon it, but his efforts were of little avail. He had done his part and felt certain that nature would do hers, but she didn't. When, toward the end of April, belated and scanty showers did come, the grain sent up little, spindling stalks that headed out scarcely six inches above the ground, whereas, in a corner of the garden, where water from the overflowing windmill tank had run to waste, a few stools of chance wheat stood six feet high with heads half a foot long. This set him to thinking.

The "sandlappers" generally lived up the following year what they had gotten ahead the year before, or, in the greater number of cases, drew against their credit at such stores as were brave enough to "carry" them from crop year to crop year. The need for farm machinery, with which to harvest their bumper crop, and for making payments on the lands they had bought from the railroad, had absorbed most of the profits of the good seasons, and the bad years plunged them into debt to the limit of their debt-contracting capacity.

When at last summer set in the vast fields were as bare of vegetation as a sea-beach, and the prevailing northwest winds drifted the impalpable dust like fine snow. The uncultivated areas were as bare and hard as a traveled road save where the perennial grasses had scantily grown and these the famishing horses and cattle ate into the earth.

The stockmen fared worse than the farmers, for they had more mouths to feed. The loss of the open country caused by the remaining range over-farmed so that the green stuff the river men were able to grow upon the overflowed lowlands was eaten to the roots before the winter was half over, and the cattle entered upon the summer almost too weak to go to the Sierra mountain pastures when the melting snows made them accessible. For it does not enter into the plans of the range cattle raiser to bring his herds through to the coming of new feed in good condition. It suits him well enough to have them able to take hold of the feed when it comes. Whatever is given the poor brutes more than will suffice to do this is accounted loss, and there is, or was, full many a stockman who will get no more than his deserts if his feeling shade be clouded through the realm of shadow interminably by gaunt herds of famished cattle.

When, in this heart-breaking year of unmitigated drouth, the coming of summer brought no feed the story of the cattle was soon told. The ablest were hustled off to the over-stocked mountains to struggle with starving stock and horses for a precarious pasture that would not have sufficed for half as many. Others were shipped by rail to Utah or Oregon, but the aged mothers of herds and their young progeny take the hair off each other's backs to the hide, staggered to the water holes to quench a raging thirst in stagnant water, sank to their knees in the ooze, laid them down and died, leaving only vultures and coyotes to live prosperously in an unprosperous country.

Chapter VIII.

A DITCH OF WATER.

Silas Singham was not an adherent to the rule of thumb, the besetting sin of the typical "sandlapper." He worked as he thought and thought as he worked, and that he might think the better he habitually wore his big pith hat, during the hottest term that the sun might not bake his brain into that enduring, torpid, desert-dullness which seems to characterize many condemned to a daily round of routine unrelieved by storm or shower. With every day just like every other day he set out and every thought like every other thought, each train of thinking making a complete circle and failing to rise above the common level even spirally. To become a thinker a man must needs have new problems pressing in upon him. With dry farming on the plains the range of thinking was narrowed to seedtime and harvest, if there chanced to be a harvest, and futile speculating on whether or not it would be a "good" year or a "dry."

Silas Singham found problems enough. He had faith in the country and, without pretense to a religious life, he had faith in God and could not permit himself to believe that God made all those tens of thousands of fertile acres to prove an agricultural mirage for the beguiling of good people to finance him. His first problem was to conserve the moisture, and he solved it, but when there was no moisture to conserve the next problem assuredly was to find moisture to be conserved. No sooner had the second season after his advent among the sandlappers betrayed its quality than he began to plan to bring a ditch of water into Enterprise neighborhood.

Without being an educated man in the modern acceptance of the term he was ready with figures, was a fair mechanic and full of resources. To save the cost of employing a civil engineer he procured a carpenter's level, mounted upon it at either end a short tube of the size of a lead pencil, and across these, a little way from the end, he firmly fixed silken threads at right angles, up and down and across, at exact equal distances from the surface of the level. With a tripod on which to affix this instrument he was equipped for ascertaining differences of level with reasonable correctness.

With axes and shovels, a well-stocked "grub box" and blankets, Silas Singham, with one or two of his neighbors, started for the point where the river debouched from the mountains. They first measured the flow of the river there and at intervals through the swamp until it forked into the four creeks that went to form the delta of the river, which it reached the lake in the trough of the valley. They also measured every ditch that had been taken out of the river and concluded that three-fourths of the water of the stream sunk in the sands without doing anyone good. If that was so, the water coming out of the main channel of the swamp there would be enough water to irrigate all of the plains country between that river and the watershed of the next, and Singham determined to have some of it for his neighborhood.

Across one end of the reach there ran an old slough, sometimes narrow and deep, sometimes broad and shallow, but nearly always dry. This he followed to its head in the upper swamp near the river. An examination of the ground showed that it had once been a part of the river, but some flood had closed its mouth, debris had filled it and the river had made a new channel a quarter of a mile away, so that it was only during very high water that this slough was filled from the parent stream. Why not clear out that slough to a connection with the river and so become a riparian owner as well as Mr. Moses Brayton and his river folks, in addition to being an "appropriator" under the law? His improvised level was brought into play, the differences of level taken, calculations made, and a proposal formulated for submission to the neighborhood.

But the "sandlappers" of Enterprise had more enthusiasm than means and it costs money to excavate earth. They all had teams, but not many of them had feed for their teams, or food for their families, and there was little money left in the community. Silas Singham's barn was well filled and he would venture that much upon his proposition anyhow, but not many of his neighbors were as well provided for, and except horses eat they cannot work.

In his perplexity Singham went to Isidore Joseph & Co., the leading merchant at Tulare. This firm entered heartily into the project and agreed to advance needful provisions for the camp on credit, if Singham would pledge his faith for the repayment. The canal farmers were accordingly formed with the company as stockholders, each farmer taking as much stock in the corporation as he could work out with his teams. Silas Singham furnished the feed for the work animals for shares in canal stock and Isidore Joseph & Co. kept the grub box supplied.

Thus equipped, every able-bodied man in the community fell to work, but that they might do so unhindered the stockholders in the company raised money enough between them to buy eighty acres of land where the headworks of the canal were to be. They could not well be stopped from doing what work they wished on their own land.

It was hard tugging with the briars, the willows and the young forest that had sprung up in that old channel, but by early spring of the second "dry year" a way had been cut and excavated through the river. However, it could not be deep enough by full two feet to draw off any of the water at a low stage, and so the easiest and quickest way to get it was to throw a low brush and rock dam across the river and thereby divert a part of the water into the new canal.

There was where trouble began. The river folk were at once up in arms. Moses Brayton was furious. An injunction was quickly sued out and the whole neighborhood was haled into court, where the law was laid down succinctly as follows:

The code of California had made the common law of England the law of California, except where specifically ordained otherwise, and there had been no ordination otherwise in case of the riparian law, which, therefore, made the water laws of a very wet country applicable to one of the driest countries on earth. This law guaranteed to the land owner lowest down on the stream the flow of the river "unpolluted in quality and undiminished in quantity," and therefore virtually prohibited any irrigation in a country that was nearly worthless, even to the riparian owners, without irrigation.

Thus it was that the riparian law which forbade irrigation was invoked for the purpose of securing water for the very purpose of irrigation, but only for the river folks. It looked bad for the people of Enterprise, but Silas Singham sent them all home to make ditches over a portion of their lands leading from the slough already referred to. Perhaps the river might come up far enough so that they could get enough water for some acres of corn land and so be able to sustain themselves through the season. Anyhow, they had made a beginning. As for himself, with one or two men, he remained on the ground getting out material for completing the dam at short notice.

The little ditching that was needful on the plain was soon completed, a sudden rise of the river came, the brush Silas Singham had collected on the bank was tumbled into the stream and weighted down with rocks and, triumph of the engineering skill of the "sandlapper," a good half of the water went booming down to the thirsty plain lands.

There was great rejoicing when the water came and men were out irrigating night and day, but the rejoicing was short lived. The flow of water stopped. Silas Singham and three or four of the men went to the river to see what the trouble was. It was easy enough to guess. The river folks had torn out the dam. Singham put his back to it. It was torn out, only to be put back again. One day there would be water, the next day none. The river folks had irritated what they cared to by flooding their cultivated lands, but they wanted their low-lying grass land to overflow. This could only be done by leaving the full flow of the water in the river. The law gave it to them, they declared, and they were going to have it. If they allowed an inch to be taken, the "sandlappers" would surely take an ell, and the safest way was to prevent their wayward way at all. The issue had been fairly joined at last.

THREE MEN IN A BOAT.

Whatever Jerome K. Jerome may write he seems destined to be regarded primarily as the author of "Three Men in a Boat." That book has just had its twentieth birthday, and a new edition is being brought out in England. It has been reprinted every year since 1889, and the English editions amount to 207,000 copies. In addition the sale of the story in America has been roughly estimated at a million. "Three Men in a Boat" has been translated into every European language except Turkish and also into some of the languages of Asia.

A HISTORY OF EQUALIZATION.

In the earlier years there was no lack of zeal on the part of the State Board of Equalization in applying the constitutional remedy for unequal assessments. During the first ten years, 1891 to 1899, there were eight years in which counties were either raised or lowered, and nearly always raised. In the second ten years, 1891 to 1900, there were seven years when the board equalized, but in two of these years there were only reductions and no raises. In the following nine years, up to date, the present year is the second in which equalizations have been made. Both years provided for increases in county assessment rolls.

The very sweeping reduction made in 1895 and 1897—twenty-six counties being reduced in the former year and forty-two in the latter—were merely an indirect method of raising the assessments in the counties not reduced. That the general effect of this action was bad is proved by the fact that, for a series of years, the grand assessment roll of the state failed to increase with the increase in population and wealth.

But the raising or lowering of assessment rolls has had no permanent effect. This is illustrated by the fact that though San Francisco's assessment roll has been raised nine times since 1879, the increases ranging from 8 to 30 per cent, and totaling 150 per cent, and though its roll has twice been indirectly and once directly reduced, none of these changes has been effective after the year in which it was made. For example: San Francisco's roll was raised the first year to $239,000,000 and the second year, being let alone, it fell to $202,000,000. During the three following years constant raises by the board kept it at about $254,000,000, but the first year the board removed its hand, down it went to $230,000,000. In the next four years, with no compulsory raises at all, it went up to $301,000,000 through the operation of natural forces. Then, in 1891, the board ordered a raise of 30 per cent, which brought the total up to $399,000,000; a little of this must have stuck, because next year a raise of only 20 per cent brought it up to $412,000,000. Then came a year of no forced raise, and the roll dropped to $342,000,000. In 1903, the board made the sensational raise of 30 per cent, causing an increase of $126,000,000, but in 1904 much of this was lost.

This saw-sawing is seen to be typical, as is illustrated by the history of equalization in Alameda and other counties besides San Francisco. So, in order to be maintained, readjustments of assessments must be made yearly. The objections to this practice are that the state board has never had data sufficiently accurate to justify it, and that the practice emphasizes the inequalities of assessments as they are made by the county assessors.

In recent years the state board has done little or no equalizing by the method of raising or lowering the entire rolls. It has done a great deal of equalizing in other, and, on the whole, better lines.

In the most advanced states the tendency is altogether toward state supervision of the work of assessors while their work is being done, rather than the correction of it after it has been finished and long.

During the last five years, in which no county has been arbitrarily raised or lowered, the state roll has not suffered therefor, because the aggregate increase has been far greater than in any similar period. In the five years between 1884 and 1889, after vigorous equalizing, the state roll increased $300,000,000. During the next five-year period, 1889 to 1894, there was an increase of only $98,000,000. In the succeeding five years there was no increase at all, but a loss, for in 1899 the roll was $14,000,000 less than it had been in 1894. From 1899 to 1904 there was a handsome increase of $331,000,000, although in this period there had been less compulsory equalizing than in earlier years. But between 1904 and 1909 the roll, without equalization, swelled to the sum of approximately $300,000,000, an increase not paralleled in any other period of five years. The last two assessments have been made since the great panic of 1907, but last year the roll increased $107,000,000, and this year $122,000,000. During the years immediately following the panic of 1893 there was a heavy falling off in the roll.

All these comparisons are based on the county auditors' figures, excluding railroads assessed by the state board.

APRIL 21ST, 1909.

(For The California Weekly.)

How many millions and millions of years,
Desolate, dead and chill,
Bound on this wheel, with my frozen tears
Grist of the northern mill.

Ages and eras the tale repeat,
Epochs I have lain,
Ice for my bed and my winding-sheet,
Ice for my coffin-pane.

Weary round of the centred heaven,
Tiresome northern star;
Boom of the ice-pick thunder-riven,
Voice of the grinding bar.

Wheeling groups of the polar hosts;
Heedless, hollow sky;
Maddening, beautiful, speechless ghosts
Mocking as they fly.

Pallid gloom of the moonless nights;
Wash of the under-sea;
Flickering glow of the lambent lights
Dancing over me.

How many aeons of sloping sun,
Over the rim asance,
Branded me as the banished one,
Dreading this grim expanse.

Flaming fruits of the golden zone
Gathering instead,
Leaving me and my heart alone,
Disinherited.

Long! How long! Before time began
Threading the vault and aisle,
Waiting the voice of my lover, MAN,
Waiting his lifted smile.

"Yes," I have said from my ancient grave,
"Yes," from my modern tomb,
"Yes, he will come with the joy I crave,
"Ending my endless doom."

"No," said the wind on the southern rift,
"No," said the pitiless
Barrièred bounds of the spinning drift,
"No." But I answered "Yes."

Strange sweet notes from the margined south,
Mounting the crystal brim,
"Hark! It is he! He will kiss my mouth!
"Rise! I will go with him!"

All arrayed for his warm embrace,
Beautiful I lay.
He came. He looked on my cold, dead face:
He turned. And he fled away.

SLANG WELL BORN.

Some diligent student contributes to Puck a list of striking instances of the use in famous books of slang phrases which came into vogue long after the writers who fathered them, often, it is true, in an entirely different sense, passed away from earth. "Forget it—cast it away" comes from Hawthorne's "Marble Faun" and "It's a sure thing" is found in Goldsmith's "She Stoops to Conquer." It appears that "Twenty-three," signifying the last, is in that wonderful and least Dickensesque of Dickens' novels, "A Tale of Two Cities." "Cut in and win" is traced to Thackeray's "Vanity Fair."

Further back, "Nothing doing" crops out in Addison's Letters, and "Gone to the wall" is found in John Bunyan's immortal "Pilgrim's Progress." In "Love's Labor's Lost" it is discovered that Shakespeare says: "Give Hector a gift—a gift unpeaked—a lemon." So one of the very best slang-born phrases of the day, "Make good," can be located in Deuteronomy.

The truth is that many slang expressions are merely the popular discovery or second birth of phrases and words of ancient and excellent lineage.

Isaac W. Hallam recently completed the fifty-first year of continuous service as a telegraph operator, at Wilmington, Delaware. In the fifty-one years he has never been absent a day except for a week's furlough at the time of his marriage in 1864. He holds the record for telegraphic service.

Bishop Nicholas C. Matz, of the Catholic diocese of Denver, is in a fair way to become a millionaire. He has leased the property at Central City, known as the old Gorman mine, and Philadelphians who have begun to operate it have found it to contain the richest deposits of uranium in the world.

Mrs. Asher Richardson of Ashertown, Texas, has been appointed assistant general superintendent of the Ashertown and Gulf railroad. Thirty-two miles of the road has been completed and it is now being extended 100 miles more. Mrs. Richardson has charge of the employment and work of a large body of men.

Sir Arthur Wing Pinero's new play, "Midchannel," recently produced at the St. James Theater, London, met with the favorable reception which is generally accorded his works. But it is a gloomy, though powerful, drama. "Midchannel" is a story of the matrimonial tangles of a childless couple approaching middle age, in which the erring wife after refusal of forgiveness by the husband solves her troubles by suicide. Ethel Barrymore will play the leading part in the American production.

Mr. W. E. Pence, of New York, kindly forwards the following example of "Shear Wit": "The Cleveland Grays, a famous military company (of which I was a member) is in camp. The New Constitution and the Railroads.

For almost a generation the group of big men who built and operated the Central and Southern Pacific railroads constituted the Colossus engendering the industrial and commercial life of California going. No industry, no community and almost no individual could thrive without their co-operation and consent, and whenever they turned against was ruined. They were forces as unusual as the forces of nature and as immoral as the necessities of each case demanded. They never turned aside from any desired purpose, or withheld their hand from any enterprise, because that purpose or that enterprise involved any form of criminality short of murder, and many a life was sacrificed to their ambitions, if not with premeditation then as a not unlikely consequence of their acts.

In achieving their ends they debauched governments of states, cities and counties; debauched legislatures, courts and civil officers, and they allowed a public career to no man who would not subordinate himself to their interests. They purchased the influence of newspapers as they hired lawyers, and they sent their representatives to congress as they sent others to conferences and associations of railroad men. The people smarted under their lash and it was anticipated, and charged, that the New Constitution aimed at reprisals against them and their properties in a spirit of vindictiveness. It is important to know if this be so.

Section 31 of Article IV prohibits state, county and municipalities making gifts, lending credit or taking stock in corporate enterprises. This was to stop the securing of subsidies in aid of railroad extension. Its purpose was the protection of taxpayers rather than the penalizing of railroads. No one would now think of questioning the wisdom of that constitutional provision.

Section 17 of Article XII declares that all transportation companies are common carriers and subject to legislative control. It also gave every railroad a right to connect, or cross, every other railroad and compelled all railroads to receive traffic at every intersection and transport it without delay or discrimination. It would be difficult to find in this anything other than the soundest public policy and most even-handed justice.

Section 18 prohibits officers of any railroad corporation having any interest, other than as a holder of stock, in or doing work or furnishing supplies for any such corporation. This was to safeguard stockholders from such inequities as the Contract and Finance company had proven to be and sought to prevent the looting of railroad companies through the rapacities of their officers. No man dare say it is other than a perfectly sound provision.

Section 19 sought to prevent the bribing of legislators and other public officials through giving them free passes over railroads, but the railroads substituted free tickets for free passes and went right on with that form of petty bribery, violating the constitution in spirit if not in letter, a manifestation of a spirit of lawlessness thoroughly characteristic of railroading in this state.

Section 20 forbade railroads in this state forming combinations with steamship companies whereby one or other should be paid for not carrying traffic that the other might carry it at an enhanced profit, a provision that has been violated in spirit and fact every day since the constitution was adopted and is being violated at this time.

The last half of this section declared that when rates have been lowered to meet competition they shall not be raised again without the consent of the "governmental authority in which shall be vested the power to regulate fares and freights." This provision afforded the foundation for the celebrated "Fresno Rate Case" wherein an obliging Supreme Court deprived the provision of validity and permitted a rate to be raised without any consent except its own.

Section 21 specifically forbade discriminations in rates of freight and fare between persons and places, and yet, confessedly, there have been such discriminations habitually practiced from the adoption of the provision until now, merely another display of a characteristic lawlessness on the part of transportation corporations in this state and country. They have recognized the validity of no law that they could not put to their own use. When a law stood in their way they overrode and crushed it.

Sections 22 and 23 provide for our State Railroad Commission through which the people had hoped that justice might be done between them and the great public service corporations they had permitted to be created. Its provisions are not inimical to honest railroading, but again were the people disappointed. By the efficiency of hired political managers, plentifully supplied with corruption funds, the Southern Pacific company made itself master of this commission from the first until now and it has been for thirty years a costly and exasperating disappointment, not rendering a public service the equivalent of the salary of the office janitor.

These, then, are the provisions of the New Constitution, alleged to have been inspired by Kearneyism and adopted by the people in a spirit of malice for the injury of railroad properties. Is there one of them against which any such charge can fairly be made? Had the railroads accepted them in good faith, and abided by them as the people have, California would have been far happier and more prosperous and the manhood of the commonwealth would not be, as it is to-day, in open revolt against corporate domination.

The conduct of the railroads had then, as it has ever since then, justified the securing of retributive and retaliatory vindication of the laws the people made for railroad control, but the spirit of the people is now, and ever has been, magnanimous, forgiving and full of self-restraint.

THE GRAFT CASES.

The mighty hush and notable immobility which have characterized the trial of Patrick Calhoun during the last month or more still are maintained, Stanley Moore yet being sick, and Mr. Calhoun's six other attorneys naturally disliking to minimize his chances of securing the justice he desires by continuing without Moore. The case has been continued until next Monday, and, as Judge Lawlor and attorneys for the prosecution and defense today will endeavor to fix a date for proceeding with the trial, it is among possibilities that the trial again will be under way at some not distant date.

William H. Scanland, of Benton, Louisiana, has just celebrated his "golden jubilee" as editor of the Bossier Banner, a newspaper founded by him in 1859, when he was seventeen years of age. It is probably the only instance in the South of a man who has been at the head of the same newspaper for fifty consecutive years.

Heney On the List.

The necessary petitions have been filed and the name of Francis J. Heney will be upon the ballot as independent candidate for district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco. On that pivot the whole fight will hang.

The President of the United States has proclaimed to the whole world the humiliating admission that the administration of justice in this country is a disgrace to our civilization. It was a bold statement to make, but that it was a true statement no prudent man will deny. The admission was awful and awfully true.

Has it sunk into the consciousness of the people what this admission on the part of the head of the nation means? It means that democracy has failed, for, if we make a failure in establishing justice, we make a failure in everything that counts. We owe this failure to the fact that plutocracy, and not democracy, is in the ascendancy in this country. In fighting for justice we are fighting for the nation's life.

California is a part of this nation and San Francisco is the hub of California. This fight for justice is waging here and now. Francis J. Heney is heading that fight. Nowhere has the "disgrace to our civilization" been more flagrantly inflicted than here where guilt, practically undenied, goes unpunished because the forces of a corrupted plutocracy have proven too strong for a loyal but inefficient democracy. The fountain of justice—the hearts of the people—has been polluted and, under our system, a jury cannot be obtained that will establish justice. But the fight must go on and Heney, weary and worn though he is, must lead that fight. And a more gallant leader democracy never had in any of its battles. He must win. Humanity cannot afford to have this fight lost.

Those Idealists and Dreamers.

The platform proclaimed by the McCarthy party (it were a gratuitous affront to organized labor to call it a Union Labor party) has gone just as far as its makers dared to blurt out its advocacy of the immoral side of every important public issue in this city. It bears especially hard upon those "idealists and dreamers" who have fought for the last three years for the regeneration of San Francisco. What, then, are these ideals and these dreams that the McCarthy party so unreservedly condemns?

They are that rich criminals shall be punished as summarily and as certainly as poor, and that the city shall not be exploited for the benefit of its public service public servants. To the groveling McCarthy mind this dream shimmers with the quality of iridescence and the ideal seems utopian. So it must prove with the McCarthy party in power.

The McCarthy party stands for "civic peace," that peace which passeth moral understanding, and, in that interest, it proposes "to settle once for all," definitely and with honor to all concerned," the "many problems on which the people have seen fit to differ." If this does not refer to the graft prosecution it is mere language and has no reference to anything. Take this in connection with candidate Fickert's declaration that he is not "going into office to stop the graft prosecution," but "will prosecute all grafters," and the whole scheme is unfolded. In the event of the triumph of the McCarthy party the graft cases are to be prosecuted with a perfunctory and incapable going-through-with-the-motions that can have but one result, the acquittal of all the higher-ups, "definitely and with honor," to them if not "to all concerned." It is a nice plan and, if elected district attorney, Fickert can be counted on to do his incapable utmost to see that it goes through without a hitch.

THIS NUMBER CONTAINS American Shipping in American Ships (THIRD ARTICLE.)

But the McCarthy party is not without its attractiveness. It has already brought the united liquor interests to its support and the red-light district can be counted on to support the saloon. Where these two interests are found in co-operation the influence of the Southern Pacific company's political bureau is never far away. This makes a strong combination.

Denied by political inefficiency an opportunity to stand for a ticket headed by some capable "idealist and dreamer" the better element must, it would seem, take up, in very self defense, with that candidate who represents a sordid, cent-per-cent materialism and vote to make a Scottish chief political king of San Francisco. The alternative is a distasteful one, and one that should not have been forced upon the people, but this city is to be governed either by the McNab party or the McCarthy and, great as the lesser evil is, it is enough less than the greater to justify its acceptance, howbeit without enthusiasm for it or justification of it.

Taft on Labor.

The President's talk at Chicago to organized labor, and to organized employers of labor, has given as general satisfaction as anything he has said since he began his itinerary. He told those employers who refuse to deal with labor collectively that they were behind the times. He might with justice have gone farther and told them that they are Bourbons if not chumps. Themselves the collective agents of innumerable stockholders, it is with a poor face that they can insist on dealing with their workers man by man. As well might the walking delegate insist on dealing with the stockholders man by man rather than with the manager of the corporation, who is nothing but a collective agent.

In defending the right of the non-union man to work for such wages as he may choose to accept the President stood on firm legal grounds and his language was not too strong, but he might properly have refrained from refraining from criticising non-union men for joining the unions. These are they who, by their inertia or their narrow selfishness, neglect or refuse to bear their share of the burden of defense of the common interests of labor. They are willing enough to be sheltered, but unwilling to help to carry the umbrella that shelters them. They are willing to share the benefits, but not the hazards and burdens of fighting the workingman's fight, for that there is such a fight the President freely admits, a fight without which the condition of labor, organized and unorganized, would be vastly different from what it is today. Perhaps half of it would be below the poverty line.

But the President was right in affirming that liberty must be preserved. At whatever cost, and no matter how much abused, liberty to contract must not be sacrificed. What cannot be done by persuasion must not be done at all until it can be done by persuasion. There is no other way of keeping liberty alive and without liberty we have nothing worth living for. It has been the conquest of the ages.

In deprecating the tendency of organized labor to reduce the productive capacity of the fittest to that of the average man the President showed himself to be a little behind the times. The best sentiment and practice in labor organizations stands for a minimum wage below which no one shall be asked to work, but those who have capacity are permitted to earn a premium over the minimum wage for doing more than the minimum modicum of accomplishment. It is not that the employer merely wants more work done by each of his men than the standard set by unionism, but he wants more done at the same price, a practice that constantly tends to put the man of average capacity below the poverty line.

To tie the hands of the especially efficient is wrong, but to make him the pacemaker for the man of only average capabilities, whose right to a living wage must be defended, is another wrong. The whole issue depends upon the fairness of the minimum wage as measured by the average standard of accomplishment. Where this is fixed at a just ratio, and the exceptional worker is permitted to earn and receive pay for all he earns, right prevails and industrial efficiency is not hampered.

The word of the President on the labor issue was not the final word, but it was, in the main, sound and bravely and plainly spoken.

TAFT AND THE TARIFF.

The President's address upon the new tariff law, delivered at Winona, Minnesota, was perfectly frank, perfectly intelligible and perfectly inconclusive. He was right in affirming that the Republican party did not, as viewed from a legalist standpoint, promise such a reduction in schedules as would result in a reduction of prices and cost of living. In failing to make such a promise the convention failed to meet the expectations of the country, and if that had been the only issue a different result might have been produced in the succeeding November. Nevertheless, the public expected such a reduction and the carefully guarded expressions of the Republican presidential candidate emphasized the expectation. That expectation has not been realized.

The President talks as though the fear in the public mind were that, unless the tariff were revised downward, it might chance, in the future, that certain manufacturers, not having the fear of the Lord in their hearts, might so combine and confederate together behind the tariff wall as to raise prices to American consumers above the necessities for paying an American standard of wages to American workmen, and allowing a reasonable profit to American producers. Bless his simple old heart! that is exactly what has been taking place for twenty years and it was to prevent the continuation, not the inauguration, of such a policy that the American people demanded a downward revision of their tariff. According to the President's own admission there has been no such downward revision as will force a reduction of prices to the competitive point, and every notch above that point means to the consumer just so much of extortion through unlawful combination.

The President accuses the downward revisionists of wishing to hurt American industries. When is an American industry hurt? If such an industry has been paying 40 per cent. dividends, and a new tariff has reduced those dividends to 20 per cent., has that industry been hurt? If so, The California Weekly desires to have every such industry hurt as quickly as possible. But if such industry has been paying only 10 or 12 per cent., after taking all risks, and a new tariff schedule should reduce its dividends to 4 or 5 per cent., or wipe them out altogether, that would be hurting the industry and The California Weekly would not favor such a tariff schedule.

This paper stands for the protection of American industries, stands squarely upon the old-time Republican platform, that the measure of protection should be the difference in labor cost of production at home and abroad. The "reasonable return to American capital invested in American industries," was an advanced step in the theory of protection taken for the first time by the last Republican national convention. Therefore it was the expectation that the return to American capital invested in American industries would be offset by the return to foreign capital invested in foreign industries.

Intelligently and honestly applied, the policy of protection, to which the Republican party has heretofore stood committed, would force every American industry to do business so near to the competitive point with foreign producers as to prevent extortionate prices to home consumers. Competition with foreign producers would not be fierce, but it would be fair and would force such a reduction from the non-competitive prices that have been maintained, with great injustice to our own people, as would help many millions to a lowered cost of living, and do it without "hurting" a single American industry.

The Republican insurgents, with whom The California Weekly joyously allies itself, stand for fair trade, not free, and, with all deference to the President, the Payne bill no more stands for fair trade than the contentions of the insurgent members of congress represent the policy of free trade. And this paper does not propose to be read out of the Republican party for advocating a Republican doctrine held to be orthodox for more than forty years.

The President's apology for the Payne-Aldrich tariff law is unfortunate. It will tend to reconcile the uninformed to that atrocity, but it will neither satisfy the conscience of the country nor fortify the protected interests against being "hurt" when an exasperated public sentiment shall turn upon the iniquity to wreak summary vengeance upon it. That kind of a tariff makes free traders with about the same facility that Rockefeller's and Harriman's make socialists.

TAFT ON JUSTICE.

When the President came, as he did at Chicago, to speak on the administration of justice in this country he knew whereof he spoke. He needed not to apply to Payne, Aldrich or Cannon for information. He is, above all else, a jurist and a lover of justice, as distinguished from a consuming admiration for those processes of ratiocination by which men set up whole rows of metaphysical idols before which they prostrate themselves, confound justice and bring civilization itself to the brink of the abyss. When he declared the administration of the criminal law in this country to be a "disgrace to our civilization," the President did not use stronger language than was warranted by the fact.

But the President did more than to find fault. He pointed a way to a possible betterment of conditions. That way was through a reformation of procedure and practice in the United States courts from which, he ventured to hope, the several states might copy to their advantage. He wants this accomplished through a commission constituted by congress. It should not be a commission of congressmen. That would avail little. It would probably be made up of men who, when not in congress, make their livings by keeping out of prison persons who should be in prison. Such men will not cut themselves off from a livelihood if they know it. But if the President were authorized to constitute a commission to perform that service it would be performed.

Furthermore, in proving that the problem is by no means unsolvable, the President did just what The California Weekly had already done—pointed to the methods by which British justice is established. That source of inspiration and encouragement has been fully exploited in the columns of this paper, and what John Bull has done Brother Jonathan can do if he sets himself to the task. The path has been abundantly blazed.

Will the President advert to this subject when he reaches San Francisco, or will he congratulate us upon our marvelous climate, our varied resources and our unquestioned commercial expansion, when we shall have discovered that there lies an Orient beyond where the brazen orb of day sinks nightly behind the crest of ocean?

Suppose that our present delectable kettle of fish had been stewing at the time President Roosevelt paid this coast a visit, would he have said anything about it? Well, wouldn't he! What a tribute would he not have paid to that morning Moral Idiot that has dared to characterize the most determined effort to establish justice in the teeth of the opposition of organized millions, as a "factional quarrel," and to commend the suspension of the graft prosecution "in the interests of civic peace?" And would he not have made that alleged "business men's committee" know what a drubbing feels like?

During his itinerant President Taft will find no better opportunity for striking a blow for justice than here at San Francisco where he may deliver a blow that will count for justice here and elsewhere. There are thousands in San Francisco whose hearts have grown weary with fighting against odds. They need a word of encouragement from a source that will count. If the head of the nation, himself a great jurist, were to make it clear that, in fighting for justice here, San Francisco is fighting for justice elsewhere—is really fighting the nation's battles—it would bring new courage into thousands of hearts, new energy into their nerves, new insight into their consciences.

Will the President speak of the establishment of justice in San Francisco when he comes to San Francisco? How anxiously will San Francisco wait to see!

TAFT AND THE RAILROADS.

The President's utterances, at Des Moines, on the issue of railroad control, were admirable. They were more than that. They were suggestive of a constructive statesmanship. They recognize that there is such a problem and that its solution is pressing. The laws enacted for the control of railroads have proven inadequate, for the reason that they have had to do with powerful, law-defying agencies, and the President wisely concludes that the laws, and their administration, must be strengthened accordingly.

His first, and perhaps most important, suggestion is that a competent court be created especially for the handling of cases taken to it from the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He would then make that commission less of a court and more of an administrative arm of government. It is difficult, if not impossible, to confer upon a single body both judicial and executive features. The proposal to divide the function, but centralize, looks feasible.

Having divided the power of control into its two functions the President would proceed to endow the commission with strenuous powers of rate-making, classification and for hearing and determining, either within its own body or before the high court of transportation, all issues needing adjustment without regard to whether complaints had been filed or not. In brief, the President stands first for finding out in a direct and expeditious manner what is just between carrier and shipper, then proceed, without delay, to have justice executed.

Doubtless with the example of the late Mr. Harriman before his mind's eye, the President has taken strong ground against one railroad corporation owning large blocks of stock in another and competing line and issuing its own securities, solely as it is minded to do, and for any purpose that suggests itself, including the playing of the stock market as smaller men play the races. The wrongs that have been inflicted upon public policy by these methods, in which Mr Harriman was an adept, have been stupendous and should have been prevented before they began. In these measures the American people will support the President heartily, but it will not be an easy matter to bring congress to his way of acting, however it may think.

On the other hand the President desires to permit and legalize traffic arrangements between railroads, arrangements which do not amount to pooling, but subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This also is sane. The purpose of the law should be to prevent and punish railroads when they do wrong, and not prevent railroads from doing right, punishing the public through their inability to do right lawfully. The anti-trust law, to which the President also paid his respects, has had somewhat of that effect.

This paper agrees with the President, too, in holding that all combinations in restraint of trade and for the elimination of competition, with the purpose of maintaining a monopoly, are ipso facto wrong and in contravention of sound public policy. Yet there must be some way of so limiting the savageries of competition as to see to it that they stop short of working destruction to both public interests and private. The Interstate Commerce Commission must somehow be the buffer to so mitigate head-on collisions as to reduce them to shake-ups instead of smash-ups.

Taft on the Income Tax.

This paper views the President's utterances on the income tax proposal with mingled feelings. The paramount issue, as pointed out in these columns weeks ago, is not whether or not this nation shall levy an income tax for the support of government, but whether or not it shall be given power to levy such a tax if the nation shall need it. On that issue there should not be two opinions in this country, but there will be. There are thousands who would rather that the nation's hands be tied against any eventuality than that they should take the risk of having such a tax imposed, as a result of the government being given power to impose it, and the amendment is not to be won without a fight.

The President's objections to the tax itself, on the ground that its application is inquisitorial and tempts to perjury, have not so much to sanction them. All assessments are inquisitorial and, if our State Board of Equalization is to be relied on, all are productive of perjury. The honest man will give in his income tax assessment as unreservedly as his state and county assessment and the dishonest one will conceal the truth regarding both forms of taxation with equal facility and—go where perjurers go when the Devil claims his own at the shambles gate. A little less of temptation thrown in their way will scarcely snatch them from that burning.

Taft on Great Fortunes.

The President is not alone in viewing with alarm the placing in trust of great fortunes upon the deaths of the persons who spent their lives in heaping them up. If the channels leading from poverty to riches, and riches back to poverty again, can be kept open the stratification of society in America can hardly become as inexorable as in Europe, and in Asia, but wealth is doing all it can to dam those channels and reservoir riches against being dissipated by the dissipations of the inheritors.

The President regards this as a state rather than a national problem and perhaps he is right. Many states, California among them, have imposed inheritance taxes, although the one in California is being maintained with difficulty. The cohorts of Harrimanism are against it and narrowly missed repealing the inheritance tax law at the last session of the legislature and they stoutly refused to perfect the law for the certain and speedy collection of the tax.

Leave the channels open up and down and the son of a mechanic has as good a chance of dying worth a million as the son of a man worth a million. Clog those channels so that the fool, the spendthrift, the inefficient, cannot be separated from the fortunes they inherit and equality of opportunity will take wings and every race for wealth will be a hurdle.

To be sure it does seem inconsequential for a man to toil all his days heaping up if the next generation is to be free to pull down, but let the money-grubber look to that. If he discovers the folly of it before he dies he will be the better for it.

Those Free Ships.

Mr. Geo. W. Dickie's article, in this issue, dealing with the free ships argument, is not exactly light, summer reading matter. Those of our readers, if we have such, who desire above all things to be amused, will find little satisfaction in that article, but to the serious minded person who really cares for the flag of his country, for the equal station of this nation with the great nations of earth, this article of Mr. Dickie's will make a strong, if not in all cases a convincing, appeal.

There are many parties in interest. There is the capitalist, the exporter and importer, the ship builder and the seaman, not to speak of the citizen who inevitably must share in whatever befalls his country whether it be good or ill.

If the capitalist is the only person whose interests are to be subserved then suffer him to buy his ship where he can buy it cheapest, officer and man it where he can do that cheapest and he will soon take the American flag into all ports of the world, but that flag will not fly over American ships or American seamen and, in time of war, the men, at least, will not be available for fighting America's battles. The victory will only be half won at best.

The complete rehabilitation of the American merchant marine can not be effected until American built ships, owned by American capital and manned by American seamen shall carry the American flag into all the ports of the world. A thorough discussion of the subject should open some practical means for reaching that end. The subject is before the house.

In Him We All Suffer.

There are few persons in San Francisco whose being hurt by an automobile would hurt so many other persons as Father D. O. Crowley of the Youth's Directory. He lies in a hospital seriously maimed and scarcely a man or woman in the bay district of California has escaped being pained because of the unhappy event. Protestant and Catholic alike lament the casualty. Father Crowley has been more than a priest of his church serving it loyally. He has risen above sectarianism to devote his life to a broad humanism, and all who know him, either in person or by reputation, will hail the day when returning health and strength shall return him to his labor and love among boys of all faiths and of no faiths but in need of a friend.

In placing the solidarity of his party above the solidarity of the consuming millions the President espoused the lesser solidarity in place of the greater.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

According to the Fresno Republican, stated upon the authority of the animal world and uncivilized man, the most terrible sight on the earth is the face of a white man. Into that face countless generations of struggles with adversaries, human, inhuman and material, have graven power, cruelty, cunning and an unconquerable will to rule. From that face all other living creatures, except the rhinoceros and the peccary, flee, and these charge it and would eat it because of their terror of it. An intelligent Chinese declared that the first time he ever saw the face of a white man the sight nearly made him sick.

But it is not every face that has such a story to tell, except to those children of nature that are strangers to it. Compared one with another the faces of which men and women tell of weakness and inefficiency, of greed and covetousness, of licentiousness and sin, weariness and despair as well as of power and will. Not one face in a hundred challenges attention. We look as like to the Chinese as the Chinese to us, and only now and again do we come upon a face that betokens strength, character, capability, will.

One such face the writer saw on the boat crossing the bay one morning. It was the face of a woman. No sooner had the eyes rested upon it than there leaped into the mind the admonition of Macbeth to his lady: "Bring forth only men children. Thy undaunted metal should produce naught but males." Here was a woman who, whatever her life has been, should have been the mother of men. There was character in every line of her splendid face and in every wrinkle in her clothes. She was much advanced in her forties, wore her plumed turban as might a Scottish chief, walked and sat erect, half-composed and unflinching.

With back toward the front of the boat, looking into her face and then into fifty others, hers was the only one in sight that had a commanding story to tell. All the others spoke of immaturity, of weakness, of mediocrity. The eyes of one lacked lustre, the brow of another was low, the nose of many were weak, some leaned against or hung upon the backs of their seats as though craving support. She sat upright, and yet was not masculine. The poise of her head was intensely feminine. In her younger days she must have challenged the admiration of men as she now challenged their respect.

What a superlative advantage it must be to a man to have such a one for a mother unless, perchance (and the eccentricities of human attraction are quite capable of it) she had thrown herself into the arms of a husband of such inconsequential character that the very rabbits would not have fled away from him. It was not for nothing that the Arabs traced the pedigrees of their horses from dam to dam rather than from sire to sire. They knew the better line of descent. Of all the needs of human kind there is none to be preferred to that of a strong, sentient, pulsating motherhood.

The world is learning the truth of this. The out-of-doors girl is the hope of the race. The simpering, delicate, spirituelle became half fed girl is no longer the attraction she formerly was. It is only where the stress of greed presses need into small, ill-ventilated lofts, enforces long hours of standing behind counters, or longer hours of stooping over machines, that the right of coming generations to be better born is being denied. And yet, slow is the possible uplift of a race that it will be a thousand years before the better motherhood of the next generation will be made evident in a race of really superior men and women. And so, all down the ages, countless voices are calling like the wind song through the pines, to the industrial conscience of this age to afford opportunity for womanhood to become fit for motherhood, as fit as the exceptional woman who came across the bay on the eight o'clock boat.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Laudable Work of the Forest Service.

The Forest Service is doing excellent work for the people of California by establishing lookout stations whence the breaking-out of forest fires can be detected. Such a station has been established at Shuteye peak, with an elevation of 8,858 feet, whence a large part of Tuolumne, Madera and Fresno counties is visible. The station is connected by telephone with the various ranger stations below, and, although it has been established but a short time, the extinction of two fires already is due to it. Other and similar stations will be established as rapidly as possible, and it is hoped and expected that private owners will co-operate to make the service as efficacious as possible. Another Forest Service enterprise, which will prove of great value to stockmen, consists in steps being taken to increase the distribution of alfalfa on stock ranges which have been overgrazed. This plant has been recognized as both hardy and beneficial to stock, but a difficulty heretofore has been found in starting its growth. By repeated experiments the service has demonstrated that this has been due to the fact that nine-tenths of the seed sold by seed firms is worthless, having lost its germinative power. To offset this condition the service has arranged to grow and collect good seed which can be secured and planted by stockmen.

The Automobile Invasion.

Perhaps, in ten or twenty years from now, the Age of the Airship will have arrived, but that the present is the Age of the Automobile cannot be doubted. The automobile came by leaps and bounds; an experiment one day, the next day it was an established institution. At the beginning of 1895, or less than fifteen years ago, there were but seventy automobiles in the United States, and these were valued at $157,500, or $2,250 apiece. In 1904, scarcely ten years later, 20,000 machines were constructed and at an average price of $2,200 apiece—not much of a decrease in cost, but a mighty increase in number. Just four years later, in 1908, 55,000 were built and sold, while the output during this year is placed at 82,000, at an average price of $1,250, a great increase in number which is hardly offset by a notable decrease in price. It is estimated that 200,000 machines will be manufactured next year at an average price of $1,200. When these have been built and sold, it is claimed that one person in every 250—or, say, one family in every fifty—will be the proud and happy possessor of an automobile. Yes, the former remark was justifiable; this certainly is the Age of the Automobile, and we who walk may as well keep our eyes and ears open.

You Talk, and the Box Talks.

There are moral problems to solve and social questions to vex, but, after all, it sometimes seems that the chief things which "the world is doing" in these days are in the line of mechanical invention. For instance, here is an inventor who comes forward with an invention that he calls a "dictograph"—the "dicto" part of the name being all right, as the machine both talks and is talked to, but the "graph" being all wrong, as the device does no writing, which suggests that the inventor probably was stronger on mechanics than on philology. You talk anywhere near a little box, some six by eleven inches in size, and at once it captures your words and transfers them—by the essential connections, of course—to any person desired. Neither mouthpiece, receiver nor any particular location is requisite to the success of the experiment; merely to be somewhere in the vicinity of the box—say, in the same room—is all that is needed. The enunciation is perfect, and it is claimed that the instrument will receive and transmit a whisper inaudible to an ordinary ear. If the invention is what is claimed for it telephone companies may find it to their interest to "sit up and take notice," for it promises great improvement over the present system.

Balloon Trolley Line the Latest.

Thomas H. Norton, United States consul at Chennai, Germany, in a recent report tells of an enterprise which evidently is the latest and most "up to date" of all schemes in the line of locomotion. A well known engineer of Marburg is its promoter, and Consul Norton reports that he has secured sufficient capital to carry this idea into effect. Briefly stated, the scheme is to construct an aerial trolley line, to be run between Marburg and Freuenberg, a distance of five miles and up an incline of 1,200 feet. The car is to be supported by a cylindrical balloon attached to a cable beneath which the car will swing, and the motive power will be electricity. In other words, it will be a species of combination of electric railroad and dirigible balloon. It is estimated that it will cost $28,000 a mile for construction, and that a speed of 125 miles an hour can safely be attained on it. Thus, it will be seen, the entire trip of five miles can be made in two minutes and twenty-four seconds. Let somebody else step forward and take the first chance.

Where the Mosquito Is Monarch.

The progressive and intelligent men of the Southern states are realizing that it lies in their power to put an end to the malaria which hitherto has been so great a curse to some parts of the South. They have learned that it is a question of exterminating the mosquito and thus terminating the disease, and they are acting upon the knowledge as rapidly as arrangements can be made to do so. Probably the injury worked by malaria, which is disseminated by the mosquitoes, is most forcibly illustrated in the Delta region of Mississippi, where the body of land extending from the mouth of the Yazoo almost to the Tennessee line, a distance of more than a hundred miles, which is said to possess the richest soil in the world with the sole exception of the valley of the Nile. And it is a wilderness! Surrounded on every side by populous communities, its primeval forests still are the haunts of bear and deer, and its puny human inhabitants are few in number and scattered over wide spaces. Why? Because of malaria, or, to state the same case in another way, because of mosquitoes. From this very domain of natural bounty man has been exiled, and the mosquito is reigning monarch. It is to terminate the evil which this region so potentially illustrates that the wiser men of the South at last are taking action. Had it been done years ago the Delta country now would be thickly populated; but, then, it is comparatively recently that scientists learned about "the tricks and the manners" of the mosquito.

Very Latest Man-Killing Device.

A Frenchman named Gabor has invented a "radio-automatic" torpedo which he calculates should be very gratifying to humankind, inasmuch as it will kill its members off with great celerity and certainty. His torpedo, which carries an explosive charge weighing 1,800 pounds, should be vastly more effective—and consequently, of course, more enjoyable—than the ordinary torpedo, which carries a charge of but 200 pounds. However, it is in the method of handling it that its particular effectiveness is displayed. In addition to a motor battery, it carries an apparatus for receiving Hertzian waves, while its operator, at a distance, has an apparatus for transmitting them. In recent private tests in the Seine it was demonstrated that the torpedo responds perfectly to the will of its operator, as expressed in the Hertzian waves. It has been officially tested next month, when the French government will decide whether it wishes to use it in the future in cajoling mankind to be good.

The Holy Sepulcher for Germany.

Representative Young Turks who now are in Paris assert that their party is very anxious to secure the good will of the Christian nations of the world. In looking about for means to carry this wish into effect, the Young Turks have devised a plan which, whether or not it be consummated, will prove of deep interest to many. This is no less than turning the holy sepulcher, in which the Christ is supposed to have been buried, together with the contiguous domain, over to Germany. Germany has been tentatively selected for this trust because of the evident interest that her people have taken in Jerusalem. Thus, at this late day, if the plan is carried into effect, will the object of those long and bloody tramps known as the Crusades be attained through ways of peace.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "grat" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge an agent who would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

THE "NEW" THEATRE.

The New Theatre in New York is nearly completed. The idea of the founder of this institution is to provide an American Comedie Francaise, where a repertory of classical and new American plays will be produced at popular prices, without "stars." It is an attempt to make a really "national" theatre which will encourage good acting and good play writing. It is backed by financiers of high standing, and managed by artists of international reputation. Many people look to it as the most hopeful agency for the improvement of the stage in America.

Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra" is to be the production with which the New Theatre will make its opening bow to the public. The opening night will be Monday, November 8th, and the season will consist of about thirty weeks.

Although the theatre will be devoted to the presentation of dramas, musical comedies, spectacles and the like having no place in its repertoire, light opera will be given at twenty evening and twenty matinee performances.

In addition to "Antony and Cleopatra" the repertoire of plays will be "The Cottage in the Air" by Edward Knoblauch; "The Nigger," by Edward Sheldon; "Strife," by John Galsworthy, and Sheridan's "School for Scandal." The presentations will be made by the New Theatre Company, the members of which have been recruited with great care and in which no player will be featured or starred.

Louis Calvert, who was brought from London to produce the standard dramas, is an actor as well as a stage director of long experience and will also appear in several important roles. George Foster Platt will be the producer of modern dramas and Wilfrid North and Frederick Stanhope assistant producers. Elliott Schenck is the musical director; Edward Hamilton Bell, art director. As is already known, the directorate of the playhouse comprises Winthrop Ames, director; Lee Shubert, manager, and John Corbin, literary manager.

It will be a new version of "Antony and Cleopatra" that will be used for the opening night. No pains has been spared to make the presentation of this one of Shakespeare's works everything that could be wished for in an artistic sense and furthermore to make it historically accurate. To this end Jules Guerin, the artist, and Costumer Bell have collaborated. According to the announcement Mr. Sothern will interpret the part of Antony and Miss Marlowe that of Cleopatra. Others to enact important roles are Messrs. Bruning, Anson, Gottschalk, Buckstone, Stamford, Wendell, Balsar, Johnson, North, Melick, and Cordoba and Mmes. Forbes-Robertson, Busley and Bateman-Hunter.

Edward Knoblauch's "The Cottage in the Air," the first new play of the season, according to the present plan will be produced four days later, on Thursday night, November 11th. This is a fantastic comedy of rather delicate texture and is based on a story by the author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." Mr. Knoblauch is an American, a graduate of Harvard University, and is remembered by the author of "The Shulamite." The presentation will serve to introduce several members of the company who will not appear in "Antony and Cleopatra."

"The Nigger," one of the next dramas due for production, is distinctly American in its theme. Edward Sheldon, the author, is the writer of "Salvation Nell," in which Mrs. Fiske won success. He has laid his scenes in an undetermined part of the South of to-day and dealt with a novel and unusual side of the negro question. The drama is described as being of the strong, emotional type and as possessing exceptional literary and acting merit. The cast will include Messrs. Sothern, Cartwright, Johnson and Melick and Mmes. Marlowe, Sitgreaves and Sol. Smith.

The managers of the New Theatre rather deprecate any idea that it is intended primarily for the amusement of a small class and say that the hope is to make it as democratic as is the Comedie Francaise. Attention was called to the fact that but one-third of the repertoire will consist of so-called standard or classic works. The rest will consist of modern and popular plays on the theory that the cardinal function of the drama is to entertain.

"The standard works to be presented," says the announcement, "have been drawn from a field so extensive that a suitable selection was not difficult, and they as well as modern plays will continue in the repertoire for as long or short periods as their worth and popularity warrant."

"WE HASTEN TO CORRECT."

A typographical error in our last week's issue completely changed the point of view intended in the poem by "J. H." on the discovery of the North Pole. The author's purpose was to celebrate the discovery by Cook; the substitution of a 9 for an 8 in the year made it a "Pearlyite." We regret the unintentional mutilation of a really exquisite piece of verse. Without the author's knowledge or consent we print his despairing protest below.—The Editor.

JUANITA.

By E. A. Brininstool

Drear are the prairies: the ranges are silent;
Mournfully whispers each soft, passing breeze.

Down in the canyon an eddying murmur
Echoes the sigh in the giant pine trees.
Lone are the trails on the brown, dusty mesa
Up where the gems of the star-world peep through.

Sadly, a night-bird is plaintively calling—
'Nita, Juanita, I'm longing for you!

Out where the herds dot the range in the Springtime.

Out where the flowers you loved nod and sway,

Memory brings me a vision of sweetness,
Brings me a dream of a once-happy day.
Over the trails you are riding beside me,
Under the canopy of heavens of blue;

Smiling the love that your lips have repeated—
'Nita, Juanita, I'm longing for you!

When steals the night with its grim, dusky shadows,
And 'round the herd I am joggling along,
Your gentle face seems to lighten the darkness.

Each vagrant breeze seems to whisper a song:

Whispers a melody sweetly entrancing,
Telling me, dear, of your love ever true;
Whispers an echo which sets my heart dancing—

'Nita, Juanita, I'm longing for you!

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

Wordsworth's "Intimations of Immortality."

No human being ever looks upon a landscape with eyes that see merely what is there. No human mind perceives a forest merely as a succession of trees. No man, when he views the ocean, says to himself "salt water." The visual image is accompanied by an emotional or mental impression conveyed so quickly by the imagination that it blends in the mind with the visual impression and the two combine as one thought. Thus, to the savage or the ignorant, the forest is the abode of evil spirits, the ocean is "the unknown," a symbol of boundlessness.

With the advance of culture, the mental suggestions aroused by natural objects have been refined and sublimated. The Greeks rose to a conception of pantheism, in which trees and streams and oceans, being personified, took intelligent part in the general scheme of life. The Christian poets followed this Greek ideal, not out of faith, but for its high value as a poetic fancy. Not until the early part of the nineteenth century did the poetic treatment of nature rise from a fanciful and artificial use as a background for narrative or moralizing to a use which reflected the genuine suggestions aroused by nature in a sensitive and sincere modern mind. These suggestions naturally have nothing to do with Greek gods. They are rather sensations of intense delight in harmonious outlines and colors, or, where the suggestions rise from the sensuous to the intellectual or the moral, they have to do with modern ideals of religion or science.

Wordsworth stands as the highest representative of this modern poetry of nature. In his "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality," the idea, that childhood's glamorous impressions of nature are a recollection of the glories of the immortal home from which he lately came, is not an ancient idea at all. Even the immortality of words which speaks of an idea of immortality that would have puzzled a Greek philosopher.

But, to turn from this train of thought, how vivid and how wonderful is the picture Wordsworth paints in a few swift strokes in this poem! How lines in a few brief lines, he pierces the heart of manhood with wistful recollections of childhood hours. How, in one sentence, sonorous, eloquent, magnificently rhythmic and impressive, he paints the whole picture of those first impressions and veils it in a golden-glorious haze:

There was a time
When meadow, grove, and stream,
The earth, and every common sight
To me did seem
Apparied in celestial light,
The glory and the freshness of a dream.

A HUGO ANNIVERSARY.

The dedication of a new statue of Victor Hugo by Rodin on September 26th at Paris, the fiftieth anniversary of the publication of the "Legend of the Sirens" ("Story of the Centuries"), is to be made the occasion of a week's literary celebration to the memory of the great novelist and poet. There will be a ceremony at the Pantheon, a revival at the Comedie Francaise of "Le Roi S'Amuse" with Silvain in the role of Triboulet, and a fete in front of Notre Dame with a big procession of vagabonds carrying colored torches.

Japanese actors in a theater in Kobe, Japan, recently presented "Hamlet." The result was described as "a wonderful mixture of the beautiful and the grotesque." Ophelia appeared sometimes in graceful kimono and sometimes in western evening costume. The king at one time wore the picturesque costume of a Japanese nobleman and at others a silk hat and a swallow-tail coat. The climax was reached in Hamlet himself, who in the earlier scenes wore the uniform of a student of the Imperial university, but in the third act made his appearance on a bicycle, clad in a bright blue cycling suit.

HOUSEKEEPING A FINE ART

MAKING IT AN INTERESTING PROFESSION INSTEAD OF DRUDGERY.

Housekeeping a fine art, housekeeping a monotonous grind, which shall be?

At last the University of California and many of the public schools of the state have declared that they will do all in their power to see that it shall be a fine art, that housekeeping shall become as interesting to women as business is to men.

It is because housekeeping has become uninteresting that it has become drudgery. It has been allowed to become a monotonous repetition of the same thing, day after day, and month after month—so many meals to cook, so many dishes to wash, so much marketing to do, so many bills to meet. There is no variety; worse yet, the things that the housewife has to do make no appeal to her imagination.

But right here is the opportunity to lift the curse of dullness, of stupid iteration, from the daily tasks of the home. Suppose, when a woman makes the daily menu, that she knows the history of every fruit and vegetable she puts upon the list, that she knows the life work of Luther Burbank who developed the lowly potato, that she knows the chemical elements of every article of food, that she is familiar with the marvelous processes by which each thing is transmuted in Nature's laboratory from the seed to the marketable product, that she is acquainted with the principles by which the products of her cookery supply nutrition to the body. Instantly the menu ceases to be a mere list of edibles to be cooked and eaten, with the inevitable conclusion of a stack of dirty dishes to be washed. Instead, the menu becomes a part of an orderly and reasonable scheme of life. Bread suggests more to her mind than flour and salt and water and baking powder and grease. It suggests the romance of early days in California as Frank Norris visualized in "The Octopus." It suggests wonderful chemical actions and reactions. It suggests markets, and transportation, the history of peoples hungry for wheat land and fighting for the possession of it. It suggests the outside, busy world.

Or, suppose that a woman is doing the family sewing. To thousands of women, that means nothing but another lot of cutting-out to do, so many seams to run. But suppose that they knew the history of weaving, from the hand looms of the ancients to the mile-long factories of the present; that they had read the story of Penelope's fame, in the Odyssey, a woman honored above all other women because of her skill in handiwork; suppose that they knew the scientific facts about colors, so that they would understand why some colors harmonize and others "fight"; suppose that they knew the historical origin of every kind of weave and cloth. Would sewing still be a mere drudgery, or would it stir the imagination to see the connection between the goods and the needle and thread, and the larger life of humanity struggling up to the modern facilities of commerce and industry by which the weaves and fabrics of all the world are at one's corner shop?

Carry the idea into all branches of housekeeping and consider how much interest would be added to it if the housewife were informed as to the possibilities of furnishings and of decorations. Instead of merely stockpiling the house with the inevitable necessities of furniture and utensils, every purchase would be planned out with beauty as well as utility in mind, and with a range of choice that would make the selection an attractive piece of mental experimentation. The writer of these lines is acquainted with a married couple who made in the purchase of a sideboard one of the most interesting affairs of their lives. They spent their evenings for a year reading books from the public library on the history of furniture, until they could tell every color and finish and make of furniture at a glance. Then they spent their Saturday afternoons together for weeks searching second hand stores and the shops of dealers in the antique until they found the battered price they wanted. It did not cost a great deal more than a glaring piece of modern hand-me-down, and a few extra dollars invested at a cabinet maker's made the piece as solid and handsome as it was when it graced a colonial dining-room. And their purchase was economical. It will last them all their lives. It will always please, because they bought it with a carefully educated taste for the most graceful pattern.

And think how much more a house furnished with such interest and after such search—adventure it was to them—will be to them than a house furnished overnight without thought or interest. That piece of furniture means more to their eyes than a convenient place to put the glassware and table linen. It means months of comradeship in study and search, and careful economies, joyfully shared, to make the purchase possible. And what, pray, raises life from the level of a senseless routine to the dignity of a human occupation, but just such little interests and fellowships as these?

If every woman, by a little addition to her store of knowledge, received such a spur to her imagination that her household duties had such a background of interest and of connection with the lives of other people past and present, it is very unlikely that housekeeping would be considered a drudgery.

The part that the schools and colleges can play in lightening the burden of housework is to supply this knowledge. Several high schools in the state already teach the rudiments of cooking and sewing. Santa Barbara, most notably, has a very good department for this work. But, until recently, the University of California has not recognized the work done by high school students in household economics as counting anything toward entrance into the college. This has now been remedied, at the suggestion of the Alumnae Association. Under this new arrangement, nine credits, out of a necessary forty-five required for entrance, may be gained from high-school instruction in such subjects as cooking, sewing, dietetics, household decoration and furnishing, home economics, laundering, nursing, industrial arts, and industrial history.

This action of the university will undoubtedly stimulate high schools all over the state to establish departments of household economics. The effects will be of two different sorts. All that the high schools can successfully teach is the methods in use, say, in cooking or sewing or decoration. They cannot teach the historical background. That is the function of the university.

Thus, the pupils who study domestic economy in high school but do not go to college, will be equipped with a working knowledge of cookery and other branches. Those pupils who do go to college and follow up this course will fall naturally into one of the three following groups:

1st. Students desiring such knowledge of the facts and principles of household and allied problems as may equip them for efficiency in the home and in the community.

2nd. Students who desire to specialize on Domestic Economy in order to equip themselves as teachers of this subject in secondary schools and colleges. For these students, a more specific training is desirable. The student must acquire a knowledge of the broader facts behind technical subjects such as cooking, sewing, millinery, dressmaking and the like.

3rd. Students aiming to become sanitary inspectors, laboratory assistants or science workers in nutrition, textiles, hygiene, trained nurses, etc.

By the time students now entering the Riddle of Countless Ages.

Riddle of countless ages that only the gods may solve
As they sit in their tranquil heaven past where the stars revolve;
Tied to his whirling planet and e'er of its ghosts afraid,
Yet his soul leapt out to the spaces where shadow is heaped on shade;
Grasping the yellow tinsel that fades when he lieth low,
Yet daring to ask the question whose answer but gods may know;
Feet in the dust enshrouded, but eyes that the heavens scan,
Riddle of countless ages, and petty and great, is Man.
Slave of his brutish passion, and monarch of realms untrod;
A pygmy who strives with pygmies for guerdons bestowed by God;
Talking in foolish prattle, or knowing the sages' theme;
A huckster who vends his chattels and dreameth eternity's dream;
Puny, and less than puny, the lightning he chains and owns,
While he creeps from his caves primeval to struggle for angels' thrones.
Jeered by the fiends infernal, and loved by the white-robed clan, Riddle of countless ages, which ages shall answer—Man.
Ice-clad were the Northland spaces that mocked at his puny might,
But the old flag flies 'neath the sombre skies of the frozen world to-night.
He dallies with tinsel baubles, then turns to his ocean slave,
And his great steeds ride on the warring tide or rock on the tranquil wave,
And whether to worship or pity, to love him or loathe his way,
Look in your heart, my brother, and counsel us if you may.
Nay, but you cannot counsel, who also do blindly live,
For man is a riddle, and God in him the answer to it must give.

The Unfamed Poets Laureate.

Last week The California Weekly published a complete list of the poets laureate. These were the poets on whom royalty bestowed its special favor. They were its petted children. To them it said: "So far as lies in my power—and man recognizes my power as all but boundless—I will make you famous. Let us see to what extent royalty succeeds in enforcing its dictum when it passes in the domain of artificial distinction wherein it flourishes to that of God-given genius. What recognition is given these poets laureate in that most valuable and complete of similar compilations, "Bartlett's Familiar Quotations," remembering that few indeed are the quotations of worth which cannot be found in that book?

There are sixteen of these poets laureate, not including Alfred Austin, the present occupant of the position. Of these sixteen, four—Thomas Shadwell, Lawrence Eusden, William Whitehead and Henry James Pye—have not a line or a fraction of a line in "Familiar Quotations." Five others—Samuel Daniel, Sir William Davenant, Nahum Tate, Nicholas Rowe and Thomas Warton—barely escape a similar fate, the most quoted of them occupying less than a page in a volume of 851 pages. The seven that really live in the world of quotation are Edmund Spenser, Ben Jonson, John Dryden, Colley Cibber, Robert Southey, William Wordsworth and Alfred Tennyson. Seven live, and nine are forgotten, or so nearly forgotten that their forlorn ghosts might sigh that they live so little in the memories of men. Verily, genius is something that kings cannot bestow, nor can they remove one laurel from its brow. Yet, perhaps it may as well be admitted that they might have done worse than to hit the bulleye seven times in a possible sixteen in shooting at its "shining mark."

The Opinions of Rufus.

Sence readin' the daily papers' 'bituaris 'bout Harriman my inquirin' mind keeps me wonderin' whether they lied then or now.

While us philosophers admit that both Capital an' Labor sometimes are unjust to each other, we can't help feelin' they's some diff'rence 'tween bein' unjust fer a steam yat an' fer a full stumuck.

The people wanted to stone the magdalen, but I haven't heered they made any anxious inquiries 'bout who the man was. They don't yit, an' they won't till wimmen themselves insist on what our wandrin' Teddy called the square deal.

'Neither have I seen the seed of the rightous beggin' bread. Anyway, whether they're that kind of seed or the other, what they allers ask me fer is "ten cents to git a cup of coffee."

I'm jest like you. I can't begin to tell my sorrow for the lost an' fallen condition of the feller that don't agree with me in my views.

You may be bright 'nough to see a thing ten or fifteen years 'fore your neighbors do, but you can't keep them frum feelin' that you are a fool an' a crank or you wouldn't have done it.

Sometimes I almost b'lieve I'd ruther not graft than to do it an' then have to hire seven lawyers to prove I didn't.

O' course heaven an' hell is fer them that deserves 'em, but I ain't never been able to find out what place theology provides fer us that deserve both places several times 'most every day.

"Mercy seasons justice," says the great poet. "Pass a little more of that seasonin'," says Mr. Calhoun.

If You've Nothing to Say.

Oh, a very nice thing are words at command.
As I think that perhaps you may know;
Rare, elegant words of a No. 1 brand,
With fire of your genius aglow.
It is great to spin words as a boy spins a top,
To sparkle in verbal display,
To write with a pencil that never need stop—
That is, if you've something to say.

I have known several folk in my time, my young friend,
Whose words were a volcanic flow.
A sort of eruption that never would end,
Or their hearers imagined 'twas so.
You might listen to them by the day or the week.

But your time would be frittered away;
In vain an idea from them you would seek—
Alas, they had nothing to say.

They weary us oft, do these voluble men,
As they talk, and they talk, and they talk,
Till we fain would escape the affliction, and then

Take a walk, and a walk, and a walk.
If you've nothing to say, don't say it, I plead.

If you do you may folly display,
And I think I should know, for I've written this screed
Because I had nothing to say.

Why She Wept Bitterly.

"I insist," said Mrs. Flittem, "that woman should have her rights."
"What rights?" Mr. Flittem inquired.
"Why, the—the right to have her rights."

And when Mr. Flittem merely smiled she wept bitterly and said he was a mean thing.

Diogenes Transfers His Lantern.

The ghost of Aristotle met that of Diogenes.

"Hello, Di," it said, "You look lonely without your lantern. What have you done with it?"

"Surrendered it."

"Surrendered it?"

"Yes, parted with it; given it up, you know."

"How did it happen?"

"Oh, on account of San Francisco and its Good Government League. They have three candidates for mayor down there—Crocker, you know, and Leland, you know, and Mc Carthy, you smell. They all are in favor of the dear people and eternal justice if the price is not too high, and—"

"I don't see what all this has to do with your lantern."

"I am coming to that. The Good Government League started out to find and name a candidate among these three who would be honest to the interests of justice, regardless of the money or influence of bribers, and I was informed that they did it. Naturally, I saw that they were better than I fitted to carry my lantern, so I gave it to them."

"But why?"

"Why, they found that kind of a man where I never would have thought of looking for him."

An Obituary "Pome."

It long has been my fixed belief that the most cruel blow we can deal to our dear departed takes the form of the obituary "pome" which we sometimes have published and hurl after them into the land of shadows. Such an outburst of brief drifted into this office this week, as they do almost any week, and while, out of regard for the feelings of any mourners who may have feelings, it will not be republished, I will endeavor to give some idea of its quality in a paraphrase which, I think, is neither better nor worse than the original. Here, then, it is:

Our darling Millie has died and gone
And we shall not see her ever any more,
For with the angels she is playing a harp
Over on the golden shore.

Oh, do not sadly weep for her, dear mother,
Or let your tears fall down,
For we do not know what sorrows she might have had

If she had kept on till grown.

Two verses are enough, but think of how Millie must feel if she is of a sensitive nature and knows what is going on down here. It is terribly hard on the dear girl. Yet that paraphrase is scarcely worse than obituary verses which you may see any week if you have a wide acquaintance with exchanges. Ah, we sometimes are very cruel to the departed when they are where they cannot strike back.

When Baby Kisses Me Good Night.

When baby, in her nightie clad,
Comes toddling down to kiss me,
Ah, Time, although your face be sad
And still your blessings miss me,
Yet you have nothing to atone,
Since baby kisses are my own.

Her wee pink feet rose-petals twin—
From Fairyland the roses—
Her snowy gown a tent wherein
They hide while she reposes,
Her lips sweet wellspring of delight
When baby kisses me good night.

When baby climbs upon my knee
To woo me with her chatter,
Though Time may wreak his wrath on me,
What matter, and what matter?
I'm blessed as king upon his throne
While baby's cheek is 'gainst my own.

They say that Time is grim and gray,
Of pleasure e'er a miser,
But I forgive him as I may,
Since, growing old and wiser,
He brought, from mists that round us press,
My wee, sweet babe all days to bless.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editors The California Weekly.

Gentlemen—Permit me to express my approval of your editorial, "Butressed by the Law." It is the business of the leaders of enterprise to see that they are buttressed by the law, and of the national executive to run along the edge of the law, on its firing line, as it were, watching most jealously any overreaching as against the rights of the people.

Very truly yours,

DAVID STARR JORDAN.

Stanford University, Sept. 21, 1909.

The founders of The California Weekly hardly dared to hope to challenge the favoring attention of our citizens of first class minds and attainments. Accordingly they addressed themselves, from the beginning, to the Middle Class Man. To our disappointment we have not as yet challenged the attention of as many middle class men as we had hoped for and, greatly to our surprise, we have had more cordial and generous recognition from men of the very first culture, character and station than we had deemed possible. Our form of editorial expression is blunt, unpolished and, so we have felt, lacking in that exactness of statement and adjustment of balance which a trained culture has a right to demand. The kind words of Dr. Jordan are thankfully received and cordially appreciated. We shall not make more friends among those who live and move in the atmosphere and on the plane where he lives and moves than we shall need in order to make The California Weekly what we hope to make it—a power for good in this state.

Nevertheless, we shall still pin our faith to the Middle Class Man and shall not rest content until we reach many thousands more of him than we have reached so far. He counts. He does things. His political efficiency can be made the basis of a forward movement. Too often, those of the very highest intelligence and culture only think things and are content with a salutary state of mind. When an American Middle Class Man gets an idea digested he wants to see something done. So do we. Mr. Taft is coming westward talking splendidly at every important station, but what is he going to do? The cultivated man wants to know what the President thinks of this, that and the other issue. The Middle Class Man wants to know what the President is going to do about the things that he thinks about. So does The California Weekly. It will seek to hold our big executive to a strict accounting for his stewardship. We want him buttressed, not manacled, by the law.

Editor The California Weekly:

Your publication is the ablest and the sanest put out in this country to-day. It stands unchallenged for the right in all things, and for the best interests of the state and the whole people. The corrupt and corrupting "interests," and the miserable creatures of those interests, nowhere in the whole country get such telling body-blows as your publication gives. I can usually endorse everything you say, but

San Francisco, Sept. 21, 1909.

We cut off a most interesting and valuable contribution to our columns at the "but" for the reason that our correspondent did not so far take us into his confidence as to give us his name that we might know who was responsible for it, or for a statement of facts which, if true, are important to the public in the highest degree. We shall avail ourselves of the statements for purposes of verification before publication, but it would be an imprudent journalism that would give them currency on a foundation of anonymity. We are particularly grateful for the opening sentence and hope that it is true, too, although a little rough on the other fellows.

Publisher's Announcement.

The Staff of The California Weekly finds pleasure in announcing a series of articles from the pen of Dr. Charles Reynolds Brown, pastor of the First Congregational church, Oakland, covering the labor problem. Dr. Brown is a member in good standing of the Labor Council in Oakland, attends the meetings regularly and participates in them loyally. His series of articles will undertake to interpret unionism as it is in inspiration and purpose, in personnel and character, to those whose lack of a sympathetic insight into this organized struggle for the uplift of the common man has put them in an untenable position in regard to it. He will also interpret that spirit and purpose to union labor people themselves that they may get a juster point of view of their relation to society as a whole. This outline is more conjectural on our part than specific on his, but we feel warranted in assuming this to be his general trend. Than Dr. Brown there is no man on this coast better qualified to handle this theme. The articles will not begin until sometime in November as Dr. Brown must first go to Cornell to deliver a course of lectures.

Democratic Religion.

Professor Charles Zuehlbin will deliver an address at Hotel St. Francis Sunday evening, before the San Francisco Materialist Association, his theme being Democratic Religion. The address will be delivered in Colonial Hall and an admission fee will be charged. Professor Zuehlbin is a brilliant and much talked of man and we find place for this notice in the belief that there are many who will esteem it a favor to be informed of the event.

Old Roman Wall of London Discovered.

While men were excavating, not long ago, on the site of Christ's hospital, London, they discovered, about twelve feet beneath the surface of the ground, a bastion of the old city wall of London. This wall was laid by Romans in England's early days. The work of unearthing the wall will be continued.

("Housekeeping."—Concluded.)

University have completed the two years of work in general culture which is required of all students, the university will have a department organized to take care of all three of the classes described above.

It is a pleasing prospect: home-making an art, housekeeping a science, life for the average woman of domestic instincts a thing that stirs the imagination. Nothing more sensible, or more necessary, or of more far-reaching benefits, has recently been undertaken by our schools and colleges.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Camps of Allies Just how far apart the Are Being Formed hostile armies are no one outside of headquarters really knows, but at least two parallel lines are unmistakably forming. Charles F. Curry heads one camp and James N. Gillett the other. On Curry's side, Frank C. Jordan has taken his stand and is doing the whirlwind act for the job of Secretary of State, aiding and abetting Curry's contest for governor all he can and Curry, by way of return, smiles benignantly upon Jordan's candidacy for an office he is, if anything, more unfit to fill than Curry, himself, is unfit for gubernatorial honors. On the other side of the division line H. S. Morrow is making common cause with Governor Gillett to help the latter to succeed himself as governor, while the gubernatorial influence is being thrown to help Morrow in his, at least tentative, candidacy for Secretary of State. Between these two candidates no one who knows both men has a doubt of the incomparable superiority of Morrow over Jordan, who comes nearer to typifying the individual with the cap and bells than anyone else in politics since Charley Shorthridge got out. Incidentally it may be observed that both parties to this gentle and joyous joust are "organization" to the core and the success of neither one can prove of public advantage. Walter Parker brought Morrow out.

What Caribuncle Will One of the bits of Succeed That Boil?

political news which drifts up from the south is that Walter Parker, chief executive agent for that end of the state of the Southern Pacific's political bureau, is sick and will be compelled to give up the trade of politics by which he has lived so long. Now the question is being asked, who will be the new leader for the machine? That question may interest Mr. Herrin, and likewise those close assistants who would be glad to be picked as Parker's successor, but there is no reason why the selection should concern anybody else. Railroad politics will continue to be done in the same way, no matter who does them, until there is a change in the Flood Building, and that will only come when Harriman has some successor who is bold enough to depart from the Harriman political policies. It is not to be expected that Judge Lovett or any one else who is a mere stopgap will order a radical change. Some day the Southern Pacific may have a responsible head who will believe in taking it out of politics, but that day has not come yet, and meantime Wm. F. Herrin and his merry men will go on doing politics in the same way they have done them so many years.

Oh, That He Had Stolen a Horse, Too

Governor Gillett, we regret to learn, has denied the first application made for an extradition warrant to bring back a wife-deserting husband. This absconder, a person named Oley, was charged with abandoning a wife and three children, who were left without means of support; he was arrested in New York as he was in the act of boarding a steamer for Europe, but since the governor refuses to extradite him, he will, of course, be left to go his way, and private or public charity must care for his family. It is said the governor's reasons for the expense of the proceedings, the uncertainty of securing recognition of the offense by the New York authorities, and the probability of prosecution being balked by a reconciliation of husband and wife if he should be brought back—three reasons which are not convincing. If the state can afford to extradite petty embezzlers it can afford to bring back brutes who desert helpless wives and children, and unless we mistake Governor Hughes he would be glad to grant a writ for such an offense. If the fellow had stolen a horse as well as left his family to beg or starve, the governor would have kept the wires hot to catch him, but as he had only committed the gravest offense a man can commit, short of murder, he is permitted to escape unhindered. Our governor evidently suffers from intellectual screw worms.

Charles M. Belshaw The Watchman is States His Position under obligations to the Pasadena News for the following declaration of the attitude, upon a very important subject, of Charles M. Belshaw, who is making his canvass before the people for the Republican nomination for governor. Asked to state his position he said: "I would not be governor other than the people's governor. This doesn't mean that I am an anti-corporation man—that I am against corporations because they are corporations. I don't believe in corporate money running the state. I recognize the rights of the corporations, and I would respect them. If a corporation had anything to bring up that was just and not detrimental to the interests of the people, I would favor it."

A Very Good Talk This statement of Mr. As Far As It Goes

Belshaw's is very good as far as it goes, but The Watchman misjudges the popular temper if it does not require that the candidate at votes for at the direct primary shall go farther. It has come to The Watchman that Mr. Belshaw has been disinclined to declare his particular brand of Republicanism and has been disposed to rest content with declaring his Republicanism in general terms. Will he proclaim, over his own signature, and publish in the most public manner, his belief that California has, for more than a quarter of a century, been, in the main, governed by a Political Bureau maintained by the Southern Pacific company and that, if elected governor, that form of government shall be brought to a full stop, so that the public execution of the concerned? Will he now declare that, if elected governor, he will permit no appointments to office to be made at the dictation, or by the advice and consent, of William F. Herrin or any of his handy men such as Parker, Lynch, Burke, Hutton, George Knight or Tim Sullivan? Mr. Belshaw's instincts are good. He can put up a good, stiff fight when aroused. Will he now come out boldly and declare that, if he is elected, he will do his best to whip the Southern Pacific Political Bureau to a standstill and to restore free government to the people of California? Will he strive to make California once again a free state? Nothing short of an emancipation proclamation will serve any candidate's purpose this time.

Napa Hospital In the Throes

A madhouse is not presumed to be a place of quiet, but in many of our state hospitals the patients have been rather more tranquil than the management. The explanation is politics. Dr. Stone, the superintendent of Napa Hospital, was given his position, not through any special fitness, but through politics, and he has been doing politics ever since. It is only a question of time when politics will "do" him. Given a position through political pull he has had to give positions under him in obedience to the will of others and, therefore, there is and has been, little of discipline in that institution. Its boards of managers have been made up of politicians. Tom Dozier is a member of the board now. Employees have felt that they could go over the superintendent's head to the power above, and are sustained in spite of the superintendent. They have generally slipped up on it because Stone has proven the better politician of the two, but in the most quiet times there has been a smothered volcano ready to go off without warning. When it goes off in good form Dr. Stone will find himself blown over into the next county. It isn't a good condition of affairs. Local boards of managers should be done away with, and a Hospital Department created for a unified control of all the hospitals in the state, making the governor responsible to the people and the State Superintendent of Hospitals responsible to the governor. The Lunacy Commission is another joke.

Those Halcyon Days On the faith of the Before the Big Fire Examiner, which is not likely to misquote or be unfair to P. H. McCarthy, that candidate told the "Business Men's League," (presumably saloon-business men) that, if elected mayor of San Francisco, it would be his aim to place the city's affairs in the condition they were in before the fire. No doubt McCarthy was in earnest and will keep his word if he has the opportunity. What fine days those were! Days when Schmitz and Ruef were shaking ducats out of the duds of all the iniquities in the town, yet giving them an unhindered opportunity to do likewise with every fly that could be caught in all the spiderwebs that could be spun. Gentlemen, too, desiring inside opportunities to thrive at the public cost, were not turned empty handed away unless they came empty pocketed to "distinguished counsel," at present having his offices, inconveniently but not improperly, in the county jail. McCarthy will restore those conditions if he can. The Examiner says that McCarthy says so, and the Examiner will do McCarthy no intentional wrong, for it also years for those same days and will give McCarthy all the aid and comfort it dares. Hoorsay for McCarthy. There isn't an unconvicted criminal in town who won't vote for him if he stands pat to the end for a restoration of the conditions in this city that obtained before the fire. The Morning Moral Idiot will sympathize with McCarthy, but will probably remain true to Crocker, hoping to reach the same comforting condition by another and more putatively respectable route.

Cost of Maintenance The good little moun- Must Be Considered town of Placerville, El Dorado county, which holds a unique place in early California history, wants the new state trades school, and is asking other towns to aid in getting it. The subject was discussed at a meeting in Sacramento, and Mayor White, among others, is reported in the newspapers as favoring the proposal, though it is to be hoped the newspapers erred in their reports. This is the point: The new state institution, if we must have it, ought to be established at some convenient central point, where it will be least expensive and most useful; no odd little town situated in an out-of-the-way corner should have its whim humored by being made the seat of a state institution. Placerville is at the end of a branch railroad with few trains and high fares; every boy sent there from the date of the opening of the school to the end of time would mean so much additional and unnecessary railroad fare, and probably additional per-diems for attendants to take the boys there. California has had enough and to spare of this foolishness in the local and state institutions, in the wrong places. Public institutions should, as far as possible, be located near the centers of population in the interests of economy in maintenance and control.

To Heap Coals of Fire As a consequence of On Southern Heaters the state division disturbance in the southern portion of the state, the Republican politicians are talking about the nice things it will be necessary to do for the south in the composition of a ticket for next year's election. For the time being, it is conceded that the south must have the United States Senator who is to be elected;

indeed it seems that no northern California man has even ventured to think of being a candidate. Then, inasmuch as it is assumed that the governor will come from the north, it is thought that it would be very nice and complimentary to hand to the south, on a silver platter, the nomination for lieutenant-governor, and invitations for bids have been issued. It is rumored that Senator Estudillo and Senator Roseberry have been given private hints that bids by them would be especially acceptable, but attached to this is a suspicion that the organization may desire to elect the successor to one or the other of them. A state senator has a vote while a lieutenant-governor, it will be remembered, ordinarily has none. There is also an indication that H. S. Morrow, of San Diego, is being encouraged to run for secretary of state. With these officers and a few more crumbs the organization politicians hope that the mouth of complaint in Los Angeles will be stopped.

Making Enemies For Isla's Creek

It was suggested last week by The Watchman that a reason why the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau may have desired to hit Southern California a smart bluff under one eye may have been to anger that portion of the state into voting for the new scheme of taxation, resubmitted after being doubtfully amended by the last legislature. It has been suggested since then that there may have been another and equally potent reason for wishing to administer a stinging blow to Southern California pride. This is that the Southern Pacific does not wish to see the Isla's Creek improvement bonds approved by the people. Just why not is not important to this story. Perhaps they think that the Western Pacific is getting closer to the proposed basis than the pioneer road would like to see it. Be that as it may the Herrin machine is opposing the Isla's Creek project and, through the San Francisco Board of Trade, induced Southern California to vote down the bond proposition upon which that project depended. To make sure of a second defeat, inflicted from the same source, it was only necessary to anger Southern California at San Francisco. Equalizing that portion of the state with an unequal vengeance was sure to produce the desired result. In this the San Francisco dailies made haste to aid and abet the Southern Pacific. Having accomplished its purpose the political bureau will hold out nothing but olive branches that the feeling of the southern portion of the state toward itself may be mollified, but what will San Francisco offer as a token of amity and comity?

The Campaign in Rumor in San Francisco continues to spread the story that the Republican vote will be heavily split by Leland and Mc-Carthy, leaving Crocker pretty well stranded. The Republican platform, with its hazy and indeterminate stand on vital issues, has disappointed the Independent Republicans, who, it is said, will probably swing to Leland as the least objectionable candidate. The machine Republicans, the same report has it, have had the word passed to them that McCarthy is the man of the hour. Other evidences than this rumor point to Leland and McCarthy as being the leading candidates. All political signs that usually count for anything indicate that between them the real battle lies. Leland has played very diplomatically the game of attracting the doubtful voters. McCarthy is lavishing money on his campaign, if one may judge from the street and saloon signs he is placarding the city with. A well-informed observer of union labor conditions confides to The Watchman the information that union men are looking with amazement at the profusion of silk banners announcing McCarthy's candidacy at every turn, and asking, "Who's paying for them?"

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

Hop-picking in Mendocino county was completed last week. The product is estimated at 10,500 bales of excellent quality.

Because of matrimonial infelicities Stewart Faudre, of Forestville, Sonoma county, shot and fatally wounded his wife, later committing suicide. The double tragedy took place near Ukiah.

By the overturning of a stage, near Redding, Samuel Dollarhide, the driver, was killed, and several of the passengers were more or less seriously injured.

The Eureka Californian has issued an artistic and handsomely illustrated edition containing a fund of information which will be particularly valuable at a time when the early completion of the railroad from that city to San Francisco has been announced.

The Riverside Press announces that "River-side county, under her no-liquor laws, has had no criminal cases in the courts for three months." It adds: "That seems to show that, although prohibition may not prohibit altogether, it is at least a mighty good thing."

On the fourteenth of this month forty-seven carloads of fruit were shipped from Lodi, thirty cars containing tokays and the remainder wine grapes and watermelons.

The Marysville Democrat tells of a man who passed his vacation (its length not mentioned) in prospecting on Lost creek, and found over $600 worth of gold nuggets. The Democrat does not say why he failed to continue his vacation.

I. D. Standford, the editor of the Marysville Appeal, has resigned to accept a position with the Sacramento Bee.

The tariff on lemons and oranges having been raised, the railroads have felt that the "traffic will bear" an increase, and have acted accordingly. It is estimated that this increase of freight rates will take $2,000,000 from the orange-growers of the state and $7,000,000 from the orange-growers.

Superior Judge Warren Sexton of Butte county died recently. His death came suddenly and unexpectedly, and is deeply regretted by all who knew him.

The Chico Record now is established in a fine, new building of which it is the owner. Congratulations are hereby extended.

The Tulare supervisors have purchased, for $15,000, the "Mooney grove," consisting of 100 acres of fine oaks on a tract situated between Visalia and Tulare. The grove will be known as Mooney Park, and a clause in the deed provides that timber never shall be cut from it except after it becomes dead wood.

THE GRAFT CASES.

The trial of Patrick Calhoun stands precisely where it did a week ago. Attorney Stanley Moore still is sick, and consequently no progress has been made.

AMERICAN SHIPPING IN AMERICAN SHIPS

III. FREE SHIPS.

By G. W. DICKIE.

It was not my intention in these articles to take up the question of free ships except in a casual way; indeed I had not intended to touch upon this phase of our investigation into American shipping in the foreign trade at this time, but, within the past few weeks, that part of our general subject has become more prominent than it has been for some years and in order to meet the inquiries that have been freely made as to the correctness of the claims made by the proponents of free ships I think it proper to take up this matter while these inquiries are being made.

The first intimation of an organized movement in favor of free ships that the public received was made at a banquet given in Washington on June 23d by the Merchant Marine League; the President was present at this banquet. A bill which was to be presented the following day in the Sixty-First Congress by Representative Humphrey of Washington was considered and ratified at this banquet. This bill is patterned after the one considered by the last congress but contains several new features. The original bill provided that the pay for ocean mail service on the vessels of the first class on routes to South America, the Philippines, Japan, China, and Australia, should hereafter be the pay now accorded vessels of the first class and, in addition, the new bill provides for free ships. That is to say, Americans are to be permitted to purchase vessels in any country they may choose and run them under the American flag in the foreign trade or trade with the Philippines.

Another feature of this bill providing for reduced tonnage taxes on vessels trading with nearby countries and increasing the tax on vessels in the transoceanic trade. I have been unable to discover the object of this last feature of the new bill.

Mr. Dollar's Idea.

Locally the free ship idea has been prominently brought before our shipowners in an address given by Mr. Robert Dollar at a banquet given recently to a visiting congressional committee. As a shipowner Mr. Dollar claims that the laws should be changed so that he can—

First: Buy his ships where he can get them the cheapest to engage in foreign trade only.

Second: Man them as other nations.

Third: Change our antiquated inspection laws so that the inspection requirements shall not cost more than other nations.

If I were a shipowner like Mr. Dollar with my ships engaged in foreign trade I might be able to see this question in the same way as he, but, having been a shipbuilder all my life, I cannot admit that American ships should be built by foreigners. Mr. Dollar said to the congressmen that they need not be afraid of hurting the American shipbuilder as there had not been a keel laid in an American yard for six years to engage in the foreign trade. Having been dead for six years the shipbuilder cannot possibly be hurt and should be quite willing to remain dead; as the American shipowner in the foreign trade is quite as dead as the American shipbuilder, why bring one to life and leave the other dead?

Mr. Dollar presents his plea in a very forceful manner and backs his demands with certain facts that demand and invite very careful consideration. He has come to the conclusion based upon these facts that a cargo steamer cannot be built in America for double the price it can be built in Europe.

The "Tramp" Example.

I will take one of his examples. He said: "A 7,000-ton cargo steamer can be built for $180,000 in England. This same vessel would cost more than $400,000 here." Mr. Dollar's figures are, I think, correct, and I am not going to waste any time disputing them as particular instances of a general condition; I claim, however, that these figures should not be accepted as final and conclusive as to the relative costs of building cargo steamers here and abroad, nor will I endeavor to show, as has sometimes been done, that the American built ship will be the better built ship of the two, for it is more than likely that the reverse will be the case for the reason that the type of ship Mr. Dollar gives as an example has not been developed here and our shipbuilders have not built many of them, whereas in England the ship popularly known as the "tramp" has been perfected in every detail and every possible economy in the building of her has been worked out to the finest point. The name "tramp" is often used to denote something of an inferior nature in shipping, but in a certain sense the shipbuilder's art receives its highest expression in this type of ship; the British "tramp" has made British commerce.

I will assume that the vessel whose relative costs are given above is the steamer "Hazel Clark," built in 1905 by A. Rodgers & Co., Port Glasgow, Scotland, and registered at Victoria, British Columbia, of 4,304 tons gross, and 2,804 tons net, having a length of 370 feet, a breadth of fifty feet and a depth to upper deck of twenty-nine feet, seven inches. She will carry a dead weight of 7,000 tons, including cargo, fuel and consumable stores. When Mr. Dollar paid $180,000 for this ship he paid only five pounds, four shillings per D. W. ton, which is a very low price and shows what a very clever buyer he is. It is well to know in regard to this that there is always some yard over there either in England or Scotland in great need of a contract and willing to take work at a very low price in order to keep things going and as this type of vessel is standard and needs very little planning a very low price can in times of slackness in the shipyards be obtained from some yard. I have been assured by several British builders that anything under six pounds per D. W. ton for the standard type of cargo steamer means loss to her builders.

American and British Costs Compared.

As I am quite familiar with the unit cost price of building both in British and American yards I will endeavor to show what should be the cost price of building such a vessel both in America and in Britain.

It is sometimes claimed that we can do more work here per man than they do in Britain, but my experience does not show that to be the case and I think the cost of the product may be taken as directly proportional to the cost of materials and the rate of pay.

The amount of steel material in the hull of the vessel chosen above would be about 2,312 tons and the labor costs are at present in about the proportion of: Britain, 1.50; America, Atlantic Coast, 2.70; America, Pacific Coast, 3.00.

Based on these assumptions the cost of this ship would be estimated as follows:

	Cost in Dollars in Great Britain.	U. S. East.	U. S. West.
Steel material in hull at mills	$69,399	$76,131	$76,131
Freight, mills to yard 2,890		7,768	31,074
Labor on above materials	46,246	83,243	92,492
Maenery	37,500	51,000	60,000
Materials for wood and outfit	18,700	24,500	27,000
Labor on above	16,000	24,000	28,000
Total	$210,135	$300,642	$356,757

The above estimates include overhead

charges but no profit; the total for a vessel built in Britain would agree with the statements made to me in Britain that the shipbuilders lose when the price falls below six pounds per D. W. ton. This estimate I believe to be correct, for a duplicate to-day of the steamer "Hazel Clark" in the respective places named, and while a bid from an American yard might be higher it would be so because the American yards have not had the opportunity to build such vessels and so have not secured the same relative economic skill in turning them out as have the British. Under the same conditions the relative costs would be as above, and while the difference is not so great as Mr. Dollar shows by his examples yet it is great enough to prevent effectually the American-built ship from competing unaided in the foreign trade.

Bounty Must Equalize Cost.

It is claimed, and truly claimed I think, that government aid to American built ships in the foreign trade would have to be sufficient to equalize the cost; even if we gave building bounties to make up the difference in cost of building we would not be alone, for France has adopted that very method of fostering her waning shipbuilding industries. Suppose a French shipowner wanted a vessel of the kind and type that we have been discussing; he would probably get a cheaper offer from French builders than from British, for the French law that went into effect in 1906 provides for a building bounty of twenty dollars per gross ton and forty dollars per ton weight of machinery; for this ship such a bounty would give the builder $100,480 to help him meet the British price; the same bounty paid by the United States would enable a shipowner here to get his vessel built as cheaply in this country as in the British Isles; the Pacific Coast would still be a little behind, however, on the basis shown above. A Japanese shipowner giving an order to a Japanese yard would profit by their law of 1896 which provides for a bounty to the builder of such a vessel of ten dollars per ton gross register in addition to two and one-half dollars per indicated horse power for the machinery. This would give the Japanese shipbuilder $48,000 to help him meet the British price. That, of course, is not enough to meet the difference in cost between Britain and America but then Japan is very poor and wages are low there so that it does not need so much to equalize the difference; it shows, however, that the United States must do in order to have her shipowners build their ships at home, and thus resuscitate the dead shipbuilder.

Those who would reestablish the American merchant marine on the high seas, however, need more than free ships, for they could not run their ships in competition with the British ships even if the cost of building here were no more than it is there. This was very forcefully brought out before the merchant marine commission when the American owners of foreign-built ships stated that they would not run their ships under the American flag even if a free ship bill were passed if they had to operate them under American laws. I am glad that the American owner of foreign-built ships himself allows that the sacrifice of the American shipbuilder is not enough; he must have cheap labor to operate his ships in order to compete, but it does not occur to him that the American shipbuilder only needs the same thing to enable him to compete with the foreign shipbuilder.

What Similar Manning Means.

In addition to finding his ships in the cheapest market the shipowner ambitious to engage in the foreign trade with ships flying the American flag also wishes to be permitted to man them as other nations do; he does not explain fully what that means and

Chapter IX. A LONELY NIGHT RIDE.

GOING into her father's shop one day to call him to supper, and not finding him there, Helen was astonished to find a big revolver fixed to a framework in a five-gallon oil can. Through the trigger a hole had been drilled and a wire passed which passed in turn through the can and lay coiled on a spool outside. The whole had been covered with a sack which her curiosity had prompted her to lift. She knew without being told that her father did not intend to have this apparatus seen, and, keeping her own counsel, returned to the house.

But her curiosity had been aroused and she kept her eyes and ears open. Among some effects in a corner of the barn she found several boards upon which had been painted the legends: "No trespassing," "Dangerous," "Beware of dynamite." She knew that her father and the neighboring farmers had become greatly wrought up over the tearing out of the dam in the river at the head of the new canal, and putting this and that together, she felt certain that they had resolved upon desperate remedies for the wrongs that they felt were being inflicted upon them. It would be of no use to talk to Papa, and to her mother to worrying would be a gratuitous cruelty; so she waited and watched.

The next morning her father rose early and went to the headworks alone, but as the water was still coming, the dam evidently had not been taken out. The next day but one Silas Singham returned after dusk. One of his neighbors and chief supporters was there awaiting his coming and followed her father to the barn. Noiselessly and unobserved Helen tiptoed after them and hid in the shadows out of sight but not out of hearing.

"Did you do it, Silas?" the neighbor asked.

"That's what I did," was the reply.

"I don't know about it," the neighbor affirmed doubtfully. "I am afraid it is bad business. Much as we need water I think I would rather let it alone and leave the country than to have any man's blood on my hands, even the blood of Moses Brayton, mean as he is."

"I wouldn't," was the rejoinder. "Sometimes I feel that I would as soon take that man's life as ruin it. I have thought of setting myself up against the development of a whole county, as he has done. He does not deserve to live. However, you need not worry. Although I have planted the mine where it will blow anybody sky high who monkeys with the dam, I have thought of both approaches to the dam, which, as you know, is on our land, and have put up warning notices so that whoever trespasses does so at his peril. When we get what water we need I will blow the dam out myself, and that I may do so safely, I have run the wire in the sands by the river bank at the edge of the water down to the willow, and a jerk on that wire will set the whole thing off. After being warned, the fault of whoever touches the dam is greater than mine if he gets hurt."

"Well, perhaps," said the neighbor said, dubiously, "but I wish all the same that you hadn't done it. Moses Brayton will take it as a bluff and there will be hell to pay. I think we ought to go up to-morrow and take the infernal machine out."

"Not if Silas Singham knows himself, and besides, it would be as much as one's life is worth to attempt it. There is but one way to take it out and that is to blow it out, dam and all, and I am not going to do that until there is enough corn ground wet to keep our stock from starving."

Helen fled away to the house too agitated to venture inside, so she went around to where Roanoke was, and, burying her face on his shoulder, broke into convulsive sobbing. Her papa a possible murderer! She could see visions of his dear face looking through bars from jail and the possibility of his being hanged from a gallows in the jail yard. The first paroxysm of weeping over she fell to thinking what might be done. An idea flashed through her brain. To conceive it was to act on it. She drew her eyes and washing her face at the faucet by the watering trough, she passed into the house, kissed father and mother good night, gave a yawn and went to her room.

When the clock had been wound, the lights below extinguished, and all was still, for the Singham family was as early to bed as to arise, she buttoned on her leggings, donned her stoutest skirt and jacket, and, taking her heaviest shoes in her hands, slipped out over the kitchen roof to the windmill tower, down which she climbed to the ground. To slip on her shoes and glide to the barn was the work of a moment and it took scarcely longer to saddle Roanoke and lead him out to the road by a way so roundabout that the sound of his footsteps would not be heard at the house. Climbing into the saddle, "Now for it, old fellow," she said as she stroked his glossy neck, "There are sixty miles to cover between this and daylight, and we must do it or Papa may be a murderer."

Helen knew the road well. She had often taken things up to her father when the men were working on the ditch, but it was thirty miles to the dam the shortest way. She started Roanoke off at an easy pace until he had gotten warmed up, when he dropped into the ground pass which he took so swiftly as almost to seem as though he were racing for dear life. The night was star-lit and sufficiently bright to enable her to take the cut-off trails, so that it was little more than three hours after the start when she drew rein on the banks of the ditch opposite the big willow on the river's bank. She reined her horse into the canal and up the farther bank, where she tied him securely behind the shelter of a large oak. Then, running forward to the big willow, she ran to the brink and, rolling her sleeves to the elbows, dove her hands searchingly into the sands.

Could she find that wire? How still it was! She could hear her own heart beat, and yet it was not so still, come to think. The river roared as it came over the dam a hundred feet away and gurgled as it flowed by. As much as half of the water was going down the canal to irrigate those thirsty plains, and there she was, a traitor to the plains people, whose all depended upon that stream of water! "But Papa shall not be a murderer!" she declared.

Well, perhaps, along with what matches there were in the room, and, drying her hands, she lighted them one by one and searched along the bank. The wire must be buried there somewhere. Her father would not have said so if it had not been so. Whatever else he might be, he was truthful.

Presently she found a place where the river bank had been caved down a little and had been tramped at the water's edge, and, seated on the soft earth with her feet at the brink, she thrust her hands into the wet sand and dug and dug as if a dog might dig at a badger hole, and her fingers grew sore, dug down into the water until her sleeves were wet to the shoulders. Fear of failure made the cold perspiration start, and then she began to cry as well as dig, until, on the point of despair, her fingers touched a little thread of steel. She grasped it firmly and rested an instant thinking of what the explosion would be like, and if some of the rocks were likely to fall upon her. She thought of the willow and wondered if she could get behind it before the rocks began to fall.

Then she thought of something else. From the woods, seemingly just across the river from where she sat, there came the cry of a lynx answered by the snorting of Roanoke, and by the barking of a dog at a ranch house not far away. She must not be sitting there. "Oh! dear God, help me to keep my papa from being a murderer," she gasped and gave the wire so great a tug that it bit into her fingers. There was a great muffled roar and a cloud rose out of the river higher than the tree tops. She scrambled up the bank and huddled close to the trunk of the big willow. She was none too soon. The rocks and debris fell all around her, but she was unscathed.

Springing up as soon as the last thud of falling stones was heard she ran to pawing, whinnying Roanoke and was quickly in the saddle. Already the canal was nearly empty of water where she had crossed it, while the roar of the water through the break in the dam could be plainly heard. However, there was enough for Roanoke, quirked now that she was in the saddle, to drink sparingly, and then they turned their steps toward home.

It was not long before midnight, and there were thirty miles to cover, but they were covered before the gray of dawn and, after rubbing Roanoke down until he was nearly dry, Helen climbed to her room the way she had come down from it and threw herself upon the bed, too exhausted to be easily awakened. Anyhow, her Papa was no murderer!

Chapter X.

GATHERING OF THE CLANS.

It had been arranged among the river folks that the next time the "sandlappers" put a dam in the stream, and turned the water down their way, they would go to the headworks in force and tear the last vestige of the dam out. They would then dump the material into the head of the canal, build a blockhouse and put men there to watch with Winchester rifles. No sooner, therefore, had the water been shut off than word was passed up and down the stream to be ready at sunrise to drive up to the point of diversion and carry out the program.

Per contra, it had been decided by the plains people that if that dam in the river was taken out before they got their corn land wet they would go to the head-gate in force, put the dam in and camp on the ground—their ground—to see that it stood in until they got what water they felt they ought to have. They were not taking it all. There was enough left for the ditches below, but not enough to overflow the low lands and they did not propose that there should be.

The night before Helen's ride the water in the river at Moses Brayton's place fell suddenly and he did not need to be told the occasion for it. The morning after Helen's ride the water suddenly failed in Enterprise canal, and Silas Singham did not need to be told the occasion for that either. The dam, or a good portion of it, had gone out, with what consequences to those who undertook to take it out he tried to make himself believe he did not care, but he was none the less a good deal anxious.

So it happened that the river folks and the plains people, in force, started in the same direction on the same morning, in something like equal numbers, but with distinctly different purposes in view, the one to tear the dam out, root and branch, the other to put it back and keep it there, both by force.

Gabriel lingered near, but not in view, while his father made preparation for going, and he was not a little startled to see him take the Winchester rifle from its place on the wall, fill the magazine with cartridges and lay it among some blankets well covered, in the bottom of the spring wagon. That he was not going hunting was plain enough, and the act, taken with what he had heard his father say, that there would be no peace on the river until "Silas Singham's hide was filled so full of holes that it would be like a corn shuck," convinced the boy that there was likely to be "something doing" up the river that morning. To ask to be taken along would be tantamount to being commanded to stay at home, so, undutiful son that Gabriel sometimes was, he waited until his father, and the three river men who were with him, had gotten out of sight, and then he saddled Clay Babe and rode up the river on the other side, quite out of view.

When Gabriel had completed about half the distance he came into the road that led from Enterprise, and, as he galloped along, he could not help noticing fresh tracks of horses' hoofs showing clearly in the lately settled dust. There were tracks going and tracks coming and it was clear that they were made by the same horses. As he cantered along by the side of them he noticed that they looked familiar. Whatever horse made them made a longer and a steadier leap than any horse but one he knew. Starting Clay Babe abreast of them, and following his spurs, he found that the reach was fully two feet longer than the stride of Clay Babe, and the only horses in the country that covered more ground in a leap than he were Peacock, at home in the pasture, and Roanoke, who was never ridden by anyone but Helen. What could the girl have been doing up there so early in the morning and all alone, for there was evidently no one with her, as there were no tracks but those going and coming?

At the cut-off the tracks turned and Gabriel followed them, and they led straight to the canal. Already there were half a score of river men gathered on the banks looking at the hole torn in the dam with the water rushing through, leaving only a small head going into the canal. As the boy rode up within sight of the dam old Judge Himes, the justice of the peace of the township, rode up from the opposite direction on his great Norman.

"What means this, McCoy?" he called to one of the bystanders. "Why don't you fellows take hold there and finish your job?"

"That's none of our doings," was the reply. "Silas Singham planted an infernal machine in the dam there to blow the daylight out of us river people, and 'long about the middle of the night the thing went off, of itself I reckon. It made the biggest noise ye ever heard and blew pieces of that dam fifty yards in all directions. It made a hole in the river bed deep enough to drown a horse in."

"Well, men," volunteered the judge, "there's sure going to be trouble here this day and I am here to command the peace. The sheriff ought to be here too, and the two of his deputies. I don't mind seeing a good fight or so. We used to have them back in Kentucky and they generally cleared the social atmosphere, but I hope no man will bring any weapons here to-day. We don't want no Mussel Slough tragedy repeated on the river and Moses Brayton and Silas Singham are fairly thirsting to get their hands on one another's throats. A right pretty fight it will be if they do. They are good men, both of them."

Thinking that it was about time for his father to be driving up, Gabriel discreetly rode Clay Babe below the big willow and there found where Roanoke had surely been hitched to a sapling. Hitching Clay Babe there also, he sauntered to the big willow and thence to the bank of the river. Standing looking into the water he was not long in perceiving where tracks went down the bank, and there, at the very brink of the water, too plain to be mistaken, were the tracks of small shoes in the still wet sand. On closer inspection the steps seemed to lead down to the water or else the river had risen since they were made. Going down to the water's brink he found where a hole had been dug in the sand and across the mouth of it stretched a loop of small wire. Grasping the wire with both hands and pulling, he found that it came from a sand and a stick around it and pulled again. This time it came easier right up out of the sand, and then out of the water, and at the end of it he found a piece of the hilt, guard and trigger of a revolver. The rest had evidently been blown away by the force of the explosion. Winding the wire up carefully around the fragment of pistol, he thrust it in his pocket and slipped out of sight under the big willow just as Moses Brayton and his men drove up on the other side of the river.

The team was hitched under a tree at a little distance, and Brayton went at once to the dam where he nodded to the others and then looked contemplatively at the structure while Tom McCoy explained to him what had taken place. "The assassin!" Gabriel heard him exclaim in a loud and angry voice. "I'll just wait till you get any peace on this river until that man is laid out cold as a wedge. He expected to catch some of us with that infernal machine and more than likely he would if it hadn't gone off itself. Get to work there, men, and clear the rest of this rubbish out." "I'm not so sure that the infernal machine went off itself," thought Gabriel. "I think I know who made these tracks by the river. Somehow Helen must have found out about the scheme and spoiled it, and as I can't do less for her father than she can do for mine, I'll just slip those cartridges out of Dad's Winchester for good luck."

Unobserved he led Clay Babe a little farther down into the brush and around the bend, then mounted and forded the river. Hitching his horse in a safe place and then, on foot, he rode to his father's wagon and noiselessly threw the cartridges all out of the Winchester and put them into his pocket, then hurried back to his horse.

What should he do next? He felt sure that the plains people would be on hand within an hour or so and that there would be a big fight when they did come if they undertook to put the dam back that the river men were trying to take out. The words of Judge Himes came to him: "The sheriff and two or three of his deputies should be here. Why don't you go after them?" It was only fifteen or sixteen miles. A moment later he was cutting across lots at full speed for the county seat, Clay Babe going his best long distance gait.

Chapter XI.

HELL'S HALF ACRE.

Nearly two hours had passed after Gabriel had gone before the plains men arrived, for they had come prepared to work and it had taken them some time to get together, but there were not less than a dozen wagon loads of men, and they poured out of the wagons and dashed across the canal to the river bank, Silas Singham at their head.

"Get off our property, you scoundrels," he commanded in a voice hoarse with passion. The river men confronting him were for the most part new to him, but by his appearance. His eyes were ablaze and the cords stood out on his neck as though it were wound with rope. Without stopping for his fellows he plunged down the bank to the end of the dam, and grasping the first man he came to, hurled him into the driftwood. The next man grasped a limb of sunken brush and made an effort to strike, but the club was snatched from his hand as though he had been a child, and the man knocked into the water with a blow from Singham's fist. Although the water was not deep the man might have drowned in his stunned condition had not one of the plains men hurried in after him and carried him to shore.

Singham plunged on. The gap in the dam was near the middle and, single handed, Singham cleared it of men and sent them floundering out of the water as best they might.

Grasping a sapling and wrenching it out of the dam, Singham used it as a vaulting pole and leaped across the rushing stream, and, just at the next step he was confronted by Moses Brayton, rifle in hand. "Another step and you are a dead man," he yelled with his finger on the trigger and his gleaming eyes shooting along the barrel. Those who stood on the bank averred that those eyes were the second pair that were thought to be back of the first and only showed themselves in exceptional instances. Why he did not shoot without warning was a mystery to some, but those were calculating eyes. They were not like Silas Singham's, all passion; they only showed the keenest case of self defense to their deadly work.

Moses Singham saw and understood, and, recovering himself, halted not ten feet away. "Throw down your gun, you coward," he called, "or give me a chance to shoot myself. When I'll meet you how you will. Throw down your gun and knock with me like a man. You are no schoolboy."

"No, I'll not knock with you, you assassin, you layer of traps. I ought to kill you where you stand and I will if you move a hair's breadth nearer," he said with slow and measured words. "If that water is mine, it is my property. If I can't have what is mine I don't want to live, but the man who would take it from me don't live either. The law gives it to me and it is mine, and you are a thief as well as an assassin, and you don't deserve to live. If that water is mine, it is because it would not give me joy to kill you, but because I don't want more trouble than I've had. I warned you the day you came what to expect, and there is but one thing for you to do, and that is to get out of the country. There ain't no single county big enough to hold us both, and now you git."

At this Singham lost all sense of danger and crouched for a spring. Quick as a flash the rifle was raised and the trigger pressed, but the hammer snapped harmlessly. Backing off up the side of the bank, Singham sought to throw another cartridge into the barrel, but the magazine was empty. Then he undertook to club the piece over the head of his on-rushing antagonist, but Singham swung his vaulting pole and struck a blow that knocked the rifle out of Brayton's hands and into the river.

By this time all the river men were gathering around the two men. The plains men dashed into the water and came over. There were a dozen conflicts going on at once. Judge Himes reined his big horse into the midst and called at the top of his voice, "I command the peace. In the name of the state of California I command the peace." Mutual friends began to pull the men apart, but again the judge raised his voice.

"Men," he said, "stand back from Kentucky and I've seen it often. Until these two men have tried each other's strength they will thirst for each other's blood. The best way to prevent murder is to let them fight it out. No sticking, no shooting, no stamping and no choking or gouging, but man to man fighting. Let these two settle it. Likely as not when they have fought to a finish the rest of you can fix up a division of the water that'll be fair. I'll ride down the man who disobeys orders. Clear away there and give 'em a show. There is no sense in all you men fighting. Let these two settle it. If Moses Brayton whips, the dam comes out. If Silas Singham wins, the dam stays in for the spring run of water. All rights reserved to be settled hereafter in the courts. Clear away there and give them a chance," and he reined his big Norman between the two groups facing each other in ho-ho-ay.

No sooner were the two men released from their respective friends than they flew at each other as two bulldogs might have done. Neither spoke and whether or not they acceded to the terms ordained by this original esquire, they acted on a hypothesis that warranted the assumption.

Moses Brayton was the more powerful of the two men, but he was less athletic, had a shorter reach of arm and had seen less of the use of the arms in boxing, yet he was considerably more cautious and full of vindictive hatred. Silas Singham was fighting because his blood was up and because he morally detested the dog-in-the-manger policy which Brayton had followed from the start. He quickly saw where the man lay his advantage and governed himself accordingly for his brain worked quicker than Brayton's and he felt that he was fighting for the right of himself and his neighbors to live in a country that they had chosen to be their home.

The battle ground was the low, sandy reach of the beachy side of the river and was sheltered in part from the sun by the low-spreading cottonwood trees. This, and the adjoining area covering the mouth of the canal, the dam site and the tongue of land between, has been the scene of so many disputes and conflicts of river water claimants that it is still known as "Hell's Half Acre," although it never witnessed a renetition of such a combat as that which took place on this May morning.

Whenever Moses Brayton landed a blow fairly his opponent went down, and once when Singham fell Brayton made as if to spring upon him and stamp him with his heavy blows, but Justice Himes was vigilant and, striking the rowels of his spurs into the flanks of his great stallion, drove full against Brayton and sent him sprawling. By the time he recovered his feet Singham had done so also.

Not every blow from Singham landed, but the greater number did, and while they did not always prostrate his adversary they shook him wonderfully and more than once sent him to the grass. At such times Singham stood awaiting his opponent's getting upon his feet. He was so mainly a man to strike his adversary when he was down.

For a full quarter of an hour these men fought like raging bulls over the sandy turf, both giving and taking severe punishment. Their beards were matted with blood, Brayton's eyes were nearly closed and about the chest and body both were pounded sore. When Brayton got Singham in his grasp his hug was like that of a grizzly, but Singham was the better wrestler and more nimble on foot and so was able either to throw his adversary to the ground or to break away from him without serious injury.

They tugged, and struck, side-stepped and plunged, now one was down and now the other, and it seemed a question if either could win. The ceaseless activity was telling on both. Singham was telling on Brayton's grasp Singham around the body with a grip that bade fair to dislocate his spinal column, and yet the agile man was able to free his right arm—it was noticed that he had little use his left for a minute or more—and so gave his enemy a short, half-arm upper-cut at one side of the point of the chin. Brayton dropped to the ground as one dead, and although he breathed hard he made no effort to rise.

One of the men stooped by his side and raised his head, but he gave no sign, and it was perceived that he was unconscious. Meantime Silas Singham stood over him with arms folded across his breast. A look of great sorrow came into his face. Suddenly turning he sought his big helmet hat on the ground, shook it out of it and went to his horse's brink and filled it with water. This he dashed into the face of his fallen adversary, and, taking a handkerchief from his pocket, washed the blood from Brayton's face and beard. Sending for more water, he continued the treatment with Brayton's head against his knee, until the latter came to himself and looked up into his victor's face.

In such cases consciousness comes as suddenly as it goes, but not strength. At first there was a bewildered look, and then one of antipathy as he recognized the one who was nursing him back to consciousness, as if it were to life, but that look passed as a shadow might, and presently he opened his mouth and said: "Thank you. I guess that will do," and with assistance he rose to his feet and started toward the wagon. But he had taken only a few steps when he turned and said: "You men may have some water this season. Next time I'll appeal to the courts."

At this juncture the clatter of horses' hoofs was heard, and the sheriff of the county, with two deputies and Gabriel Brayton, rode up. "You are too tame, Jack," declared Judge Himes, as the party drew rein in the midst of the crowd. "Argument is concluded, court adjourned, and as there are to be no arrests you can go back home; but I tell you, old hoss, I ain't seen the kin to the fight we've had since twenty-seven years ago, back in Kentucky, when Jack Cadwalader hit Morris Montgomery over Morris's girl sassing Jack's wife in the grocery store. I'll bet fifteen dollars that it was the most civilinest session of court ever held in Tulare county, but I tell you what, Mr. Sheriff, if you are the greatest lack in the world the another Mussel Slough tragedy wasn't enacted right here within the last half hour. We'd had it sure enough if some Good Samaritan hadn't unloaded Mose Brayton's Winchester. But those two men will live to be good friends yet."

Brayton was made comfortable in his wagon under the shade. Silas Singham washed himself up as well as he could and drove off to town to get a broken bone set in the left forearm, while the plains men and river men both, under the direction of Judge Himes, filled sacks with sand and dumped them into the hole in the dam, until the break was stopped well enough to permit the plains men to watch their corn land.

As for Gabriel, he made himself as scarce as possible and was at home before his father. (To Be Continued.)

0"x63.3"x42", to carry 12,920 deadweight tons; the price quoted for this vessel is 151,000 pounds, which we may call $73,000, which would make a unit price of $56.71 per ton deadweight.

We have also an offer from an English yard, dated October, 1908, for an oil tanker, 471'-0"x56.0"x33' 2" to carry 10,540 tons deadweight; the price quoted was 104,000 pounds, which we may call $495,440. This price works out at $47.00 per ton deadweight.

Both of the above vessels are duplicates of vessels that had been built by the firms in question and were in answer to inquiry for price of duplicating the vessels.

An oil steamer of the same class as the above is now being built at one of our eastern yards for a California company interested in the carriage of oils in bulk; she is of about 7,000 tons deadweight capacity. The price being paid for this vessel is said on good authority to be $412,000 which is equivalent to $58.86 per ton deadweight.

This is but a small percentage in excess of the larger of the two British prices per ton deadweight and about 23 per cent. higher than the lower of the British prices. I understand that the price of this American built oil steamer was lowered about 5 per cent. to meet the keen competition.

In all three cases mentioned above the builders were to duplicate vessels already built by them, so that they knew the cost to themselves of building the vessels and just at what figure they could afford to take them.

Costs Not so Unequal.

These figures would seem so far to show that while there is a decided advantage in favor of Britain the cases cited of more than double being the price in America as compared to Britain are not typical and do not cover all classes of ships.

It was my intention to present another example of the comparative costs of building a large passenger and freight steamer here and in Great Britain; the data for which, however, the builders has not arrived and I may of course be unable to get it at all. In this particular case there were four similar ships built at the same time, two of them being built at a well-known shipyard in Britain and two of them in an American yard; they were all built from the same plans and specifications for the same owners and a comparison of the relative costs of building them here and in Europe would be of especial value to us in the present investigation.

(Note.—Since the foregoing was placed in type I have received the information that I wanted. The two vessels built here cost $1,850,000 each, and the two built in Great Britain cost $1,500,000 each, making a difference of 23.13 per cent.)

In the case of war ships the American yards seem to come very close to the British in price; in this kind of work the problems which confront the naval architect and the marine engineer are very complex, the character of the work is higher, the chance to standardise and cheapen construction is very slight. For this kind of work the competition is very keen here while in Britain only certain yards of recognized reputation are asked to bid; the yards there which go in for this kind of work maintain much larger and more expensive scientific staffs than do the yards here; all these circumstances tend to add to the cost of naval work in Britain and help offset the advantage they have in their cheaper labor and materials and greater amount of work. A fair comparison of costs is difficult because of the different manners of contracting that obtain in the two countries; for instance, Congress has fixed the price of armor at considerably less than is acceptable to the British armor manufacturers. The British price includes the armor, the American price excludes the armor. Warships have been built in this country for foreign navies in competition with the British yards and the fact that these contracts were let to our shipyards shows that prices here compared favorably with those obtained in Britain. It is very difficult to make a comparison because of the many things that enter into contracts and specifications; probably the only reasonably correct comparison would be to take some case of a warship plan and specification for some country foreign to both, and compare the bids of American and British yards.

Relative Costs Matter of Wages.

In general the whole question of the relative cost of building merchant vessels here and in Great Britain is a matter of the comparative wages paid the workmen; our rate of wages is higher, a necessary result of our protective system.

The protective system embraces the shipyards and adds to the cost of their product; the same power that maintains the conditions that determine the cost should also establish some other system that would operate in favor of our home-built ships wherever they have to operate in competition with ships built in another country whose fiscal system does not establish artificial values. No country as far as I know has ever been able to own ships for any extended period that could not and did not build them for herself. This country has the ability to build and operate all manner of ships and it is the present duty of our government to provide a way whereby both building and operating ships will be profitable to our people.

In the next article I will follow the decline of American shipping in the foreign trade from the time that Congress fell into the trap set by Ricardo to its extinction.

The New Constitution and the Chinese.

That, "The Chinese must go," was the keynote of Kearneyism, and Kearneyism is popularly supposed to have been the inspiration for the New Constitution of California. There is no question that popular resentment toward the Chinese ran at a high pitch and that, had there not been many sober and strong minds in the constitutional convention, some very extreme measures would have been directed particularly against that race. The workmen's delegates were ready to go to any lengths, but in measuring intellectual prowess with the representatives of property, they fared badly and little came of the drastic measures with which their pockets were filled.

One proposal was that Chinese should be forbidden to hold any property or to be allowed to trade, peddle or do any mercantile business whatever. Another was that any person, before voting or defending any suit at law, must, on demand of any other person, declare upon oath whether or not he had, from ninety days after the adoption of the constitution, bought, sold or had made any product of Chinese labor, or hired any Chinese person. If he had, he was thereby to be disqualified from voting or commencing or defending any suit at law. While the sentiment of the convention agreed with practical unanimity that Chinese immigration had proven an evil and a mistake and that it should be discouraged by all proper means, the action taken was not, considering the fevered state of the public mind at that time, very radical.

Article XIX of the constitution is devoted to this subject, though some of its provisions have a bearing upon other issues. Section 1 confers upon the legislature full power to prescribe regulations for the protection of the state from all aliens who are, or who may become, paupers, criminals, invalids afflicted with communicable diseases or "otherwise dangerous or detrimental to the well-being or peace of the state." So far the section was sound and within the province of state authority.

The section then went on to give the legislature power to "impose conditions upon which such persons may reside in the state," and to provide "the means and mode of their removal from the state," closing with a delegation to the legislature of unlimited power to deal with the problem as it might deem necessary. The supreme court, in 101 Cal. 197, promptly held that this power did not rest with a state, but with the national government; that, except as to the criminal, the insane and those afflicted with communicable diseases, the power to regulate the coming and going and the residence of aliens rested in the national government alone. This is a good decision to remember in connection with the anti-Japanese issue as well as the Chinese.

Section 2 forbade the employment of Chinese persons in corporations and, while the supreme court, in 54th Cal., 94, upheld the power of the state to regulate corporations of its own creation, this section has never been operative. Corporations have continuously employed the tabooed persons and do so yet.

Section 3, providing that "No Chinese shall be employed on any state, county, municipal or other public work, except in punishment for crime," has met with better success. As an employer the state had a right to restrict its own employment as an example to other employers, and while this example has profited little, the section has been, and still is, obeyed to the letter.

Section 4 makes many declarations that are worth pondering: The first one is that "The presence of foreigners ineligible to become citizens of the United States is dangerous to the well-being of the state." This is too true to need discussion.

The further declaration that "The legislature shall discourage their immigration by all the means within its power," has not proven efficacious, for the reason that the powers of the state so to discourage are so limited as to amount to little.

Another clause giving municipalities power to remove communities of such aliens outside their limits, or to certain restricted districts, has accomplished little. Some sanitary regulations may be possible, but treaty rights will hardly permit them to be directed against one class of aliens. Only one Chinatown, so far as we know, was ever removed and that, at Eureka, was effected by mob law and so maintained to this day.

Hoodlumism has, in California, worked no little wrong to the Chinese, but, as modified by the superior authority of the national constitution and treaties entered into, the New Constitution has done them small injustice. Subsequent legislation attempted to be drastic, but the courts pulled the teeth of the local statutes, while the legislature of 1880 itself gave Chinese children the right to enter our schools. Native-born Chinese persons have the right of suffrage even in California and under the New Constitution.

More important than all that California did through constitution and laws was the work which Californian sentiment and influence did in inducing the national government to enact exclusion laws and modify treaty stipulations in conformity therewith.

Chinese immigration has fallen off and the Chinese population within the state is dwindling. The "must go" was not after the fashion that Kearneyism contemplated, but it is operating none the less certainly. In fact, thanks to the opposition which so boiled and bubbled thirty years ago, and what followed it, the Chinese evil has almost ceased to be an evil in this commonwealth.

This is the most vulnerable portion of the New Constitution, but, tested by results, even this portion calls for little mortification on the part of any Californian.

PERSONALIA.

Robert Hichens, the author of "The Garden of Allah" and "The Call of the Blood," will be represented in the fall crop of fiction by a story of which the scene is laid in the Egyptian desert and the Nile valley.

Bernice Cosgrove, an eighteen-year-old California girl, is making a sensation in the American colony in Berlin by a display of remarkable powers as a spiritualistic medium.

Charles Klein's new play is named "The Next of Kin" and will be first produced in November.

Franz Lehar's "The Merry Widow" is to be succeeded by his new operetta, "Gypsy Love," soon to be presented in New York.

Edwin Milton Royle's new play, a sequel to "The Squaw Man," is to be produced under the title of "These Are My People."

John T. McCutcheon, the cartoonist of the Chicago Tribune, whose pictures of Roosevelt tickled the nation, is about to follow T. R into the African wilds in search of big game.

A Good Start Made.

The opening of the campaign for the election of Francis J. Heney to the office of district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco was all that the friends of impartial justice could ask for. The crowd was big, the enthusiasm great, the speeches good and the will to win manifest.

Mr. Heney's declaration that he will be as blind to special interests as justice herself, will take the law as he finds it and enforce it if he can, leaving to legislation to change the laws if they be bad, was characteristic of the man. District attorneys have generally exercised a potent, if not always a sound, discretion as to what laws they would enforce and, sometimes, as to against what people they would enforce them. Many a bad law would have been gotten rid of long ago if some district attorney had enforced it.

Mr. Heney's explanation of the truth that he had received no money from the national government, except for services actually rendered, and not a dollar for any time expended while engaged in the graft prosecution, should still the mouths of his detractors, but it will not. In our country the right to lie outrageously appears to be unalienable.

The campaign is now open. The manhood of the Men of San Francisco is again to be measured. Heretofore whenever the measure was taken the men have measured up. The California Weekly has faith to believe that they will stand the test this time, too. Never was a cleaner cut issue presented to any people. The whole country is watching the outcome with an interest scarcely less than our own.

Another Guess On the Primary Law.

No one who has read the new primary election law can doubt that it was the intent of the makers of the law to hold the voter to his party with all the ties that could be made to bind, and to head him off at every point where he might take a notion to jump the corral fence. The legislators were much more concerned for the integrity of party than for the integrity of the men whom the party might nominate for office.

A former decision of the supreme court appeared to be in full sympathy with the legislative view and, guided, as he supposed, by this decision, Judge Murasky still further limited the right of the voter to do as he pleased when once he got into his little booth with his ticket and his God.

Now comes the supreme court and, in the cases of Heney and Fickert against the election commissioners, promptly decides that the voter may write in on his ballot the name of any person he may choose to nominate to be the candidate of his party in a forthcoming election, even a candidate of an opposing party.

Why not? The California Weekly rejoices in the liberality of this interpretation of a law that probably was not intended to permit any such escaping from the party reservation. In the issues before the people here in San Francisco there is nothing either Republican or Democratic. Not a single issue can even tend to divide along party lines and party should not enter into the strife at all. We have the issues of justice vs. injustice, of a municipal water supply vs. vassalage to Spring Valley, but not a single issue that separates Republicans from Democrats as such. If, therefore, any Republican or Democrat preferred either Mr. Heney or Mr. Fickert, as being most representative of what he stands for in executing justice, he should be as free to express that preference at a primary as at a general election. Our regret is that this right was not better understood and known before the primary election was held. It might have made considerable difference in the tickets that were made up by that primary.

Soft Words.

At Salt Lake, in the great Mormon Temple, on Sunday, President Taft spoke to a vast audience of the folly and wickedness of partisan rancor, of the spirit of hate, of want of charity in failing to attribute to the other side motives as pure as one's own. Considering the place, the day, the edifice where he spoke, the state of the public mind in Utah, the hostility of the gentile toward the Mormon and of the Mormon toward the gentile, what the President said was appropriate enough.

And yet at no former period in this country has there been as little of party bitterness as now. There is no bitterness of spirit between Republican and Democrat. The Populists were fairly good haters, but they are only a memory. Republicans smile benignantly upon Democrats, and regard their democracy as an infirmity rather than as a sin. Democrats confess the puissance of the Republican party, but fear that it is worldly. There is nothing of partisan hate in the ranks of either great party toward those in the ranks of the other. The rank and file of both parties cross the line and vote each other's tickets with as little compunction as they would cross to the shady side of the street and, if it be at a primary election, it is generally the shady side that those who cross the line are looking for.

There are issues that arouse the deepest resentments of which the human mind is capable and President Taft will encounter them more than once during his itinerary. These issues arise out of the conflict between the common good, on the one hand, and special privilege on the other. It is hard for the soldiers for the common good to realize that those who are reaching out for private possession of the coal measures, that they who monopolize the supply and raise the price of coal to an extortionate figure, are, at heart, good fellows. It is difficult for the soldiers of the common good to remember that the ambitious gentlemen who are reaching out to possess in perpetuity the most eligible reservoir sites, and to control all the markets for electric energy, are patriotic, exemplary citizens. It is hard not to hate such men when we see what they are trying to do, but we must not. The President is right. Such men are merely trying to make money, so busy about their plans, so absorbed by their purposes, that they haven't time to think of posterity and of the ultimate consequences to humanity of their conduct. We must not hate them, but only what they are trying to do.

But we must hate what selfish grabbers are trying to do. We must fight that like mad or the common man will lose all. We have seen the coal measures, the forests, the great ranges, the deposits of iron, so monopolized that extortion resulted. We have seen unregulated greed so rampant that single industrial feudal lords have become richer than the richest monarchs the world has known. We have seen a great city, founded upon protection to American labor, force American labor out of that city and convert the city into a hell for labor of any kind, yet we must not hate the men who did it. They were the first citizens of that city and biggest men of their time.

Nevertheless, such things we must hate or be lost. Such things the men of this generation must fight or leave their children a heritage of plutocratic tyranny that will cause millions to regret that they were born into a world so walled in and so exploited. While doing all this hating of the evil which good fellows do, while fighting those of them who are corrupting our courts and our legislatures (whose immunity from punishment for transgressing the law we are urged to concede in the interests of peace) we ought always to remember to use only soft words. The President so admonishes us.

Oh! why did the Son of Man set us that evil example of denunciation of the "Scribes and pharisees, hypocrites," "Whited sepulchres filled with dead men's bones." They were good fellows, those saints and pharisees, doing the things that seemed right for them to do, and when they helped to crucify the man who spoke in plain terms of monstrous wrongs they thought they had done God's service. Out of deference to the President's admonition The California Weekly here renews its promise never to use stronger language in denouncing predatory interests than the Son of Man used on similar occasions.

TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. President:—San Francisco is anxiously awaiting your coming. It will receive you with open arms and a sincerity of hospitality. The people of San Francisco, in common with the people elsewhere, have been hanging upon your words ever since you left Washington. Not a line has escaped them. They are wondering what you will say here. You have spoken bravely at all times and, with the exception of your tariff talk at Winona, where you spoke like a party leader, you have spoken like a statesman and a patriot.

But San Francisco was especially interested in what you said at Chicago about the establishment of justice in this country. We know that justice is nearest your heart as it is nearest the hearts of such of the people of San Francisco as have hearts not encysted in a case-hardened materialism, and we are all of us wondering what you will have to say of the establishment of justice when you come to San Francisco.

It is not unknown to you that here in San Francisco, at this moment (as there has been for three years past) there is going on one of the most determined conflicts for the establishment (and disestablishment) of justice that this nation has witnessed. In your address at Chicago you spoke with feeling of the advantage which wealth has, in civil cases, when pitted against poverty, and you took a firm stand for equality between rich and poor at the bar of justice. This is the issue being fought out in San Francisco, except that it involves the criminal law instead of the civil. Here a few devoted persons who love justice as you love it have rallied to the standard of justice and, upholding the hands of the civil authorities and giving them all the aid in their power, are fighting foot to foot and hand to hand with a colossal aggregation of criminal wealth determined to break down the law and crush justice to earth. In despite of all the cares and concerns which beset you in your high office you cannot have been unmindful of this conflict.

In furtherance of their purpose to make millionaires immune to criminal prosecution for any wrong committed against the common good, murder has been attempted, dynamite has been employed in an attempt to intimidate, the press has been subsidized and every effort made to debase the public mind. There is not one element of evil to be found in the social, financial and industrial organism that has not been marshalled to do battle against meting out an impartial justice in the graft cases now at bar. That malignant influence has been felt in the halls of congress. It touches you every time you are asked to make an appointment to fill a federal office in California and, with a few possible exceptions, every representative of your administration in California is lined up on the immoral side of this conflict.

The conflict has been long, Mr. President. For three full years it has been waged and the people are weary with fighting. You come to us at a critical moment. You come at a time when the people are to vote either that the war for justice is a failure or that the issue must be fought until victory for justice shall be achieved. The people of San Francisco need to have spoken to them some word that will put heart into them. While here you will speak of the splendid energy that, in three and a half years, has reared a new city on the ruins of the old. Will you also speak of the equally meritorious, if less successful, efforts that have been put forth to clear away the ruins of our civic degradation and, on a firm foundation of public morals, erect a temple more beautiful than marble, more enduring than steel and concrete, dedicated to that equality before the law which you, yourself, have declared to be the need of all needs in this our country and our time?

We hang upon your words, Mr. President, with breathless interest. San Francisco needs the sustaining influence of the militant conscience of this nation. You, and you alone, can arouse that conscience on our behalf. So sustained we cannot fail. Efforts will be made to convince you that this struggle for justice is a mere factional fight between jealous personalities and you will be asked to pour oil into our wounds and bid us love one another and dwell in peace. You will be asked to repeat here, not the address you delivered at Chicago, but the sermon delivered in the Mormon Temple at Salt Lake. Bring us not peace but a sword, the sword of truth, the shield of hope, that we may win the victory of equality before the law. If Justice triumphs here the Men of Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Chicago, New York, will be encouraged to buckle on their armor and go forth to fight for the same holy cause. To what purpose, Mr. President, did you come west if not to strike a blow for the cause you love best where it will count for the most?

THE PRESIDENT ON CONSERVATION.

The President's utterances on the theme of the conservation of our national resources at Spokane were more than satisfactory. They outlined a far-seeing and far-reaching national policy wholly at variance with the policy the nation had followed in relation to those resources until now. What a beautiful fight the President will have on his hands when he seeks to induce congress to enact his recommendations into law!

Epitomized, the President's policy toward conservation will be to preserve the forest reserves as reserves, selling from them only the merchantable timber while preserving the title to the lands in the government forever and insuring a new forest to take place of the old one. This is the Pinchot policy and is sound.

In reclamation he would ask the government to lend the Reclamation Service $10,000,000 with which to complete the enterprises already undertaken and then postpone further undertakings until the reclamation fund has been rehabilitated from sales of government land. We see no good reason why, if the revenues of the country permit, contributions may not be made to this fund directly from the general treasury without waiting for sales of public lands to supply the needed funds, but, inasmuch as it is likely to be some time before the revenues of the country will permit this, we do not need to quarrel with the President about that now.

With regard to power sites the President favors such a national lease system as will yield a revenue and forestal monopoly and extortion. He would grant no rights in perpetuity. To our way of thinking the revenue feature is relatively unimportant. The crux of the issue is the limitation of the franchise to a single generation of men and the prevention of extortion. Here will be the great fight of the next session of congress. It is noteworthy that the President made no suggestion looking toward a possible relinquishment of national prerogatives to the states. Evidently that is far from his mind, but it will not be so far from the minds of the power grabbers. They will prefer to do business with the states.

In relation to lands underlain with coal, oil and phosphates his mind appears to be less clear, except that he sees the necessity for the prevention of monopoly and consequent extortion. Again the revenue idea is less significant than the idea of control, but, inasmuch as the people must support their government somehow, why may they not do so, in part, by a royalty on coal mined, oil pumped, phosphates quarried?

The only note in the whole address that furnishes reason for concern is the President's insistence that the government's conservation policy must be "buttressed by the law." He has not demanded as much in relation to the revenue commission, which the standpatters gave him instead of a tariff commission, and which they strictly confined to gathering such information as will enable the chief executive to act intelligently in applying the maximum and minimum phase of the new tariff law. The President has expressed a purpose to so interpret this provision as to convert this revenue commission, with powers strictly limited, into a much-needed tariff commission with powers limited only by the necessities of a broadly construed tariff requirement.

So, too, in relation to the corporation tax. He has affirmed a purpose to make information gleaned in the process of levying a pure revenue tax serve the purposes of a regulative corporation measure. In both of these activities The California Weekly bids the President godspeed and commends the most liberal interpretation of the law for the purpose of subserving the ends of justice and sound policy, but why insist that, in relation to conservation, the executive must be "buttressed by the law" at every step, while in taxation and corporate control he need not be so "buttressed" at all? Is it that the Secretary of the Treasury is not a legalist while the Secretary of the Interior is?

It will be a splendid fight that the President will wage with congress if he succeeds in forcing his policy of conservation on the attention of that body. Before that conflict has gone far the President will find who his real friends are and who are not his real friends. And he will not find Aldrich or Cannon, Tawney or Hale, doing battle by his side unless it be for the other side. The Republican insurgents will be with him to a man, but the standpatters will be found in the camp of the hostilities, unless he can so arouse public championship for his cause as to bear down upon congress with the crushing weight of an avalanche.

The President stands right, but one could wish that his words were less softly spoken so that one could catch a glimpse of a big stick protruding from the pocket of his left coat-tail.

How comes it that some of our "business men," concerned only for "civic peace" have not called the President to task for "hurting business" by confessing to the world that the administration of justice in this country is a "disgrace to our civilization?" Does not the man see that Europe will not wish to lend money to any such country?

TWO NOTABLE ARTICLES.

In Everybody's Magazine for October Judge Ben B. Lindsey of Denver has given the public an initial chapter setting forth his early political experiences, under the title of "The Beast and the Jungle." The Beast is corporate cupidity, rapacity and cunning striving for "protection" against those whom the corporations have maimed or robbed; protection against clean politics, equal taxation, a free government and an independent and honest judiciary; protection, in short, against everything that is of good report, clean, healthful and for the highest interests of human society.

The Lindsey autobiography seems likely to create as much interest as the Lawson articles, and yet it is as different from those articles as though they belonged to another world. Lawson sketched an essentially true picture of The System in its financial operations, but he smeared the canvas over with the red ink of his own vulgar vainglory. The Lindsey articles are as modest as if told in one of his own "snitching bees," a true picture of The System in its political activities, and as dainty and clean as delicate fingers can leave the canvas upon which they paint.

What distinguishes the master hand in literature from that of the 'prentice is the power to carry the theme to its logical conclusion. Shakespeare, Hugo, Ibsen—there is no bringing everything out right in the act of their productions in order to save the feelings of the audience when the logic of the situation would grind to powder. That we may follow to its logical consummation the policy of nonresistance to the forays of The Beast let us turn to the other "notable article" that we may see the status of humankind where The Beast has wreaked his unrestrained will. Reference is here made to "The Slaves of Yucatan," by John Kenneth Turner in the American Magazine. The Beast, in this case, takes the form of the "Kings of Sisal Hemp," meaning the great growers of henequen, a form of century plant that thrives on rocky, sterile ground and is made profitable by peon slavery.

We hear much, but see little, of "wage slavery." There they have it. By placing wages so low (twelve cents per day) that the workers cannot keep alive on their pay, the laborers are brought into debt to the plantation owners and the longer one works the deeper into debt he gets and, by the connivance of the courts and officers of the law (whom the sisal kings control) the peon never regains his liberty and is bought and sold as the plantations change ownership. The slave population of Yucatan is made up of the native Mayas, Yaqi Indians, transported from Sonora, and some 3,000 Chinese who somehow got into the country but will never get out again. The only way out is through the door of death. American slavery, even on the rice plantations and the cotton fields of the Carolina and Louisiana, was a model of humanity by comparison. There is nothing more that The Beast can do to the helpless creatures in his jungle but rend them into pieces, and this he does faster than they are born, even at the risk of destroying his supply of peon labor.

And the slavery system of Yucatan is fostered, abetted and protected under a republic, under a constitution that prohibits it and under laws that penalize the practice! For Mexico has the outward semblance of a free government as certainly as our own, but inwardly it is now, what many fear that our government may become, a republic in form, but, in fact, a pitiless despotism where the few who are strong rule the many who have become weak, living opulently every day from off the bloody sweat of the lowly. Yucatan exemplifies the policy of The Beast unrestrained and carried to its logical conclusion. In setting this picture before the American people Mr. John Kenneth Turner, and the American Magazine, have performed a service to humanity and to the American people.

Not the least thought-inspiring feature of the article in question, is the published portrait of Mr. Olegario Molina, chief of the fifty sisal kings, besides two hundred princes of lesser degree. A handsomer, cleaner, more benignant profile it would be hard to find. There are a thousand physiognomies typical of his own in San Francisco offices six days in the week. He does not look like a beast from the jungle. His face is neither hard, cruel nor bestial, and in this he does not differ from other beasts of our modern jungle. Not one in a thousand of them has the faintest idea that he is a beast and lives in a jungle. As these men look into their polished mirrors they see only prosperous gentlemen with eyes keen but kindly, faces shrewd but bearing the marks of intelligence and cultivation. They know what they want, go after it and get it. That is all they know about it. They do not know that, "There is a way that seemeth right to a man, but the end thereof is death," death to liberty, death to equality of opportunity, death to the mass of mankind that a few Napoleons of finance, captains of industry and kings of sisal may stalk the earth in majesty.

Of course this Yucatan condition is not going to be brought about in this fair land of ours, not in a thousand years. Those poor peons are not our racial stock and we have Lindseys to fight back. We have a people that, if aroused to such a danger, would sweep kinglets and princelings into the ocean; but without a stern and unyielding resistance to The Beast our submerged tenth, if not fourth, like the mass of Mexicans, would as certainly find the dead level of a practical peonage as the Yaqis and Mayas have found it in Yucatan. That is the logical consummation of the unrestricted policy of The Beast of our jungle. As such it is instructive to contemplate.

Those Revered Legal Maxims.

In tracing out and explaining the origin of some of our legal maxims which have "borne the test of time," as Mr. Warren Olney, Sr., has done elsewhere in this paper, an important public service has been performed. We commend the article to the careful perusal of all persons concerned for the establishment of justice in this country. These maxims, like certain culinary creations procured at restaurants, command less favor when we come to know how they were made.

Especial interest will be excited by his explanation of how the doctrine of reasonable doubt came into being, and that no person shall be required to testify against himself, the presumption of innocence. Under the conditions which Mr. Olney sets forth these merciful limitations were proper mitigations of the barbarity of the law, but now that the old conditions he so vividly describes have been done away with and society, not the prisoner, is at the mercy of chicanery and malice, the application of these rules to judicial proceedings becomes as unreasonable as were the conditions in a former age which brought these maxims into being. The reason for the use of these maxims having failed their use should have failed with them.

But our bench and bar, as well as the native conservatism of the people at large, are much wedded to the past. We still wear buttons on the tails of our coats because, at a former time, coat tails were unbuttoned and taken off when men rode on horseback in muddy weather and were buttoned on again when they reached their journey's end.

The Deeper Significance
: : : : of Living : : : :

Somewhere on a tombstone this epitaph was inscribed: "He Died of Things." Whole centuries might appropriately be filled with monuments bearing that legend, marking the only resting places of many men, and myriads of women. As many are possessed by Things as are possessed of Things.

For a few days succeeding the great fire many hundreds of Oakland homes were thrown open to refugees from San Francisco to be cared for temporarily. A relief committee organized the quick shelter work systematically and half a hundred college professors, students and others solicited entertainment, especially for women and children. The cottages were thrown open without reserve. All the rooms, if needed, were converted into bed rooms, but it was not so with the fine houses. It rained and homeless families crowded the relief headquarters seeking shelter. At the fine houses, as a rule, the garages and the hay lofts were placed, very graciously, at the disposal of the committee, but not the homes. The homes had Things in them and bedraggled women and untrained children might tarnish Things. They "couldn't, don't you know," because of their reverence for the god of their adoration, "Things." And so the wail of the homeless child mingled with the wail of the wind under the spreading eaves of palaces and no ear heard them until they blew low enough to be caught by the narrowed cornice of the cottage where the god, Things, has his altar set up and the worshippers bowing down before him. The dwellers in palaces gave time, gave money, gave food, gave clothing, gave everything except shelter, but that they could not give because of Things.

The world has need of Things, nice Things, Things made of money, of money, of money. Things made of silk, satin, cloth or gold, but a breath will tarnish Things. Therefore Things must be shut up in best rooms and the children must be kept out of them. The shades must be drawn down that the glare of sunlight may be shut away from Things, and Things love a dim, if not always a religious, light. The slave to Things must keep Things dusted, polished, as spotless as the souls of little children, for, if Company (another god who rules its vassals with a lash like wrinkled lightnings) should come and find Things less than spotless how must the slave of Things stand before Company abashed, apologetic, mortified to the quick. It were such a shame to be caught by Company showing want of respect for the exalted station of Things!

Think of the weary years it has taken to get Things together! The rising early and toiling late, driving hard bargains, scrimping the table, overlooking the contribution box, turning the back on charity, cutting loose from needy relations, enduring privations to-day, this week and this month that, next year, we possess ourselves of Things, or be possessed by Things, however the experiment may turn out. Think, too, of the narrow and the constrained life which Things compel, the ceaseless vigilance, the anxious care, the unhappiness inflicted if any misadventure happens to Things! Is it any wonder that people do not want Things? And even then there is no escaping Things, for Things, costly Things, Things of spotless linen, of crepe, of burnished wood, of plated metal, follow the slave to Things under the lowly lintel into the narrow house and abide there, yes, even into the white-heated crematory if one would flee away to that place, and into the niche in the columbarium where the slave's ashes lie. There the ashes of Things are mingled with the ashes of his slave for ever and ever.

Things are a good-enough servant, but oh! what a tyrant! The man, the only way to make Things keep its place is to make it of daily, family, common place use. For who is Company that he should lord it over Family and demand Things that to Family are denied? Do we love Company more than Family?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Aviator's a Paying Business.

Since that meeting of aviators at Rheims, not long ago, it has become evident that the successful aviator has a right to be classed among money-makers. There is not a man who took part in that meeting who is not now in a position to reap rich financial returns, not improbably more rapidly than he ever had done theretofore. For instance, Paulhan, Delagrangé and Demange now are receiving $200 a day, each, to display themselves and their machines to admiring crowds, and they are said to be congratulating themselves that they are bound to such low figures only for the term of a 30-days contract. Farman and Bleriot, looking higher, ask $6,000 for a week's engagement, and they rather prefer that no one shall take them at their offer, for they claim to be making more money by remaining at home and building their aeroplanes, the price of Farman's now being $5,600. In addition to these direct returns there are numerous possible returns in cash prizes, ranging from large to small sums, which are offered for successful flights. On the whole, it is apparent that these are palmy days, if not for aviation, at least for the aviators. Their sun is shining, and they are wise to look after their hay.

Looking After Our Grapes for Us.

The Department of Agriculture is doing a meritorious thing in attempting to introduce new and choice grapes for the consideration of California growers. Among these are the Pinet and the Goolable, which are expected to grow in favor as black table grapes, and the Sultana Rosea, which is a red grape somewhat similar to the Thompson seedless. But while the Department probably will be commended for its enterprise in this direction, it is likely to receive little commendation for the interest it displays in attending to the names of our grapes for us. It has decided that our Zinfandel grape is not the Zinfandel, but as one of its authorities says that its true name is not known, perhaps we better may continue to call it Zinfandel than to leave it nameless. The Perle Blanche and the Bicané, it says, are the same grape, and hereafter it shall be known as the Bicané. But the worst blow of all is conveyed in the announcement that the Muscat, the raisin grape in which Fresno glories, is not the Muscat, and henceforth must be known as the Alexandria. Such is the Department's fiat, but it is doubtful if it will be heeded. The people of California know and esteem the leading raisin grape as the Muscat, and the old name for it, mistaken or otherwise, is likely to be good enough for them.

Ten Million Photographs in a Second.

It would seem that the photographic art has attained its utmost possible perfection in a recent invention by Professor Cranz of the military technical high school of Charlottenburg, Germany. Professor Cranz calls his invention the "ballistic cinematograph," and it was exhibited this year, for the first time, at the international photographic exhibition at Dresden. The marvel of this invention may be briefly summed in the statement that it will take a photograph in one ten-millionth part of a second, and by means of it things never before seen by the eye of man are at last made visible. To illustrate, a kinematographic succession of these pictures will show a bullet in every moment of its flight. One such series of pictures shows the effect upon a bone of a bullet shot from a gun, and so inconceivable is the swiftness of the process that, although the time from the first dinting to the splintering of the bone is briefest of the brief, a number of pictures are required to portray all that is happening. Twenty to thirty films are essential to show the movement of a single splinter. As yet the ballistic cinematograph takes all its pictures in silhouette.

Concerning the Prices We Pay.

Beginning in 1892, the Bradstreet agency has kept an accurate record of the prices paid for 106 different articles of common use in domestic affairs. After the first years of that record there was a fairly regular upward movement in all prices until the top notch in all our history was reached in March, 1907. Then came the Wall street scare which affected the business interests of the entire country, and prices fell, but only in a moderate degree. Soon, however, the upward movement again began, and since then it has continued without notable interruption, until last August prices were within 6.8 per cent. as high as they were at the highest ever known. A few examples of average prices in 1896 and their increases up to last August may serve to give the consumer an intelligent idea of just where and how he has been hit, and here they are: In 1896 pork sold for $8.25 a barrel; last August for $21.75, a little increase of 164 per cent. Eggs have increased from 12½ cents a dozen to 28 cents, or 124 per cent; mutton from 5½ to 11 cents, 100 per cent; corn 34 to 80 cents a bushel, 147 per cent; wheat 64 cents to $1.20 a bushel, 87½ per cent. The list might be continued, but probably it is long enough to give the reader some idea why his income seems so much smaller than it did a few years ago, when it was no larger.

The Waste of Our Forests.

A circular written by Treadwell Cleveland, Jr., and issued by the Forest Service, again calls attention strikingly to the depletion of the forests in the United States. Consider these facts, as condensed from the circular. Every year we take from the forests three and one-half times as much wood as is added to them by new growth. When a tree is felled by an average lumberman less than one-third of it is used, and of the more than two-thirds waste fully one-half is entirely unnecessary. One-eleventh of our forests are swept by fires (against which precautions could and should be taken) every year, and in these fires $50,000,000 worth of timber and fifty lives are lost annually. Less than one per cent of the forests in private ownership is properly and effectively protected against fire. And as the forests go our means of controlling our water supply are being largely reduced, if not obliterated. As Mr. Cleveland says: "It is not use which destroys the forests, but waste. Not use as such, but destructive use, combined with inexcusable neglect, is causing the forests to dwindle under our progressive demands upon them. The problem, therefore, is not to be solved by disuse, but by wise use and protection."

Says There Is Much in a Name.

Notwithstanding the potent authority of Shakespeare to the contrary, a Frenchman named de Rochetel now is attracting considerable attention to himself in his own country by his theory that the name a person bears has much to do with his character. A child, according to his view, may be made or unmade by the name bestowed upon him by his dotting parents. Having thus promulgated his theory, de Rochetel proceeds to tell what names bear a blessing and what a curse. You should, for instance, avoid calling your child Abel, for if you do he will develop into a bandit. One might have thought that the name of Cain would be more likely to have such disastrous effect, but the Frenchman puts the black mark against Abel. If you wish your boy to be a politician name him Jules; chivalrous and generous, Henry; energetic and persevering, Edward. Alice is out of luck, for she is a gloomy sort of a girl, with a predisposition to suicide, and so is Helen. And so the theory is continued through a lot of balderdash which would be of no interest here, or elsewhere, were it not that de Rochetel is attracting a noticeable degree of attention in one of the world's centers of civilization, Paris—and the people of Paris are no more foolish than some other peoples, you know. What was it that Puck said?

Anti-Cholera Serum Discovered.

Dr. Salimbini, an Italian who is working in the Pasteur Institute, in Paris, under Professor Metchnikoff, has discovered a serum to prevent cholera, which he tested during the epidemic in St. Petersburg. It was tested in numerous cases, resulting in a reduction of the mortality from 50 per cent to 23 per cent, and Dr. Salimbini calls attention to the fact that he was allowed to experiment only in connection with such serious cases as had been practically given up as hopeless. Professor Metchnikoff indorses Salimbini's serum, but still places his chief faith in such preventives as drinking boiled water, etc.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will dispense any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELVE.

"The Arabian Nights."

Good fiction frees the reader from the actual, and lets him wander for a space in an ideal world. But "The Arabian Nights" does this and more—it frees us from the irksome limitations of time and space and gravitation and experience, and turns us loose, as unrestrained as air, to mount the clouds of fancy with delightful ease. Wish what we will: how simple the attainment; but rub Aladdin's lamp and it is ours. Knock as we please at dark mysterious doors: the magic "Sesame" flings them open wide before us. Do we have "desire of many marvels overseas," sit on this varicolored square of carpet and the very thought will waft us thither. Here we may solve all mysteries, but yet we do not shatter the charm of their mysteriousness. Sindbad, relating his marvelous adventures, thrills us with their recitation despite the fact we see him munching dates safe in his garden at Bagdad.

Wonderful heart of humanity, that grows old in worldliness and cynical sophistication and scepticism, but remains at core forever young, unfailingly beguiled by tales ingeniously preposterous.

BOOKS AND—BOOKS.

The line is intended to suggest a distinction. Some books are only paper and print and covers. Other books are books, our books, fountains of pleasure, wells of refreshment, mines of information, friends of our inmost selves in the most intimate seclusion of friendship.

On our shelves are some books that are gifts of our friends, sent at Christmas or on birthdays, to remind us of friendship. Well, there are gifts and gifts. One of these books is a handsome, new, costly edition of the American poets' works. But we happen to loathe this particular poet. The friend who gave it might have known this dislike by a few tactical questions that never were asked. That book, as a result, is an intruder and an offense to our shelves.

But another gift book is there: a battered old fellow, with a leaf or two missing and a couple of signatures of prior owners scrawled on the title-page. Yet it is one of our treasures. The friend who sent it us sounded our likings, learned of our longing to possess this one book, searched for days at the bookstores, and snatched this faded example of a rare volume from a second-hand dealer, passing it gently to us as a souvenir of his thoughtful regard. The book itself carries its own message to us, but this volume carries with it, besides, the message of a kindly human fellowship.

So, there are books and—books. We would have in our house two shelves; one should be kept chaste as the virtue of wives, sacred to the pure flame of our own books of choice; the other should be a mere warehouse wherein to pile rubbish such as pamphlets and books of reference and volumes of immediate use or expediency. To those who love books, they are human and friends, not to be herded with mere paper and ink. Those who do not love books—their books are only books, anyway.

* THE SILENT LONDON CLUB.

J. M. Barrie is a member of the Athenaeum Club in Pall Mall. On his first appearance there, it is said, he once asked for some information from a gentleman sitting near him. To his great surprise the older member not only told him all he wanted to know, but insisted on Mr. Barrie dining with him and taking supper afterward, though neither of them knew the other's name.

Upon Mr. Barrie protesting that he could not possibly accept so much kindness from a stranger the other immediately replied: "Don't mention it. I don't mention it. Why, I've belonged to this club for twenty-five years and you are the very first member who has ever spoken to me."—Tit-Bits.

Edwin Chase.

(For The California Weekly.)
I had thought the Inferno Dante writ;
I was just the notion of a mind too near
The silver tankards that old Florence knew;
But here I've found the place, am sure of it,
From which that curious story grew.
Here is the cavern, here the awful pit,
Approach, creep up, yet draw you not too near.

Nor come at all unless immune to fear.
The sights and sounds about this fearsome hole.

Were once reviewed by Dante's naked soul,
And thence you know, indeed are sure of it,
Thence came the tale that old Italian writ.

Forbes Robertson, the English actor and husband of Gertrude Elliott, will appear in America this season in "The Passing of the Third Floor Back."

William Gillette is about to retire from the stage. He is under contract to write a new play for Charles Frohman this year, and next year he will make a farewell tour in a repertory of his own plays.

Augustus Thomas' new play is "The Harvest Moon." It will be first produced on October 15th at Atlantic City.

TO A SUN-DIAL.

By Elizabeth Gerberding.

(For The California Weekly.)

Before you, shadowy messenger of Time,—
A herald caught within a mesh of laws,—
I see the ghosts of by-gone ages pause,
And note the warning traced upon your face.
Sometimes, you marked for them a day of joy,
That beat its rapturous moments all too fast;
Sometimes, a cruel day dragged through that last,

And left a broken life upon your wheel.
In sunlight,—stern, inexorable, grim,—
You treated an exhortation, like a hymn;
And in the storm, a silence eloquent
Told eternal vigilance was sent.
And life was ever then as now, a race,
A fleeting shadow on a dial's face.

Californian Poets' Corner

Miss Ida Goodrich, best known of the woman poets of California, has seldom struck in later years the joyous note of some of her earlier lyrics. "Meadowlarks" is one of the best examples of this early style.

MEADOW-LARKS.

By Ina Coolbrith.

Sweet, sweet, sweet! O happy that I am!
(Listen to the meadow-larks, across the meadow, that sing!)
Sweet, sweet, sweet! O subtle breath of balm, O winds that blow, O buds that grow, O rapture of the spring!

Sweet, sweet, sweet! O skies, serene and blue,
That shut the velvet pastures in, that fold
the mountain's crest!

Sweet, sweet, sweet! What of the clouds ye knew,
The vessels ride a golden tide, upon a sea at rest.

Sweet, sweet, sweet! Who prates of care and pain?

Who says that life is sorrowful? O life so glad, so fleet!
Ah! he who lives the noblest life finds life the noblest gain.

The vessels of pain a tender rain to make its waters sweet.

Sweet, sweet, sweet! O happy world that is!
Dear heart, I hear across the fields my mating pipe and call.

Sweet, sweet, sweet! O world so full of bliss,—
For life is love, the world is love, and love is over all!

WHAT PORTOLA DID.

Suddenly a committee arises in San Francisco and announces that, from October 19th to 23d, the city shall celebrate the Portola Festival. A contest decides that a young poetess is the most beautiful girl in the state and the appropriate queen of the occasion. A delegation ferrets out a cavalierly descendant of the dons in a southern county and hales him north to impersonate Gaspar de Portola. A commissioner rushes off to Europe and starts battleships from many nations toward the Golden Gate to help celebrate. Meanwhile an astonished public rubs its eyes and inquires, "Celebrate what?"

The California Promotion Committee has undertaken to tell us all about it. Under its auspices is published a readable and scholarly book entitled "The March of Portola and the Log of the San Carlos." This book answers the question, "Celebrate what?" and furthermore supplies a truly interesting record of early California history that should long ago have been accessible to the general public.

In the book, Mr. Zoeth S. Eldridge describes the march of Portola and the discovery of San Francisco bay, and Mr. E. J. Molera translates and annotates the log of the San Carlos and other original documents regarding the survey of the bay.

From the book we learn that Don Carlos III of Spain was warned that Russian and English fishermen were prowling around the coast of Alta California (California proper, as distinguished from Lower California), and threatening the Spanish ascendancy in such unfortified ports as Monterey and San Diego. Also, that on February 27, 1767, Don Carlos issued a decree expelling the Jesuits from the Spanish dominions. And, finally, that the expedition which passed in the ship San Carlos into Francisco bay was undertaken for the double purpose of maintaining the Spanish authority in California and of dispossessing the Jesuit missionaries in favor of the Franciscan friars.

For this purpose, in 1769, the ship San Carlos was sent from La Paz to carry an expedition up the coast, while the expedition set out for the same destination under the command of Gaspar de Portola, who was the governor of the Californias. To merely sum up the narrative, both expeditions suffered extraordinary hardships; they met at San Diego and agreed to meet again at Monterey; Portola did not recognize Monterey when he saw it, and, pushing on north in search of it, found San Francisco bay early in November. A full account is given of the incidents of this march and of the return to San Diego. The "Log of the San Carlos" describes the careful survey of San Francisco bay made in 1775 by Lieutenant Ayala.

The book is suitably illustrated with full-page drawings and with reproductions of the map made by Ayala and of the signature of Don Gaspar de Portola.

THE ARCH ROYCROFTER AGAIN.

The Press Humorists of America held their annual reunion a few weeks ago at Buffalo. Ted Robinson, funny man of the Cleveland Leader, describes an excursion to the home of Elbert Hubbard, as follows: We promised to tell the real truth about Fra Elbertus and the Roycrofters. After a day in East Aurora we are obliged to disappoint our readers. This is a respectable, family newspaper.

The Fra spoke to us in the chapel. He gave us many pointers on the subject, "Why You Should Spend All Your Money Buying My Books." But he did not entirely confine himself to this theme. There are many bright thoughts on "Elbert Hubbard, Reformer, Saint and Martyr." The Fra also spoke briefly about himself.

At the entrance of the Roycroft grounds the visitor's attention is first attracted to a beautiful hand-tooled garbage can, very Roycroftie. A hand-painted sign thereon reads, "Put Your Rubbish Here."

Everybody does it but Fra Elbertus.

TRAINING THE FIRE-FIGHTERS

THRILLING EXERCISES THAT FIT THEM FOR DUTY.

The dozen and a half probationary firemen are told off in squads of six; the young fellows in the first squad buckle on the life-belts with the big "hook" in front, stamp their feet in a box of rosin and mount to the life-net. Above their heads rises a frame building four stories high, with three windows across the face of each story. Six scaling ladders hang from the second story windows, two to each window. The six men divide into three pairs. At the sound of the chief's whistle, one man from each pair scurries up a ladder, and snaps the hook in his belt around it so that, with his feet braced, he can lean back with his hands free.

The whistle blows again, and each man takes the other scaling ladder at his window, and puts it up to the window above. The whistle blows again, and the man at top of the first ladder runs to the top of the second and snaps his hook, while his partner runs up the first ladder, and thence to the lowest rung of the second, where he also secures himself. At the next blast of the whistle, the partner passes the lower ladder up to the man above, who catches it over the sill of the window one story above his head. So they go story after story, and in less time than it takes to write this they are on the roof of the house.

This is the first exercise in the twice-a-day drill through which are put all new members of the San Francisco fire department. The scene is the drill ground at Seventeenth and Polson streets. Next comes the rescue drill. From the roof, the squad comes down the fire escape into the fourth-story room. A leather dummy of a man is hoisted from the ground up to the window. This dummy represents a helpless fire victim found in the room. The men take turns at teasing up the helpless victim so he cannot fall, tying a rope to him, and letting him safely down the side of the building to the ground. It requires a good deal of skill to do this quickly and yet not batter the helpless victim's brains out against the side of the building or let him plump to the ground with force enough to kill him. The dummy was undoubtedly killed by this latter fault once during the drill observed by the writer, which alone is obvious enough reason for requiring intending firemen to become proficient before trying their skill at a real fire.

The second and third squads now go through these two drills just described. A few veteran firemen from the adjoining engine house look on with critics' eyes.

"That kid would make a good one if he was stronger. He's quick as a cat, but he ain't got the muscle."

"Look at the sailor; he's got the snap, all right."

The men are eager to learn and soon get the hang of things, doing the same bit of work the same way, over and over, until it becomes a habit and they feel perfectly at home scurrying up the sheer face of a building to dizzy heights.

Two of the older recruits now practice the most spectacular of all the exercises. They make fast a rope from a projection at the eaves, drop the other end of the rope to the ground, pass the rope twice around the hook in the life-net, and, with one hand clasping the rope overhead and the other hand clasping it beneath the thigh, slide swiftly down the rope to the ground. They come down like a streak, kicking themselves away from the side of the building. The coil around the hook acts as a brake, so that a slight pressure on the rope with the under hand stops the man at will in his descent.

Meanwhile, the rest of the squad is carrying a line of hose up the fire escape to another face of the building. This is a beautiful display of team work on a much larger scale than with the scaling ladders. One man stops at the landing on each floor; the last man starts from the ground with the nozzle and end of the hose over his shoulder. As he passes the landings the man on each landing pulls up the length of hose between himself and the landing below, so that the nozzle-man never carries the weight of more than a few feet of hose.

At the top, other nozzle-men are waiting. They make ready for the stream while the men on the landings lash the hose to the fire-escapes to steady and support it, and while the man on the ground turns on the water.

After the stream has played on the imaginary fire for a few minutes the hose is lowered and the men practice making hitches of rope around nozzles and other implements for the men on the roof to draw up. Then, as each of the men on the roof descends the fire-escape, he practices various exercises, such as attaching a short length of hose to the standpipe and operating the railing nozzle-rest.

As one watches these men at drill one is struck with admiration at their fine enthusiasm for the work, their eagerness to learn how to do each thing right, their willingness to obey orders. There is also the rescue drill, and discipline of the army without its severe compulsion, and a something besides, hard to define, but perhaps as well expressed as may be by "spontaneousness." The men work together as if the work were some new and profoundly interesting game, which, indeed, it is in a sense, for fire-fighting is one of the few really adventurous callings that are left to men in the midst of our peaceful and orderly civilization.

The men themselves are a fine type, clear-eyed, lithe, muscular, alert. Any one who wishes to see as good team-work as a baseball game displays, put to a use at once more utilitarian and more spectacular, should spend an hour or two at the firemen's drill ground.

MAETERLINCK'S "MACBETH."

The following account of an unusual and effective setting for the production of a version of Macbeth is quoted from an article in the New York Tribune, signed C. I. B.

The unique representation of Shakespeare's "Macbeth" at the half ruined, twelfth century abbaye of Saint-Wandrille, near Caudebec, in Normandy, inaugurates a new kind of dramatic entertainment—that of the ambulatory theater. Groups of spectators, about fifty all told, conducted by guides attired in distinctive red, yellow or green costumes of the period, follow the performers about from point to point in the successive phases of the play, which takes place in different halls or galleries, terraces and parks. The huge, somber abbaye, with its massive stone constructions, may, with a pardonable stretch of imagination, be accepted as a substitute for Macbeth's castle near Dunsinane, or for the royal palace at Dunsinane.

The performance was arranged by the poet and dramatist, Maurice Maeterlinck, who, with his wife, Mme. Gerorgette Leblanc-Maeterlinck, lives during the summer at the abbaye of Saint-Wandrille, and who has completed his translation of "Macbeth" into French. His wife played the part of Lady Macbeth, and the other characters were intrusted to leading Parisian actors and actresses. The interior of the abbaye had been arranged so as to present what may be fairly supposed to have been ancient Scottish furniture and fittings, and the costumes were historically accurate.

It was a night of full moon, and the sky was free from clouds. After waiting an hour in a vast and chilly anteroom with paved floor, the red guide who was to conduct our little group appeared and announced that the performance was about to begin. It was 9 o'clock. We were led to a balcony near the high-walled dark cloister of the abbaye, where the moonlight could not penetrate. By a clever combination of electric mechanism and sheet iron one was given the illusion of being in a thunderstorm. Flashes of lightning revealed the three witches circling about their cauldron, skipping about on real heather and chanting incantations. A shrill screech of Highland bagpipes is heard, succeeded by a beating of kettle-drums. Macbeth and Banquo appear on horseback, followed by officers and soldiers. We hear the rumbling and the murmurs of the troopers, the clanking of arms and armor, and the sound of horses. The scene of the witches is weird and realistic. After their prophetic greetings they vanish with such magic rapidity that one keenly appreciates the force of Banquo's comment, "The earth hath bubbles, as the water has, and these are of them." We are conducted to another part of the grounds. Macbeth dismounts from his charger and walks slowly and alone up a

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

To Annie Hypatia Bruno Besant.

Mrs. Annie Besant has confided to her friends that she is a reincarnation of Hypatia and also of Giordano Bruno. She confided, further, that it required twenty years of hard work on her part to remember what happened to her as Hypatia and Bruno, but now she recollects perfectly.

And I have shaken hands with her—I mean with them—

Have taken her dainty palm—I mean their palms—in mine,

Have touched perchance her wide skirt—on the ward flowing hem—

I think it was not Bruno's coat—and, feeling fine,

Have talked with her—or him, or them; it mixes me,

I must confess, to get the three unmixed and plumb—

But just to think that I have met the wondrous three

My deadening soul assures that I've been going some.

Yes, I've been going some. Full often I have thought

I'd like to know old Bruno, fine, heroic soul; Hypatia, too. I knew not then that she had caught

And walked triune with them 'neath "this inverted bowl."

Yet one thing puzzles me, one question gives me pause:

Oh, answer it, my Annie, for the wonder hurts:

In changes vast maintained by Theosophic laws,

How does it seem to change from pantaloons to skirts?

Mental Inferiority of Our Sisters.

The other day, William, I heard you express your keen realization of man's intellectual superiority over woman. Where did you get the idea? I have heard large numbers of other men giving expression to a similar realization. Where and how did they accumulate the notion?

I know you, William, and I know your sister, and you are, in my opinion, just about average people. You attended the primary school with that sister, and there she glittered rather more than you did. Together you went through the grammar school and the high school, and she somewhat outranked you in your classes—didn't she, William? Your mental superiority hadn't struck in yet, I take it. Then the two of you attended college, and I'm blessed if she didn't surpass you still. I suppose that your intellectual superiority must have been shipped on a slow freight, and consequently was belated.

But it arrived. I don't know exactly the hour and minute, but it was some time in the night after your graduation, and since then you constantly have been your sister's mental superior, as you modestly admit. It is the same with millions of other men, for it is a singular fact that the gentler sex maintain their mental superiority until the day and hour when there is no longer is opportunity for accurate and statistical comparison, and then they immediately drop to the inferior position, man being a much better pugilist, and consequently abler in argument.

The fact of the case is, William, that we men would better put on the soft pedal when we are orating about our mental superiority to women. As long as they have a chance for statistical competition they beat us out, and it doesn't look well for us to become their superiors too immediately after the opportunity for proof or disproof has passed away.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Use some judgment in blowing your own horn, son, remembering that though the rooster's the loudest cackler in the barnyard, he don't often convince anybody that he laid the egg.

"Why do you hope to git in here?" the angel at the gate said to John A. Johnson. "Because of what I've done," was the reply. "And you?" says the angel, turning to E. H. Harriman. "Also because of those I've done," was the answer which was due to a misunderstanding of the other's reply. But I've never heered how it turned out.

Most of us b'lieve that great riches is a curse, but we feel it our duty to cultivate patience so that we could stand a good deal of cussin'.

Young Ab Perkins says that, while girls are good, it's unachural to s'pose that some of 'em can be es good es they look.

Criticism's easy. None of us could have made the world, but most any of us feel free to tell how the job could have been improved.

I dreamed that the millenium had come, an' all that had happened was that every man of us all was es good es his mother wanted him to be.

A dreamer asleep 'neath the cumbering mold—

Nay, but the Master shall summon us yet:

Dreams that are lost in the swirl of the mist,
Hopes that were chilled by a death-cold blast,

What are they all when all are past?

Ever the question and answer none:

Ever the sob o'er the voiceless stone—

Nay, that our journey is but begun,

Masters of Masters, we still will trust.

The League Settled It.

Satan, Apollyon and Beelzebub once engaged in a controversy concerning which would make the best candidate for office. The dispute waxed hot, and the very foundations of Sheol might have been shattered had it not been for a happy suggestion made by a shrewd little red imp.

"He was the good Government League," said he. "It is great on deciding such questions."

So the League was sent for and all was arranged harmoniously. But as for which one of the three the League indorsed, what difference does it make to any good citizen?

Thoughtful Man on Hichborn's Book.

"We find," said the Thoughtful Man, "that Franklin Hichborn's book 'The Story of the Legislature,' is very useful to us in rounding up and branding our mavericks."

"What are your mavericks?" I inquired.

"The ones to whom we thus tenderly refer," he responded, "are those noble and patriotic legislative statesmen who, with a high appreciation of justice and right, realize that these mere ideals must not be permitted to interfere with business. Heretofore we have kept our eyes pretty closely upon them—they being of the kind with whom it is necessary—" but Hichborn has made this unnecessary. He has exposed their every vote to public inspection, as the hangman's victims were exposed to popular view in the merry days of old—and I may as well admit that after sufficient exposure the smell is much the same in many instances. Thus we are enabled to detect if at any time they have deviated from business to decency, and, if they have, they know what to expect. I am glad to say that many of them did what business demanded if they had to use chloride of lime while doing it."

"But are you not afraid," I inquired, "that people who prefer the public welfare to spoils may get hold of the book, note the legislators who preferred justice and right to business, reward them and punish the others?"

"Not at all, not at all," the Thoughtful Man replied. "Here or there one may get hold of the book, but it costs a dollar and a quarter, and we have observed that rarely will a reformer pay that much to obtain an intelligent basis for his views; they find it more convenient to reform without knowing how, why or what. For instance, they would sooner listen to an orator than to an editor, and to pay a small sum for proof that he is a false servant who should be dismissed. We have noticed this peculiarity in reformers."

"But suppose the people should read this book and ascertain exactly what their supposed servants have done?" I suggested.

"That would be bad," the Thoughtful Man admitted, "but they won't. I guess we haven't been working the people all these years without knowing them by this time. Why, don't you remember our motto—"

Know those you work,
Work those you know,

To gain a mile
Lion plunks or so.

A Word With Elnathan.

If you have gone wrong, Elnathan, and need a friendly, sympathetic hand to lead you into the right path, go to the man who also has gone wrong ere now and stumbingly and painfully faltered upward, for the man who has in like manner stumbled is most likely to sympathize with you in your self-incurred hurt.

There is a class of men who are so very good, with so little of red, errant blood in their veins, that they neither greatly understand nor pity the sinner who goes astray and, anguished and weary, faintly return unto his father's house. They are the elder brothers, honorable, smug, self-complacent and decent, and they never can understand either why the prodigal should go into a far country or why his father should love him through his wanderings and reject him on his return.

It takes the one who has sinned, risen, and knows he may sin again, to pityingly heed another who has sinned and would rise. The prodigal usually has little to give, but he gives that where the elder brother would give nothing. If your self-inflicted wounds hurt, Elnathan, and you would have them tenderly bound, hunt up a chap who has suffered in that way himself, and there is a fair chance that you will be aided.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The Sacramento, Cal., September 25, 1909
Editor The California Weekly.

I hope you will not let the late Governor John Johnson's death pass without a word of acknowledgment. His worth and making the most out of the lesson of his life. He came from the very bottom of the social mass and rose to a place in its higher strata.

Few men do this. Of those who do, many carry the crudities and the limitations of their early disadvantages with them, and are blighted by them. Most surviving these things, acquire with their prosperity the vanities, selfishness and vulgarity of the nouveau riche, the tyranny and insolence of those suddenly given unaccustomed power. A very few keep the best of the conditions they have survived; and, avoiding all of the evils, acquire all of the good of the station into which they are called. This chosen few is the salt of the earth. Their wisdom is broader, they are the most symmetrically developed, they are our strongest and sweetest. Governor Johnson was one of them, and I would like to have you say so.

This man belonged to the old school of Americans, who really are the makers of the legitimate product. He typified the dignity of simple things and the simplicity of dignified things. Of the same school was Jefferson who superintended his own farm, invented a plow and was at the same time one of the most brilliant figures at the French court. John Adams dressed in homespun, tried cases in petty courts, yet represented his country with dignity in the presence of an intolerant and contemptuous British king. I need not mention Lincoln, who spent his own kindling and milked his own cow the night before he left for Washington to become our greatest president.

When America ceases to develop such men, or all round men with lofty democratic ideals, who respect their fellows with regard to their wealth or station, her best work is done. Let us keep this ideal always before our people. This we can do to-day by calling attention to Johnson's career and character, which his death has just now made dramatic.

Do not the careers of such men as Johnson make you think that we are giving our youth too much college education? The world of conventional education is the creation of the book men, isn't it an artificial world? In training our men to live in it and to be of it, are we not getting them out of the current of life? The college man is a delightful person, but somehow I like best the fellow who comes the other way.

But I'm talking too much—there is enough inspiration in this man's life to keep your paper full for a year. In this way, I hope, the paper will be for its own sake, independent of my interest in yourself. I hope it is prospering. I enclose my little mite to help it along.

Sincerely,

PETER J. SHIELDS.

the passing of Governor John Johnson, of Minnesota, is rather inexplicable even to the person responsible for the situation. It should not have been permitted.

However, no better tribute to the man could well be written than the one above, although not penned for publication. To our mind Governor Johnson was not big enough to be president, but he was growing and might, had his life been spared, have reached presidential size before turning the sear and yellow leaf.

His capitalization consisted in a sound character and a wonderfully taking personality. He stood for right things. That was the essential factor in his career. It was that which gave him character. With this foundation, and a personality that inspired because it deserved, confidence, he was able to erect on that foundation a superstructure that challenged the admiration of men. Because he loved and trusted the people they loved and trusted him.

The issue Judge Shields raises, in relation to the effect that university training would have had upon such a personality, is an interesting one. We do not know what Lincoln would have been like had he been given a college education, and not been given that education which he did receive in the woods and on the prairies and mixing in the commonest way with the commonest of people. Perhaps the fountains of his humanism might have kept sweet, even though educated at a Standard Oil college. There are natures so deep and true that their main currents can not much be changed, and a Lincoln or a Johnson in college might have done the college more good than the college could have done them harm, but as to this we can only conjecture.

Be that as it may the future is to the college bred men. It can't be helped even if we want to help it, which we do not. The power there is in knowledge and training will bring the college man to the fore. Being stronger than his untrained brother he can not be kept away from positions of power. We may well accept this as one of the inevitabilities of our civilization. All that is left us is the hope that college life may be made so much like real life as to make the college man a real man; that the intellect may be trained without leaving the heart untrained. This is not going to be easy, but it is going to be worth struggling for.

THE NAIVE "S. P."

The Southern Pacific company, through its local agents, is distributing a boom magazine called "The Coming Country: a Monthly Exponent of the Great Growing Southwest." The July number of this publication contained, as its leading article, "Growing Oranges in Texas." After retailing the great advantages of soil and climate, the author proceeded to compare the transportation facilities of his new orange belt with those of the Californian orange producers, in language that was probably not noticed by the Southern Pacific people when they generously exploited the magazine in California. This comparison reads as follows:

"Let us analyze the relative cost of growing Satsuma oranges in Texas and other varieties in the older district. Orange lands in California in their raw state cannot be purchased for less than $300 per acre and more often $500 per acre. The orchardist must then secure a water right, which is an annual tax on him forever, and before a commercial crop can be secured his orchard must be from five to seven years of age. When he starts to put his fruit on the market he is up against the greatest transportation monopoly in the world and is no longer a free and independent operator, but must sell when and where others may decide and must pay such freight and incidental charges as it is found that the traffic will bear. What are our conditions in the older district? The finest of South Texas orange lands may be purchased at from $50 to $75 per acre. Nature has supplied us with a bountiful rainfall, and no irrigation is needed. Our orchard produces a fair crop and the fourth year an immense crop. In seeking a market we have no limit, as there are a large number of north and south trunk lines competing for the business."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

A Compulsory Recommendation In the President's exoneration of Secretary Ballinger it was stated that the Montana lands withdrawn from entry were withdrawn from entry upon the recommendation of the Reclamation Service, but the President did not state (what he doubtless did not know to be the fact) that Secretary Ballinger first compelled the Reclamation Service to make that recommendation over the personal protest of the head men of that service. At the time this recommendation was extorted Director Newell was away from Washington and the second in authority was ordered to make the desired recommendation. This upon authority of former Governor Pardee who has seen documentary evidence that such is the fact. If this can be proved it, alone, would warrant the dismissal of Ballinger from the cabinet in disgrace. It is a form of duplicity that cannot be condoned in any person who holds such a relation to public and President as does a department secretary.

Much Tinkering and Interpreting "The best direct primary law on the statute books of any state," seems to require a good deal of judicial interpretation to start it off. The inspection Judge Murasky gave the document disclosed to the trained judicial mind many inaccuracies and discrepancies which had escaped the trained newspaper mind of the Call's direct primary expert. The supreme court will take its guess at the law and if some considerable shreds of the document remain, enough to furnish raw material for the next legislature to work on, we may thank our stars. It is within reason to anticipate that it may take years of judicial interpretation and legislative emendation to fit the direct primary law to the requirements of direct nominations for office. This does not imply that the original draft of the law was so very faulty, but only that, in running the gauntlet of partisan legislation, the original bill became a good deal warped. A beginning toward free nominations has been made and that was the all important consideration. Having set its face in that direction the state is not likely to retreat to the old, boss-ridden, bargain-counter method of selecting party candidates for office.

An Awfully Sore Spot In the Body Politic The Watchman notes, in a recent issue of the Sacramento Bee, that, "At least 100 habitues of the tenderloin were denied the right to register last night by the county registrar of voters, but fully twice that number of prospective voters succeeded in getting on the register from that end of town." It is unlikely that the hundred who failed to get registered on that evening gave up the attempt. Their friends of the machine will coach them and find means to qualify them for voting. They are the lowest order of male being that has yet been spawned and spewed into human society and that a single one of them should be suffered to vote is a public evil. This element forms the nucleus of the power of every petty boss in America, and it is a nucleus that can be registered from any ward or any city where its malevolent services can be rendered of greatest social detriment. It carries its effects in a grip-sack and can transfer its domicile with an hour's warning. It never has to be reasoned with, but only told how to vote. Wherever municipal ownership has proven a success that element is barred from voting, and it may be doubted if municipal ownership ever can prove a success where that element is not barred from voting. We bar from suffrage those convicted of infamous crime, why not those notoriously of famous character?

Why Is Alameda An Organization Town? The little city of Alameda is one of the choice residential places of the bay district. It is devoid of slums and has a relatively small population such as ordinarily makes the power of the boss difficult to overthrow. It is not lacking in civic pride and plenty of church spires point heavenward. It is physically a cleanly city, but it is the seat and center of the "organization" push of Alameda county. Alameda city, not only wears the collar of the Southern Pacific organization, but it keeps that collar burnished brightly and seems to be proud of it. The political degradation of that little city is such that a part of the district from East Oakland to San Leandro, a district abounding in road-houses and as a corporate incorporation, Oakland to put out of commission, is thinking strongly of being annexed to the city of Alameda in the belief that the iniquities along that "pike" will be less disturbed as a part of the city of Alameda than as a part of the city of Oakland or as a separate incorporation. Oakland is not without its moralities and its tendencies toward independence in politics, but Alameda, fine town though it is, is politically degenerate and resists every effort to emancipate it from corporate control. Why is this thus?

Partisan Politics Under A Non-Partisan Law The big city convention called by the organization Republicans of Los Angeles has been held, and it remains to be seen whether it will produce any appreciable effect on the outcome of the primary election which is to be held later. For mayor the convention nominated ex-Councilman Smith, but nobody appears to feel much confidence that he will be successful at the primary, or even that he will really be supported by the organization. Los Angeles newspapers state that Smith has been told as given to understand by Walter Parker that he must expect to be sacrificed if it is considered necessary in the execution of the organization's plans. What those will be no man can say, but, with three Republican candidates, Alexander, Smith and Musgrave, the field as against one Democrat, Parish, Walter Parker may decide to repeat the tactics employed when Harper was elected, by swinging the Republican machine vote to the Democratic candidate.

The Spirit vs. The Watchman, being no Bal-linger and in hearty sympathy with the general policy of The California Weekly, generally favors action in conformity with the spirit rather than the letter of the law. But circumstances alter cases. When the spirit of the law is larcenous, and the letter can be construed into a padlock with which to fasten the door against thieves, the letter is to be preferred to the spirit. There are such instances. A case in point was the Seattle junket. The letter of the law said that the junket to Seattle (to be taken by a joint committee of fourteen) should be at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific exposition, to represent California, on the opening day, June 1st. The Committee was not there on that day. It was a ready-made, preferred Senator. The majority of the committee held that the spirit of the law meant a good time for those of the boys who had taken "organization" program without protest, although freely admitting that the letter specifically fixed June 1st and the opening ceremonies as the occasion and date when, if ever, California needed to be represented at a great event by a band of corporation programmers. Even Senator Frank Leavitt, whose hide is neither so thin nor conscience so tender that he could not defend the racetrack evil year after year, and stand forth about the rawest legislation that came up session after session, revolted at this grab and refused to go. Eddie Wolfe did not go but was sorry he couldn't. Phil Stanton and his man Friday (Transue) among others went. And Phil wants to be governor of California. Not much. Phil not only went to Seattle but also to Salt Creek on that trip. But that was just like Phil, a good fellow, but—

Complete Control Over Contingent Expenses The Call characterized the drawing and expending of this $5,000 for the Seattle trip as illegal and without authority of law. The Call was mistaken. It was not illegal for the legislature to steal from the people. It has "buttressed itself by the law" for that purpose with great care. A legislature may appropriate as much money as it wants to put into its contingent fund and then it can steal the whole fund if it wishes to and be perfectly legal about it, although it blow the whole pile in on joy rides in automobiles in early morning hours with company that looks better by dark than by day. But in this case there came near to being a slip up. The joint junket resolution, as originally enacted, contained the clause, "or as much thereof as may be necessary." The Controller might, under that resolution, have had power to require the money to be expended first, claims filed and vouchers furnished and, knowing what manner of controller they had to deal with, the junketers-in-chief had a second resolution passed ordering the money to be paid over to Porter and Sutton in bulk, and they got the swag out of the Controller's way with promptitude. Sometime when the state is amending its constitution it should require its legislatures to draw their contingent funds as other funds are drawn from the state treasury, only after filing proper vouchers and having the claims approved both by the State Board of Examiners and the State Controller. If the present State Controller had had that $5,000 within his control, and the delegation had not gone in season to be at Seattle June 1st, it would not have gone at all, anyhow not at state expense.

The Strength of Being In the course of an Insurgent Republicans address before the Public Health Association of California, and League of California Municipalities at Santa Cruz last week, President David Starr Jordan interjected a few by-remarks, not strictly a part of his address upon "The Strength of Being Clean as Applied to Cities," which betrayed a hearty sympathy with the insurgent Republican movement of the West. In expressing himself Doctor Jordan voices the sentiments of tens of thousands of loyal Republicans throughout the Middle West, yes, hundreds of thousands and even millions of them, and yet it is entirely possible that President Taft will pass through the Middle West going and coming and never see or hear from anything but standpatters. If the insurgents would make their "insurgent" effective they must speak right out in meeting as Doctor Jordan did at Santa Cruz.

Getting Together At Santa Cruz last week For Mutual Aid the city attorneys got together, in their section, and made a little offensive and defensive arrangement whereby, in the interests of their several municipalities, they may have the advantage of the advice and counsel of one another as often as legal problems arise of importance to municipal life in California. This is likely to prove important. It often happens that small cities would, like individuals, rather submit to injustice or defeat than take the hazards of litigation at their own unaided expense. If by getting together and sharing the burden the municipalities of California can the better stand for their rights the public gain should be great.

Not So Anxious Outside of Los Angeles For a New State county the anxiety of Southern California for a new state is not so keen as many might suppose. Other counties are about as jealous of Los Angeles as Los Angeles is of the bay district of California and in a new state, the sober-minded folk, who have not spoken as yet, can see little in the movement, even if consummated, except a vast addition of taxes for a new capitol, state institutions and the office hunger of Los Angeles' politicians. If Arizona could be taken in also the case would take on a more favorable appearance. Throughout Southern California in general, outside of Los Angeles, which, confessedly, has much to gain in becoming a state capital, sober-minded men are saying little about a new state and thinking much. The whole affair will blow itself out in a few weeks and Southern California will take as active an interest in next year's campaign as it did take in the last one.

Off and On the City Ballot

The Supreme Court has surprised everybody with its decision that a party may nominate anybody it pleases at the primaries, even a member of another party whom that party also nominates. The men who drafted the direct primary law undoubtedly intended to prevent this being done, and intended to compel the voters of each party to vote only for members of that party for nominees. The immediate practical results of the decision are to compel the board of election commissioners of San Francisco to put Chas. M. Fickert's name on the Union Labor ticket as well as on the Republican ticket, and to put Francis J. Heney's name on the Democratic ticket. Another result is to overturn the action of Judge Murasky in denying the petition of Fickert for a recount of the Democratic vote, this action having been taken on the presumption that the law prohibited the nomination of Fickert by the Democrats. The situation that now remains is that a recount will be ordered; if Fickert wins on the recount his name will appear as the candidate of three parties; if Heney wins, Heney will be the candidate of the Democrats and the Good Government League, and an independent candidate as well.

Some Union Labor Political Paradoxes

About the time this paper reaches our readers they may expect to see in the dailies the exposure of some of the tactics by which certain labor leaders, who are deeply interested in Fickert's campaign, attempted to coerce a union workman early this week in the brewery workers' hall on Capp Street. This union workman, now employed in San Francisco, positively identified Fickert as the man who, as a strikebreaker and under another name, got this union workman's job during the Stockton strike in 1904. These labor leaders threatened the man with prosecution for perjury and with bodily violence if he persisted in his identification. He repeated his assertion in their presence when confronted by Fickert himself. This union workman now lives in fear of death at the hands of union labor politicians for exposing the anti-union record of the union labor nominee for district attorney. This paradox of union loyalty is comparable only to the action of Thomas H. Finn, the union labor candidate for sheriff, whose newest Sunday suit of clothes was purchased by him last week from a tailor who is on the union tailors' unfair list. Of course the truth is, the union labor candidates do not represent union labor at all, but the McCarthy Political Syndicate.

A Home for Justice or The National Guard?

The special session of the legislature, that convened at the call of Governor Pardee after the San Francisco fire three-and-a-half years ago, appropriated $500,000 for the erection of a building in San Francisco to provide offices and court-rooms for the Supreme Court of California. Nothing was done to spend this money until the last session of the legislature ordered it to be used to erect an armory for the national guard. As the expenditure of the money for the armory was a "machine" measure, it is presumable that the machine concluded that it was more important to the state that the national guard should have an independent dwelling than that an independent judiciary should have an independent sanctuary of justice. The result of this conclusion is that the offices and court-room of the Supreme Court of California are now on the eighth floor of the building of the Wells Fargo company, a subsidiary corporation of the Southern Pacific company.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

Charles F. Ruggles, of Manistec, Mich., has purchased of the Big Trees Improvement Company 24,431.47 acres of timber land situated in Calaveras and Amador counties, California.

By a vote of 1469 to 565 the electors of Solano county decided to issue bonds in the sum of $250,000 for the construction of a courthouse, and, at the same time, they terminated, by a vote of 1129 to 866, not to issue $50,000 in bonds for the erection of a branch jail. The supervisors now will secure money for the jail by a direct tax.

The Healdsburg Enterprise reports sales of wine grapes at that vicinity for $14 to $16.50 a ton.

The Lankershim ranch of 48,000 acres, in the heart of San Fernando valley, near Los Angeles, has been purchased by a syndicate of that city for $2,500,000. It will be subdivided and sold in small tracts.

The Fresno Republican, which owns the building in which it is published, has purchased lots on which it will erect a building to be used as a business office.

Near Gridley, the other day, Ed Reynolds, a teamster, was crushed to death between two wagons loaded with hay.

Near Wildwood, Trinity county, Daniel Brown found a nest of rattlesnakes and killed 29 of the reptiles with a club and a crowbar. The truth of the story is vouched for by a witness who is said to be responsible.

John H. Miller, who has been with the Sacramento Union a long time, and who is widely and favorably known throughout the Sacramento valley, has accepted the position of managing editor of the Marysville Appeal.

At a distance of but 98 feet beneath the surface of the ground, on the ranch of T. A. Jordan, near New Hope, San Joaquin county, a large flow of natural gas recently was struck in boring for water. It is thought that enough gas escapes from the well to supply the city of Lodi, and there also are indications of oil.

Marysville voters have decided to issue bonds in the sum of $80,000 for the construction of new buildings for high and grammar schools.

The Palo Alto Tribune has been sold by A. P. and G. D. Williams to W. F. Crocker and Y. G. Freeman.

San Anselmo will issue bonds to the extent of $40,000 to improve roads and culverts. The proposition carried by a vote of 153 to 26.

ORIGINS OF REVERED LEGAL MAXIMS

AND HOW CHANGED CONDITIONS HAVE ALTERED THEIR AUTHORITY.

By WARREN OLNEY, SR.

I suppose all observing persons have been impressed with the natural and instinctive conservatism of the average man. This average man, by reason of his early training and the repeated statement of elementary principles relating to the conduct of human affairs, becomes saturated with traditions and rules of life and is opposed to all changes that seem to him in conflict therewith.

The treatment by our ancestors of persons accused of crime was so barbaric, from the point of view of modern civilization, that certain maxims and principles, tending to the amelioration of this barbaric treatment, came to be firmly settled as principles for the conduct of the court, and, in fact, became a part of the common law of England. The reasons for these rules and maxims have long since passed away, but your average man clings to them with the tenacity that he would if his own life or liberty were at stake.

Origin of Presumption of Innocence.

By calling your attention to the way persons accused of crime were formerly treated in England (and to some extent the same treatment has occurred in this country) you will more readily understand why certain elementary principles of the law, for example, a man is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is proved beyond a reasonable doubt, or that a man shall not give testimony against himself, came to be firmly settled in the minds of all the Anglo Saxon race. Formerly in England the prosecution of a man for an alleged crime was almost equivalent to conviction. It was equivalent to conviction unless certain of the rules of which the two above cited are samples operated in his favor. He was at the following disadvantage: He was in confinement, more or less secret, until his trial, and there were no means by which he could prepare for his defense. He had no notice before the trial of the evidence against him, and was compelled to defend himself as well as he could when the evidence was produced at the trial. He was not allowed the services of a lawyer to conduct his defense for him. At the trial there were no rules governing the admission of evidence, but everything was let in at the discretion of the judge. The witnesses were not required to confront the prisoner, nor were the originals of documentary evidence required to be produced. The confessions of accomplices were not only admitted against each other but were regarded as specially strong evidence against the prisoner. That is to say, witnesses were allowed to testify as to what the supposed accomplices had said.

Defendants Not Allowed Witnesses.

The most astonishing rule, however, enforced by our ancestors against persons accused of crime, was that they were not allowed to call witnesses in their own behalf, for example, a prisoner could not introduce testimony if he had it for the purpose of proving an alibi—that is, that he was somewhere else when the supposed crime was committed. The usual reason given was that the scriptures declared that a fact may be established by the mouth of two witnesses. Our ancestors therefore declared that if two witnesses testified on oath that a man was guilty of a crime the fact was established and no evidence could be produced to contradict it. Even after a prisoner was allowed to call witnesses, it was not considered proper to have them sworn before being examined.

In England inroads were being made upon the foregoing rules in the seventeenth century, but in Scotland it was not until 1735 that the accused was allowed to introduce evidence in defense. The reasoning in support of such a rule is so queer and so typical of the methods of thought and argument in those days that I transcribe from Hume's Commentaries (not David Hume, but another Hume), the following, premising that under the Scottish law the libel that Hume speaks of corresponds to our indictment, and the panel that he mentions to the prisoner.

"Of old," he says, "the panel was confined to a very narrow and disadvantageous field by the received maxim of the law against admitting any defense that was contrary to the averment of the libel—a maxim which sounds strange in our ears, but is taught in the writings of many foreign lawyers, and seems to have found reception formerly into the practice of other nations as well as ours. The meaning of it was this: for instance, in a case of murder, if the libel charged that the panel gave the deceased a mortal wound, of which wound he languished for some days and there died, it was in vain for the panel to allege, for he could not be allowed to prove, that in truth the man died of some other ailment. By the same rule, as little could the panel allege a casual encounter, or self-defense, or great and sudden provocation, if the libel set forth that the slaughter was done by lying in wait or on challenge to fight a single combat.

"The sort of argument, as far as I can collect it, by which our lawyers justified so strange a restriction of the panel's proof, was to this purpose, that the accused had set forth certain facts and quavered in his libel, and must establish these vain evidences before he used in his prosecution; that if he failed to prove them the panel must be acquitted, of course, for that reason only, though there were no evidence on his part at all; and that, on the other hand, if the prosecutor proved his libel, it could serve to no purpose, but to occasion perjury, to admit a contrary proof on the part of the panel, whose witnesses, if they contradicted what had already been proved by those for the prosecution, must be swearing falsely, which it was the business of the court to deny them an opportunity of doing. Quando delictum est plene probatum' (says the commentator Baldus) 'per testes affirmantes, non est admittenda contraria probatio per testes negantes.' In like manner Sir George McKenzie, 'To admit contrary probations,' says he, 'is to open a door to testimony as much to the same purpose the pleadings in cases which were actually under trial. This allegiance being direct contrair to the libel cannot be admitted. Besides that the pursuer offering to prove the libel as it stands, his probation, as it has the preference to it, cannot be reargued by a contrary proof; for seeing the law both of God and man has so far established the credit of two witnesses to hold their concurring testimony undoubtedly true, there can no proof be admitted of facts contrary to the nature of those established by their joint testimony. More especially considering that witnesses verifying a crime against a person accused thereof are less to be suspected (particularly at the instance of the public) of partiality than any that can possibly be adduced by the parties accused.' In short, the notion of a conjunct probation of the libel and defenses before the assize was thought too dangerous to be admitted; the prerogative of proving, and the choice of the witnesses, were to be given to one of the parties only; and on the evidence taken by that party the issue was entirely to depend. To mention but one instance of so notorious a point of practice: in the case of William Somerville, who was indicted for the murder of his mother" (in 1699) "a great part of the debate turns on this point—To whom should the prerogative of probation be given? Should the prosecutor be allowed to prove that the woman died of the injuries libelled, or the panel to prove that she died from other causes? The court were of the opinion for the prosecutor; the defenses were repelled, and the libel was taken to an advantage."

Another author says: "If A accused B for breaking his stable and stealing his horse such an hour of the night, the pursuer may be well admitted to prove what he hath alleged; but the defender can never be admitted to prove that he was absent at that time, for that would be contrary to the libel and therefore most uniform."

Defendant Not Allowed Counsel.

The first amelioration of the law of criminal procedure was to permit the accused to call witnesses. The next was to permit him to employ a lawyer to sit by him in court and instruct him on points of law, but the accused person had to make his own speeches to the court and jury and to examine his own witnesses and cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution. Imagine a stupid, uneducated man attempting to defend himself against suspicious circumstances with a trained prosecutor arraying the evidence against him, and with volubility and force overriding him! Even after he was allowed to bring in a lawyer to coach him in the defense, it did not matter how dull and slow of intellect the unfortunate prisoner was, the lawyer himself was not permitted to speak a word to either the court or jury on behalf of the unfortunate wretch. In the year 1760 Lord Fferrers was tried before the House of Lords. His defense was insanity, and yet his counsel, who was permitted to sit by him and coach him, was not permitted to cross-examine the prosecuting witnesses or to examine the witnesses for the defense. That had to be done by the man claiming to be insane, or not at all.

It was not until 1837 that the law of England permitted counsel to speak in court on behalf of persons accused of crime.

The last amelioration of which I shall refer has been brought about in my own time. That is to say, the prisoner is now permitted to take the witness stand in his own behalf.

It has always been the boast of the English and of their lawyers that the common law was merciful to the accused, the reason generally given being that under the English common law torture was not permitted. On the continent of Europe torture was common until about two hundred years ago.

Change in Public Attitude to Prisoner.

Is it any wonder then that certain maxims came to be thoroughly established in the law of criminal procedure? For example, that the prosecution must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt? Of course it should prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt if the defendant has no chance to call witnesses in his own behalf or to employ a trained advocate to present his defense. It becomes another matter when the accused is given every facility for proving what the real facts were and may himself go on the stand and tell his story.

Formerly, as it is still in half-civilized countries, there was no sympathy between prisoners and the public seemed rather to rejoice than otherwise in the spectacle of a man standing in the stocks, or being hung. A man in the stocks was likely to be bombarded by the populace. The feeling is just the other way now in civilized countries. There is sympathy for the unfortunate prisoner and mistreatment of him by the public is unthinkable. But with a brutal law making almost all offenses punishable with death, and a procedure that did not permit any real defense by the accused, it is any wonder that the courts required the guilt of the prisoner to be made out beyond a reasonable doubt?

Other Ancient Maxims.

Again, it is a maxim of the English common law that a man shall not be compelled to give testimony against himself. For that reason the accused could not be brought before a magistrate and examined as to the circumstances of his connection with a supposed crime. Neither could his papers be examined. Is that anything more than another illustration of an attempt on the part of courts to mitigate the brutality of the law? Again, there was a maxim that it is better for ten guilty men to escape than for one innocent man to suffer. The origin of such a maxim can probably be traced to the same feeling that brought about the other maxims above cited.

By allowing an accused person to make his defense by counsel, giving him the privilege of being sworn and testifying in his own behalf, and producing such evidence as he may have in his favor, there is scarcely a possibility of an innocent man being convicted. Such things have occurred, but are so extraordinary in character that they need not be considered in establishing general rules, or else they have occurred through perjured testimony. All men are agreed that the prevention of perjury is impossible. The wrongs inflicted by it are among those evils of life that cannot always be escaped any more than suffering from any other crime of another person.

Old Maxims Now Absurd.

Again, the maxim that every man is presumed innocent until his guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt, was very well in the times when criminal procedure was as I have stated, but at the present time is absolute nonsense, and is practically disregarded in the treatment of persons accused of crime. It is upon the presumption that a man is guilty that he is arrested and brought to trial.

A homicide may be committed in the view of many persons and there cannot be the slightest doubt who did it, but the law presumes him innocent until the jury convicts. And on the trial great use is made of the maxim by strong and magnetic men in addressing the jury. The court also is always required to instruct the jury to that effect. The only use of the maxim, therefore, at the present time is to impose upon the jury and give its members an excuse for indulging their natural sympathies for the prisoner or his family.

Therefore, considering our present state of civilization, the known and well-settled relations of the state to its individual members, the ideals that all reasonable men now have of justice and mercy, I would abolish these maxims of the law and introduce in place thereof more reasonable maxims consonant with our present institutions and our methods of allowing the prisoner to make a complete showing of his innocence, if in fact he is innocent. Then in addition, I should make some changes in the law of procedure.

Suggestions for Reform.

In the first place, when a crime has been committed and the state has caused the arrest of a person to whom the facts point as probably guilty, I should require the arresting officer immediately to take the prisoner before a judge of the superior court, or other court of record, and there have him examined as to his knowledge of the offense and the circumstances connecting him with it. The questions and answers should be taken down. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred, if the accused is innocent, his explanation or statement of the circumstances coming within his own knowledge will clear him from the charge. It is a fact, however, that in almost all cases the accused is really guilty. Notwithstanding his guilt, if he is immediately brought before a magistrate he will answer questions and try to make an explanation to show why he should not be held. He is sure then to give his case away. There should be no method by which an accused person can be forced to give any testimony, but if he refuses to answer questions or to make any explanation of the suspicious circumstances, that fact should be allowed to go to the jury upon his trial. Whether or not on this preliminary examination the prisoner should be allowed counsel I am not sure. I am inclined to think that he should be permitted, before the examination begins, to employ a lawyer. But if the fact that the witness's refusal to answer questions can be brought out on the actual trial of his case the lawyer will not advise his client to refuse to answer the questions if there is any possible way of explaining the facts so as not to convict his client of the crime. As it is now, whenever a man is arrested and gets in communication with a lawyer, that lawyer's uniform advice, instantly and always given to his client, is not to say a word. The necessity on the part of the community at large of this preliminary examination has become so pressing that the maxim that no man shall be compelled to testify against himself is broken every time a man is arrested for crime, provided the police keep him, for a day or two, or a few hours, from employing a lawyer.

Putting a prisoner through what is called the "Third Degree" has come to be common. It is unlawful, it is brutal, and yet because of the enforcement of a worn-out maxim that was very good when it originated, society winks at this brutal violation of the law.

The present law for indictment, or for filing an information by the district attorney, seems unobjectionable, except a foolish amendment that has been lately introduced by which an accused person can put the grand jury itself on trial. That is to say, he can bring the members of the grand jury before the court and question them as to their opinions, prejudices, etc., and in some cases thereby can get an acquittal set aside. This is wrong, plainly and unmistakably wrong, and should be remedied at the earliest possible moment.

Chapter XII. A PUT UP JOB.

BY virtue of securing an educational enthusiast as principal of the ambitious and growing school at Tulare, the university spirit was strong, emphasized. As already explained, a Scotchman himself, and a college man, the principal had an inherited Scotch passion for college and his one ambition in life was to prepare and send more Californian youths to the state university than any other Californian educator. This one idea was the only thing that he really cared for and it was little short of a consuming passion. Everything in the way had to stand aside for that.

Of the pupils in his school there were no others more fully imbued with the idea that a college education must be had at all hazards than Clayton Brayton and Helen Singham. They had gone through the preparatory work together, in advance of their fellows, had passed the final examinations with flying colors and were looking forward to the time when they should enter upon their university course at Berkeley.

But just here came a cloud across the horizon. The financial part was easy for Gabriel, for he was an only son of parents who were more than well to do, notwithstanding the heavy stock losses in starvation years; but the financial part was not so easy for Helen. Her father had become heavily involved in the ditch enterprise and it was going to take all his crop to square obligations he had assumed, in part for others, with Isidore Josephs & Co., and tide him through until another crop could be raised. He finally made a plain statement of the case to Helen.

There was barely a week to intervene before the closing of the school year with graduation exercises, in which Helen held the post of honor, with Gabriel ranking next, when she came to school with eyes that plainly told of weeping, and she came late. During the morning hour the following notes passed between the two:

"Hello! Helen, what's been the trouble out on the Horned Toad Ranch?"

"Gabe."

"Papa says I can't go to the university this fall unless I will sell Roanoke to get the money to go on, and you know well enough that I never will sell Roanoke in this world."

"Helen."

"Why don't you make him take you to the university then?"

"Gabe."

"He could take me there quick enough, but how could we live after we got there? It isn't every race that a little sandlapper gets in the way of and so brings in a lot of money."

"Helen."

"Take a good look at this head of mine and rest easy. Hamilton says I've got a wonderful head for everything except Latin composition. I'll take your case under advisement."

"Gabe."

Later in the day, after Gabriel had scored one or two disastrous flunks in recitation because his mind was elsewhere, the correspondence was surreptitiously resumed.

"Say, Helen, let's go into partnership. You furnish the horse, I will furnish the brains, and we'll go halves."

"Gabe."

"In that sort of a deal I should have three-fourths at least, but what is your scheme?"

"Helen."

"Thanks heartily, but there is to be a great blowout at Porterville on the Fourth, and the star event is to be a purse of $500 for a half-mile straightaway dash, $350 to winner, $150 to second horse, $50 entrance fee. Roanoke can take second money anyhow and it may be first. Dad is getting Peacock into shape already."

"Gabe."

"I don't doubt that Roanoke can beat Peacock, but I haven't any fifty dollars for the entrance fee. You must think I am a national bank."

"Helen."

"Hamilton will let me have the fifty I know, and I can make good out of the jackpot, or out of what Dad's going to let me have to go to college on. Dad is easy. But look here!

Roanoke can't win in a sidesaddle, he won't win for anybody but you, and you have got to ride boy fashion, wear a jockey suit and do the thing right. There are five weeks to make ready in. I'll do the coaching. Is it a go?"

"Dear Gabe: You are good as pie, but Papa wouldn't hear to it. He would go wild."

"Helen."

"In that case he musn't hear of it until after it is over, and then he can go as wild as he wants to and it won't hurt anything."

"Gabe."

"All right I'll go you. It is wicked, I know, but it seems to promise well."

"Helen."

About half-way between Brayton's river farm and what Gabriel playfully called the "Horned Toad" ranch, where Helen lived, was a stretch of shallow swale, waste because black alkaline, but therefore moist and admirably adapted for a race course. Willows grew along the banks so that it was well hidden from view.

To this point, as the shades of evening began to gather, came these two school fellows with their horses to train Roanoke and his rider for what was looked forward to as likely to be the supreme effort of their lives. Gabriel brought an extra racing saddle from the home barn and one of his old jockey suits that he used to wear when he was "just a kid" and not the six footer he had now become. By hanging some carriage robes he had brought over some low willows, a dressing room for Helen was made, and when she emerged therefrom, with cap covering her coils of brown hair, she was as good looking a jockey as one would wish to see.

A half mile was measured off with accuracy, the way cleared and the horse and rider put through their paces almost nightly for more than four weeks. Generally Clay Babe was the running mate, but several times, when the elder Brayton was out of the way, Peacock himself was brought out and put over. Gabriel had now become so heavy as to be a handicap for the horse, but knew him perfectly, and, after making all allowances for weight, it was plain toward the last of the training season that Roanoke was the swifter of the two by one or two good lengths in the half mile.

The job may have been a trifle questionable, but it at least possessed the merit of being well put up, and it was "for the honor of the school," as Gabriel stoutly asserted every time Helen began to be troubled with nagging. "T. H. S. must be a winner in whatever it undertook, baseball, football, track teams or what not," was the sentiment that dominated the school to such a degree as to impart some sort of movement to even the most sluggish minds.

Chapter XIII.

A RACE FOR AN EDUCATION.

The fateful day at last drew near. Gabriel contrived to have a pressing invitation come to Helen to ride over and spend the Fourth with a Porterville schoolmate, and, accordingly, she rode over the day before, bringing along the necessary effects in his father's road wagon. Helen's school friend chanced to live close to the race grounds, so it was no trouble for her to slip away from view as a rollicking, winsome girl of sixteen to emerge from her room a few moments afterward an up-to-date jockey that the sand-lappers had imported from San Francisco, a conjecture that Gabriel had slyly offered in his father's hearing, to make Roanoke "do up" Peacock.

Of Roanoke the elder Brayton had small fear, but he had reason to suspect that Fresno had worked in a "ringer" from Ingleside to snatch the championship of the valley from Peacock, who had held it so long. While he still had faith in Peacock's ability to beat "even the ringer," he was not disposed to allow that faith to cost him any considerable sum of money, but as to Roanoke he was reckless.

This was what Gabriel had counted on, and he had not allowed any scruples which Helen might entertain to dissuade him from taking full advantage of it. "If Dad wins from me," he said, "I'll make a clean breast of it, and make him 'cough up,' but if I win from him, and use the money to help Helen through the University, she'll only be getting what her father would have been able to give her if Dad hadn't hogged the water of the river. So here goes."

Gabriel had no trouble in getting the fifty dollars from Professor Hamilton, the principal of the school, for Roanoke's entrance fee, when the situation was explained to him in confidence, or to get another fifty for speculative purposes. This, with a little more than fifty dollars that he had saved from his allowance, and borrowed from his mother, financed him very well.

All he needed then was a confederate and him he found in Blythe Holland, an adult friend in town, who was ready for any lark that promised to discomfort some one else. So it happened that Moses Brayton, for the purpose of hedging against the supposed "ringer," was bantering right and left at odds of two, then three, and, when there were no takers, finally four to one, that Peacock would be the handsome one. At this point Gabriel gave Blythe Holland the wink, and he, much to the astonishment of bystanders, planked down five twenties and there was nothing for it but Moses Brayton must cover them four deep. He squirmed a little but came down with the cash.

Roanoke was now six years old, slightly under fifteen hands high. His sire was a Kentucky thoroughbred with an admirable record. His dam was a mustang, but the swiftest quarter horse of her time. He was what horsemen call a "one man" horse, perfectly tractable in Helen's hands, but whimsical as a spoiled child in other custody. For this reason he had been exempt from team work and had been given over to Helen, because, as a colt, she had learned to master him with tireless kindness. His mustang blood had sloped his hips and flattened his flanks, but his chest was deep, his back finely arched, his skin thin as kid, hair soft as velvet, and his veins stood out round as whipsnips. He was not a handsome horse to look upon except when in action, but anyone could see that he was a fighting, lively and true-winded racing spirit. He had been carefully fed under Gabriel's directions and was in the pink of condition.

There were six horses in the field for the star performance, and of them all Peacock was by far the most striking, for supposed "ringer" the least conspicuous. Blythe Holland represented Helen in the preliminaries, so that she could keep out of the way as much as possible.

The race course was across an open grass field two hundred or three hundred yards wide and a measured half mile long, terminating at a broad, bare roadway; it was inclined a little upward, had been closely cropped and made free from obstacles. Along this line on both sides were ranged hundreds of spectators. Helen had gotten her horse out early and had known it perfectly and knew, too, what it all meant, yet without exciting him to a pitch of nervousness.

In the selection of positions Roanoke's place fell between Peacock on the outside and the "ringer" from Fresno, but the track being wide, was not crowded. It was the final event and was to take place between sundown and dusk when the heat of the day had somewhat diminished. The course was away from the sun.

The excitement was intense, the dust from the other races had settled, and, at last, all was ready. There was some jockeying over starting, but Helen held her own and had especially drilled Roanoke in starting as though shot out of a gun, so that Peacock's rider had no chance to block her way as Moses Brayton had instructed him to do, for, when it was too late, he began to realize that his bid offered greater odds than might prove prudent. He more than half expected the "ringer" to win, and his anxiety was to defeat the "sandlapper" horse at all hazards.

Time was called, the horses went to their places, Gabriel was seen to dash swiftly toward Roanoke and his rider on their way to the starting point, but he was not heard to whisper, "For the university, old girl, for the university. Never mind Peacock, but beat the 'ringer' on your left. For the honor of 'T. H. S.'"

The pistol shot was fired, and, true to instructions, Peacock's rider made a dash to the left to head Roanoke off, but when he got there Roanoke was a full length ahead and hugging the "ringer" nose to flank. At the quarter he had gained nose to neck, at half way they were neck and neck and not two yards asunder, at three quarters Roanoke was a good neck in advance and then came the supreme effort. The "ringer's" rider applied the whip like tongues of fire. Not so with the rider of Roanoke, who was seen to lean forward as if about to climb out to the horses ears and to spat his ride neck sharply while a girlish voice called "yipe, yipe, yipe," in a half whisper. The effect was magical. Spectators declared that the horse's belly did not seem to be a foot from the ground and that it did not take more than six or eight leaps to clear the last eighth of a mile.

Peacock's rider bounded over the goal two lengths ahead of the "ringer" and not less than three in advance of Peacock, with the other horses in hot pursuit.

The cheering of the "sandlappers" was prolonged and loud, but it was nothing to what it was a few moments later when in circling around to return to the judge's stand Helen ran too closely under a tree, so that a projecting branch caught off her cap and brought her hair down about her shoulders, and the people saw that the "sandlapper's" imported foreign was a slim girl graduate from Tulare High School. Up to that moment no one had recognized her, but when at last they did, and remembered that it was she who lost a race but won a life three years before, they cheered her by volleys again and yet again.

This was Moses Brayton's last race. The defeat of Peacock by the "sandlapper" horse so soured him on racing that he turned the horse out to pasture in disgust, and would have consigned him to service among the vaquero bronchos had not Gabriel begged hard for his possession in place of Clay Bahe, who would make a better cattle horse anyhow.

And so it was that Helen Singham, as well as Gabriel Brayton, went to the university at the opening of the fall semester, and when they went Gabriel went on horseback riding Peacock and leading Roanoke.

The case was some time in coming to it up with Papa Singham, but there is nothing that succeeds like success. As for Gabriel's part in the losses sustained by "Dad" Brayton, the time did not appear to be propitious for explanations. "Anyhow," Gabriel protested, "it is all in the family, and considering the residuary interests I have in the Brayton estate, it was my duty to safeguard it from being betted on the wrong horse."

Chapter XIV.

THE LAW, THE FACT AND THE JAIL.
Silas Singham was never accused, even by his enemies, of being a pig-headed man. In summer he wore a high pith helmet as he explained, that the blistering sun might not bake his brains into that condition of dreamy listlessness which too often comes to characterize people of the plains. He kept his mind well in control of his will and thought things rather than speculated about them or dreamed over them.

His favorite roost, when the sun had sunk behind the Diablo range, and the dust of the day had begun to settle like a thin film of mist over the landscape, was the platform of his windmill tower, high enough above the ground to afford a clear outlook reaching to the straggling lines of oaks that marked the winter watercourse. Sitting restfully there alone in the gathering twilight, just out of reach of the sweep of the fans of the mill, he rested his body but employed his mind to such productive advantage as made him the leader of thought and action of the community life. There it was that he thought hard problems out and made stern resolves regarding future policies.

As sooner had the fourth crop season been brought to a close, and the men and animals been given a month's rest, than Silas Singham warned all out to take a hand in deepening the mouth of Enterprise canal so that no dam would be required in order to divert water into it whenever there should be more than enough water in the river to reach through the river settlement for the old ditches and for stock watering purposes. It was heavy work, but a six weeks' campaign saw it brought to a conclusion and the old channel so cleared of debris that it would carry double the quantity of water it had carried the year before.

This done, all the men returned to their homes to construct ditching ditches on their own lands and check them up with little levelers around the edges of convenient squares, or contours following a common line of level, so that they might sow alfalfa seed as soon as the rains came. Some planned orchards and others vineyards, and all were resolved to have water if it were in the river beyond the meanders of the river and in water for their stock and for the filling of such ditches as they had already created. As for the usufruct of seepage and natural flooding—that was so prodigal of water that its exercise meant that the plains should be uninhabitable forever, and that was to be resisted to the uttermost.

But the river people were not sleeping on their rights. They had taken out the last vestige of the dam that had been built across the river the season before and had dumped the debris into the mouth of Enterprise ditch so as effectually to preclude the taking of any water into it, and no sooner had the plains people reached the removal of that material than they were enjoined by the river people from touching it.

John Middleton, the attorney for the plains people, had studied the problem good and hard, and step by step, Silas Singham had kept pace with him. They had prepared for what they knew must come. They knew that the Common Law of England had been made applicable wherever there was no statute covering an issue, and that the riparian doctrine strictly applied meant no irrigation whatever.

But there was this reservation: By the Common Law itself, when the reason for the law failed the law failed. John Middleton and Silas Singham affirmed that in an arid country the reason for the application of the riparian law had failed, and therefore such was not the law. As a second string to their bow they held that the old slough which carried water to the Enterprise neighborhood, had been the choking of its mouth in the great flood of 1862, was a natural water course and that those holding lands on any one of its branches were riparian owners as certainly as those owning land upon the main river.

The contest was long and bitter. The array of legal talent was large. The case lasted in the court until the rains had come and the water had risen in the river sufficiently high, but for the debris at the canal's mouth, to enable Enterprise neighborhood to irrigate its riparian alfalfa lands.

Then came the decision. The court held that the riparian law of England was a part of the law of California, that those who were first in time were first in right, that the settlers along the river had acquired a beneficial interest in the waters of the river, and that they had a right under the law to have the full flow of the river pass by their lands, even to the last man on the stream, undiminished in quantity and unpolluted in quality; that the only adverse claim that could stand against them was a claim by appropriation for a beneficial purpose, under an original claim of right, that had been adversely as well as successfully maintained for five years.

As to surplus water, which the defendants claimed the benefit of, the court held that there was no such thing as surplus water until the riparian owners had had their lands surfeited with seepage and overflowed with flood waters, as they had been theretofore, usually and normally, such as by the ordinary spring rises of the river. If however there should be extraordinary and unusual freshets, the excess might be regarded as surplusage and made available for defendants' use during the period while such excess continued. Therefore the injunction was made perpetual and defendants were restrained from removing the debris from the head of the slough, which the court held not to be a riparian stream and to all intents an irrigation canal.

That night the judge rendering the decision was burned in effigy at Tulare, and that night Silas Singham planted charges of dynamite in the debris at the mouth of the canal in defiance of the court's order and blew the whole mass out to such an extent that the water burst through and carried the rest of the debris away with it.

The court at once issued a bench warrant for his arrest and brought him into court on a charge of contempt. He had taken this action without consultation with his attorney or anyone else, and so stood at the bar of justice to confront his fate as best he might.

The judge was stern. He had been deeply wounded by his burning in effigy and the defiance of the prisoner at the bar. The court admonished the prisoner with great severity, but, before passing sentence, demanded to know what he had to plead in extenuation of his offense.

The courtroom was crowded to suffocation. The "King of the Sandlappers," as he had often been designated, stood in the presence of the court unabashed, resolute, even defiant, yet self-possessed. As he drew himself to full height, his blue eyes gleamed wide upon his breast, his blue eyes steady and clear, he commanded the unconscious admiration even of Moses Brayton, in whose name the proceedings had been instituted. As for the thronged courtroom of partisans, they were breathless and eager.

"Your honor," Silas Singham began, "men ought always to obey God rather than man. Nature's laws are God's laws, and as a God-fearing man I strive without ceasing to obey the laws of nature as they are revealed to me through my searchings after truth. Up on yonder mountains are engraved in the form of snow that fluid without which this great, broad and naturally fertile valley is a desert place, save where here and there a narrow channel, flanked with low lands, meanders through it to the trough of that valley. In that storeroom there are enough in store for all if rightly used. With my little windmill out on the plains, with its trickling stream of water, I have grown such roses as were not excelled save in Sharon, such grapes as grew nowhere save in Eschol. This teaches me what those plains may become when the waters that are now wasted are husbanded and turned out upon them to fructify them."

"Your Honor has laid down the law as you believe you have found it in books. I lay down the fact as I find it in nature. Where nature, ordained of God, has established a fact, and men in the purity of their wisdom, have set up laws to controvert the fact, which, think you, should a God-fearing man, concerned only for the wellbeing of his people, render obedience to? The water that these riparian owners have a right to run to waste, they may be saved the necessity of putting their lands under ditches, as we have ditched our lands, turned out there, as we have turned it on those incompatible plains, will support a hundred people on the plains to one person on the river.

"It is true, Your Honor, that we came later than the first settlers, but after we were there to be countless generations born, and shall they, because they come late into the world, have no right to live? Shall the bounties of nature be sequestered out of their hands? With all deference to Your Honor's learning, I declare here and now that you have laid down the law, and the law can not and must not be the law, and if I spend half of the rest of my life in jail for contempt of court I shall dedicate my days of freedom to the overthrow of a law that yields to the coyote and the jackrabbit as fair a heritage as the Garden of Eden. Your Honor will remember that God put a river in the Garden of Eden to water that garden, and not that the last man on the stream might see it flow idly by.

"Your Honor, I blew that dam out of the mouth of our canal, not that I might show disrespect to this court, but that my neighbors and friends might make for themselves homes in the land that the Lord their God has given them. Even now those waters are being drunk by the thirsty earth and next spring those plains will be green in consequence. Next summer, wherever those waters go, those farms will be opulent with promise; next fall they will be rich in the fruits of a virgin soil, and the complainants here will not be harmed to the extent of one farthing, for, if they will apply to their lands the industry that we apply to ours, there will be enough water for all, and industry is not ignoble.

"In full consciousness of the rectitude of my own conduct, without extenuation or promise as to the future, I submit myself to your august will, but I know what is right, and I will do the right as often as I may have the liberty and power to do it."

The Judge, smarting under the indignity of disobedience to his mandates, yet in heart admiring the candor and courage of the prisoner at the bar, and who has just indicated the law as he found it, and sentenced the prisoner to thirty days in the county jail. During that thirty days the prepared lands of Silas Singham were watered and planted, and during the enforced retirement he thought out a plan for turning the tables on the river men. (To Be Continued.)

controversy there is no reason why he should be permitted the unlimited right to challenge individual jurors that is now in vogue in this country. It is a practice practically unknown in England though the legal right there exists. It is, I believe, unknown in other countries. Ordinary intelligence, the reading of the newspapers, even the expression of an opinion derived from reading newspapers, should not disqualify a man for a juror. A certain number of peremptory challenges should be allowed both for prisoner and prosecution, but challenges for cause should be limited to very few.

I will consider now for a few minutes a marked difference between the law governing the conduct of the judge that obtains in the different states of the Union from what obtains in England and in the United States courts. Our statute expressly prohibits the judge from expressing any opinion on facts that may be developed at the trial. The American practice imposed on the judge by law is responsible for more acquittals for murder and other crimes than any other one cause. The province of judging of questions of fact is given entirely to the jury and the judge is only permitted to instruct them upon matters of law. In England the judges are men of great experience, and as trial lawyers. They are thoroughly accustomed to sift evidence, and are expected to guide and direct the jury. The judge is therefore at liberty, and in actual practice does make it a rule in charging the jury to point out the matters really in issue and sum up the evidence in support of the different propositions. The language of the English authorities is that the judge "sums up the case to the jury." The language of our law and authorities is, "the judge charges the jury." In England the judge sums up the whole case, arranges the evidence, elucidates it, and, if necessary, disentangles the salient features that have been obscured by ingenious and eloquent counsel. With us the judge is forbidden in the state courts to do this very thing which by his learning, his training and his ability he ought to be able to do better than anyone else. It is for that reason that the English jury convict and our American juries acquit if there is a strong magnetic counsel to defend the prisoner. He appeals to sentiment, to sympathy, to ridicule, to abuse even, and diverts the attention of the jury from the real matter at issue between the people and his client.

It would seem that our legislatures are afraid of the judges, or else the rule would not be so universal that the judge shall not sum up the case to the jury. It would, no doubt, be asking a vain thing to require many of our judges to sum up the case to the jury. They could not properly do it. But to require it would, I think, help to keep incompetents from the bench and to improve the judiciary. There is not time to go further into the possible improvement by legislation and public sentiment of judicial proceedings.

I therefore close by repeating a truism that may be even a platitude: that there is no discourager of crime, or even of ordinary litigation, like the swift and sure administration of justice. The American people should respectfully face toward the gods of justice until all men are really and truly equal before the law, and weak or wicked men know that crime will not go unpunished, and the unjust man will know that the law will protect his victim.

slight knock near the forest, where he pronounced his soliloquy, and we hear Banquo exclaim: "Look, how our partner's rap!" Macbeth slowly descends, and the cortege disappears in the shade.

We are next led to the vast stone-floored room in the abbey, where we find Lady Macbeth in her husband's study. The messenger announces the forthcoming visit of King Duncan. Macbeth enters. The famous scene is admirably arranged before a Norman window, through which streamed the white rays of the moon. The arrival of Duncan before Macbeth's castle and his reception in the court of honor were highly effective. The royal cortege, with torch-bearers, appeared in the distance and approached by a circular path. Macbeth met Duncan at the keep and conducted him to the great stairway, a feat of which he was welcomed by Lady Macbeth.

In a court where Lady Macbeth persuades her husband to murder Duncan one sees through the windows the brilliantly lighted banquet table. When Macbeth and Lady Macbeth ascend the steps to enter the hall one feels that Duncan's fate is settled. The dagger scene passes in the large hall of the ancient refectory. Macbeth then enters a corridor into which opens the door of Duncan's bed chamber. When Macbeth comes out of Duncan's apartment after having committed the murder he is met by Lady Macbeth in a courtyard. The scene of the drunken porter takes place in a long gallery running along three walls leading to a gate. This is appropriate, owing to the length of the monologue pronounced by the porter as he walks tipsily along to open the gate to Macbeth and Lennox. The tumult in the castle when the inmates are aroused by the cries of Macduff, Lennox and Macbeth, apprising them of the murder, is terrific. The supper scene, where Macbeth, returning to his chair—which he left temporarily to receive the report of Banquo's assassin—finds it occupied by the ghost of Banquo, was the weakest point of the performance, and verged upon the grotesque. On the other hand, the scene where Macbeth consults the witches is thoroughly Shakespearean. The spectators, grouped in a high, open gallery between North and South walls, look down into an ancient cloister, which by night has all the appearance of a cavern. The "secret, black and midnight hags" hobble about upon the grass around a huge boiling cauldron. Mystic, tomb-like gates open and reveal to Macbeth the series of frightful visions, while in another high gallery beneath open arches one sees the procession of Banquo's descendants as kings in their coronation robes, emblems and crowns. Lady Macbeth's monologue while walking in her sleep is spoken in an enormous hall, in which is a long gallery, high up and encompassing three walls. She enters, grasping the flickering night taper, and utters the soliloquy as she proceeds slowly, passing along the gallery, descending the stairway and finally disappearing through a concealed door. This arrangement is most impressive.

SOME FACTS ABOUT ENGLAND.

The English Local Government Board has issued a report which contains data that may be interesting, and even surprising, to some readers. For example is it not rather surprising, as well as interesting, to learn that more than three-fourths of the people of the mother country—of some of us—live in towns? Yet such is the fact. A little more than a half-century ago (in 1851, to be exact) the population was almost equally divided between town and country, but, since then Darcy has concluded that he could do better in the city, and consequently has moved thither, frequently not to his betterment, either. Having moved to the city, and still holding it desirable to live, Joan, in numerous instances, has found it necessary to go to work for such wage as she could earn, and as a consequence, of every 100 women and girls in that country, 32 now are engaged in earning, or attempting to earn, their own living. This does not include those engaged in housekeeping, for it apparently is a theory of all census statisticians that housekeeping is not work. Of every thousand people 221 receive poor relief, a decided improvement over the condition in 1850, when 56.5 in every thousand received such assistance.

The New Constitution and the Courts.

The judicial system provided for California by the constitution of 1849 was simple. It consisted in a supreme court having a chief justice and two associate justices, a system of district courts, the districts to be fixed from time to time by the legislature, and a county court in each county. The judge of the latter court was to be the probate judge and, sitting with two justices of the peace, the county court constituted a court of sessions with power to try minor criminal cases and a large number of civic cases. If California had been as peaceful, and as little litigious, as many of the states of the East and Middle West this judicial system would have sufficed until our time.

But the development of mining required the evolution of a new code of mining laws for the civil and the courts soon became clogged with business they could not transact. Therefore, in 1862, the constitution was amended and the supreme court enlarged to a chief justice and four associate justices. Fourteen judicial districts were provided in the state while the county courts had their jurisdictions considerably enlarged.

Nevertheless the makers of the new constitution found the judicial system of the state in bad shape. The courts were far behind in their work, delays were interminable and great dissatisfaction prevailed among the people. The bars to the bar had been let down low and the legal profession had become filled with shysters who used the law for the defeat of the law and with impunity. An effort had been made to make the courts non-partisan by electing the judges at special elections, but the system had proven costly, the people revolted against it and it had to be given up.

The makers of the New Constitution undertook to relieve conditions first, by enlarging the supreme court to a chief justice and six associates, and the court was authorized to sit in two departments and also in bank. It was thought that the court, through this device, should be able to do nearly double the work that the court had done when allowed to sit in bank only, in bank meaning together in one court.

To encourage this and all other courts to attend strictly to business the constitution provided that no one of the judges should be permitted to draw his monthly salary unless he could make affidavit to the fact that no case that had been submitted to him for decision for ninety days remained undecided. This spurred the judges to fuller activity, but judges and justices have seldom gone without their salaries while very many causes have gone longer than ninety days undecided. By occasional relieving, and other devices, the constitution has been side-stepped and delays in the administration of justice have almost constantly taken place.

Later the legislature came to the aid of the supreme court and authorized supreme court commissioners to help determine cases, their decisions being reviewed by the supreme justices themselves, but in 1904, the people adopted a constitutional amendment creating three district courts of appeal to stand between the superior courts and the supreme court. Since then the appellate business has kept fairly abreast with the requirements of litigants.

The New Constitution abolished the old district courts and the old county courts and established in their places our superior courts, one for each county (with as many judgeships in each county as judicial politicians can make shift to have created), these courts having about the same jurisdictions as the former district courts.

Those who follow the editorials, and special articles, published from time to time elsewhere in this paper will find the limitations of our existing judicial system fully explained. The purpose of this lesson is merely to show what changes in framework the new constitution made for the administration of justice and to point out that the so-called reform movement of thirty years ago not only made no attempt to cripple the courts or handicap them, but gave them all they wanted in the way of enlarged facilities and longer terms of office in the hope that the administration of justice might be facilitated. California has not had more of justice than other commonwealths, but it has been wonderfully prolific in litigation. Men go to law "at the drop of the hat," as the saying is, and the expensiveness of litigation does not appear to deter men from going to law.

Another prolific source of litigation has been the use of water for irrigation. It has sometimes been said that more has been expended in litigation over water for irrigation than for irrigation works for the handling of the water, and this statement may not be far wrong. It might be added that delay and the uncertainty as to water rights, hindering enterprise, have been more costly to the state than either the construction of irrigation works or the litigation over conflicting water rights.

California has produced its full quota of able lawyers, but its judges have, in the main, been small men, men of cramped minds and not always free from political influences of the most baneful quality, while the bar has made up in numbers what it has lacked in ability and worthy ideals. All who give heed to the subject of justice appreciate the need for raising the standard of admission to both bar and bench and especially the character, emoluments and permanency of the bench to the point where judicial positions will be sought by men with minds and characters of first quality.

The New Constitution, and amendments to it since adopted, have not helped in this respect. The effort has been to have courts and judges enough to do the business without much regard to having the quality improved. The need of our time is to have better judges rather than more of them and a standard of admission to the bar that will shut half-baked shysters out of the legal profession.

A GERMAN'S VIEW.

In a book entitled "Germany and England" which has just been published in Berlin the author, Herr Bleibtreu, tells his countrymen his idea of the English.

In regard to English literature some of his opinions are as follows: "We consider Mrs. Humphry Ward to be the most important and even the most manly of modern English novelists." Charles Dickens, whose "Tale of Two Cities" is "the best composed work" that he wrote, is "the most inartistic of all British novelists," while Thackeray is "the greatest of all novelists." In respect of modern drama, "the distressing circumstance that the incredibly clumsy striver for effect Hall Caine, whose novels believe nothing but theatricality, should have achieved triumphs on the stage testifies to the taste of the British public."

The Mayoralty Issue.

In brief the case stands thus:
The candidacy of H. H. McCarthy for mayor of San Francisco is founded upon the government of the whole by a class, and if McCarthy were the most exemplary candidate in the world (which he is not) he ought not to be elected for that reason. The movement for which he stands is wrong in principle and has proven abominable in practice.

The influences that brought Mr. William Crocker to the front, and forced his nomination upon the Republican party with Democratic and tenderloin votes are the most objectionable in our civic life, at this time, and, while Mr. Crocker has openly confessed as much, and has sought the aid of reputable Republicans and made them many promises, small reliance is to be placed upon professions made to the better element when there is no intent, or expectation, of breaking with the worse. Besides, the platform upon which Mr. Crocker stands is woefully unsatisfactory.

The platform upon which Dr. Leland is making his campaign is exemplary. It has the right ring to it. If the administration by Leland could be counted on as living up to that platform there would rest upon every citizen of character the moral obligation to vote the Democratic ticket regardless of party; but alas for platforms! The real platform upon which Dr. Leland stands is Gavin McNab. While the platform is for the graft prosecution Gavin McNab is against it and will fight it. The only saving grace of the McNab brand of politics is that his candidates are, as a rule, money-honest. That cannot be said of all the candidates on the other tickets.

Indications are that conservative, safe and sane citizens, without much regard to party, will support the Democratic ticket, not because it is Democratic and not because of its platform, but because it is more likely than either of the others to prove money-honest, a low type of honesty, to be sure, but better than none.

As for The California Weekly, it is incapable of enthusiasm on behalf of any one of the mayoralty candidates. The situation that does exist ought not to exist. That it does is an indictment of the so-called better element in San Francisco public life. It has been inefficient and the best men have been wanting in civic unselfishness. But the best, and not the worst, should be made of a bad situation and that best appears to be in the direction of supporting Leland and a carefully selected board of supervisors.

The pivot of the whole campaign is, of course, the election of Mr. Heney to be district attorney. That is the only moral issue involved, the only candidacy that appeals to the imaginations and the consciences of men. On its decision upon that issue will San Francisco be estimated by the world.

The Payne tariff law handed the Southern Pacific company a lemon, but it was a good lemon and hadn't been "squeezed." That corporation, and its allies, will squeeze 15 per cent. out of it now and the rest later. The growers will get the rind.

(FOURTH ARTICLE.)

By G. W. Dickie

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

He Uttered Not a Word.

With regret it becomes the duty of The California Weekly to chronicle the fact that the President of the United States came to San Francisco and went away again without letting drop so much as one public word which indicated that he knew that there is going on here a struggle for justice such as this continent has seldom seen, a struggle fraught with greater results than are likely to flow from conservation, ship-subsidy, the Panama canal, coast artillery or what not. For, without justice, even-handed justice, justice meted out to rich and poor alike, we have no civilization worthy of the name. It is impossible to conceive of Theodore Roosevelt so coming and going and giving no sign of interest in such a struggle. Yet it is that very issue that our President professes to hold nearest his heart. He has made to the whole world the most damaging confession ever made by the head of any nation—the confession that, in his country, the attempt to administer justice is a disgrace to civilization.

William Howard Taft is an enigma. Great and good and, in many situations, resolute to resist evil, always above personal reproach, for all of his disturbing them the consciences of the American people may slumber as sweetly as he slumbers when he has returned from the golf links. The imaginations of the American people are not likely to be quickened into action through him. With serenity of mind and comfort of body he will sit at the wheel of the ship of state, keep her on an even keel and nose to the storm. His counsels will be wise and his conduct prudent, but if this nation be exalted with righteousness during his administration it will be a negative and not a positive righteousness that will exalt it. It will be a refraining from evil rather than the accomplishing of aggressive good at the cost of being disagreeable.

Here was an opportunity to strike a blow that would be felt from ocean to ocean. It would have stung in every counting room where a crass materialism is seeking gain at the cost of debauching public morals and debasing manhood. If our system of administering justice is, as the President has said, a disgrace to our civilization, so our governing of municipalities is the ignominy of the world. And our President, having an opportunity thrust under his very nose to strike one blow for equality before the law, and another for the municipal regeneration of American municipalities, suffered that opportunity to pass by unnoticed.

We are sorry, sorry on behalf of the cause of justice, sorry on behalf of a suffering San Francisco and, as much as from any other cause, sorry on account of the President, himself, whose failure to strike a blow that would have counted will persuade many to believe that his righteousness is not of a militant type and that even his love for justice may be exceeded by his love for urbanity and ease.

Our Joshing Governor.

Certain ladies interested in securing the ballot for their sex affirm that, at Santa Cruz, during the holding of the convention of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company for the nomination of state officers to be voted for by Republicans, one James N. Gillett introduced himself to them and then and there declared his belief in equal suffrage and gave his pledge that, in the event of his nomination and election to the office of governor, he would do all he could to advance their cause. The governor now declares that he has no recollection of any such occurrence; that he was not then, and is not now, in favor of equal suffrage for both sexes, and that if he did say any such thing he was joshing. If the ladies say that he said such a thing he said it. While it may not have been possible in the multiplicity of pledges which he passed out on his right hand and on his left on that occasion, for the governor to recall with certainty that particular pledge of faith, it would be wholly impossible for the ladies to whom the pledge was made to forget it. But our governor really is a heavy josh. He was joshing when he told these ladies that he was on their side and he was joshing when he went up and down the state telling the people that he was "no man's man," and beholden to no interest but that of the public. The trouble with a constitutional josh is that he sometimes makes it difficult for the "joshes" to tell whether he is joshing or only doing the delinquent school boy act. Our suffragist friends are not blameworthy if, to this day, they find themselves unable clearly to define just what it was that took place at Santa Cruz.

What the President is really doing on his 13,000-mile itinerary is to practice, on the public, in speeches, what he proposes later to try on Congress in his message. The device is sagacious. If he gets the public backing that he hopes for he will return to the executive mansion with an avalanche in his wake whose beetling altitudes statesmen will scan with concern before they shake the fist of defiance in its face, the more especially as it is not unlikely to follow them right on into their campaign for reelection.

WHO OWNS ELECTRICITY?

With the development of electrical energy and its transmission to consumers some very interesting legal problems are certain to develop and there is no certainty that, in their adjustment, an answer will not have to be forthcoming to the query propounded at the head of this article.

No one knows just what electrical energy is, but we do know that it is and that it is enormously important to industrial life. The invisible world appears to be surcharged with it and when anyone generates it and brings it within definite control, is it absolutely his property?

If any second party were to tap a transmission line and avail himself of an electric current that some other person had generated he would find himself chargeable with larceny, but suppose that a company supplies power to a factory at an agreed price and then, because of pique, whim or desire to freeze out one concern to the advantage of another, should refuse longer to supply such power to that customer, then what?

Or suppose that a land owner plant an orchard and, after establishing a pumping plant for its irrigation in conformity with an agreement with a power company as to electric energy with which to run his pump, the power company refuses longer to supply him with power, what recourse will he have?

The theory upon which water is distributed to consumers through public service corporations is that, "The waters of the state are, and by right ought to be, the property of the people of the state," and any public service corporation that undertakes to supply water does it as a common carrier employed at a reasonable price to fetch the people's water from where it is to where it is needed for use. Will electricity be supplied to consumers on the same hypothesis, that it is the people's electricity and the public service corporation is merely employed to gather it up and transmit it as common carrier from where it is to where it is wanted?

The user of water finally gets an easement in the water he uses and it cannot be taken away from him, so long as he pays the price stipulated or fixed by the public body empowered to fix the price. Will the consumer of electric energy acquire a similar easement in a similar way?

The President, at San Francisco, affirmed an intention on the part of his administration to so adjust the government's relation to power enterprises as to prevent extortionate charges and the monopolization of power privilege to the consumer's hurt. This is sound and, moreover, it is a forward step, for, at the present, the government has nothing in its contracts with power companies placing any limits upon the charges of power companies. The only saving clause is one authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to annul a franchise if he thinks the public good requires such an annulment. Another eventual limitation is the termination of all franchises at the expiration of fifty years. But is it the government's electricity any more than it is the state's or an individual's?

Some of these queries may be academic, but of this we may be sure, wherever a franchise of any kind has to be granted as a condition precedent to generating, transmitting and selling electrical energy, control of some sort, from some source, will be imposed in the public interest and for the promotion of continuity of use as well as for fixing prices which may be charged. Property rights in sources of electrical supply, to be held in perpetuity, will be looked upon as in contravention of public policy.

BOW DOWN TO HAMAN.

Haman was rich. Haman had, through his riches, risen to the first station of power below the king. The people were commanded to bow down to him and they have been doing obeisance to Haman, personifying the power of money in governmental affairs, from that day to this. Few bend the neck willingly. None do so with love. Many render homage to Haman through hope of receiving some largess at his hand, but many more through fear of provoking his wrath and having visited upon them the crushing weight of his vindictive displeasure.

We are commanded here, in San Francisco, to-day, and every day, to "Bow down to Haman." We are told that they all do it, not only in this city but in other cities of America, likewise on the continent of Europe—everywhere money rules and Haman is being bowed down to in submissive, if hateful, adoration.

We are told that if we resist the power of Haman we shall disclose to the world our own infamy while other and wiser cities conceal theirs, gloss the thing over and, though they lose their self respect, they will be able to maintain a fairly decent counterfeit of it and so get on while we, of San Francisco, if we refuse to bend the neck as did Mordecai, shall, like him, find ourselves rending our garments and sitting in sackcloth with ashes on our inglorious heads.

But they hanged Haman fifty cubits high! And they did it because Mordecai had the courage to refuse to bend the neck. And when he was once hanged there was none so mean as to bow down to him, no, not one.

So will it be with the Hamans of our day when once they have been resisted and brought to the end of their tether. It is true that Hamans who are known to have been debauchers of official honor, hirers of the malign services of a prostituted press, have not lost social caste in so-called more exclusive social circles. The affront was done the President of having Hamans invited to sit at the same table with him in San Francisco and they sat there. As long as Haman is in the saddle there are those who will bow down to him.

But to the Haman at the end of his rope no one bows, and neither do exclusive social circles nor public function committees put upon their invitation lists men clad in stripes, men who eat out of patty tins, men who walk in the lock-step, are stripped to the buff to have their every physical peculiarity noted and their thumbs and fingers taken in the hands of another and rolled on a pad of ink and then on a pad of paper for purposes of future identification. That breaks the charmed spell. After that there are no more banquets to be attended in evening dress with broad expanse of white bosom and gems gleaming. No Haman who ever went through the ordeal of matriculation in a state prison was ever after bowed down to, no, not one.

It is a cruel business, this vindication of the law. To one with the sensibilities of a Whittaker Wright it is more awful than death, for it is a living death until death; but it is as necessary as it is awful. Society has no other way of protecting itself from its Hamans, no other way of laying egregious sin bare to the bone, making it so repulsive that not all the advantages of affluence can tempt a man in his senses to venture the hazard of so dire a misfortune.

With the low-browed criminal, the sort of criminal we do commonly punish, it is different. He commits his crime first and reflects upon it afterward. Not so with the Hamans who have lived, and yet live, that men may bow down to them. They are in the possession of their senses. They think the crime out first in all its bearings and, if they dare, they make criminality of certain intelligent forms their settled business policy. They count the cost and commit the crime because they have reduced the chance of punishment to a minimum. They venture the hazard in the belief that it will be more profitable than sending argosies over seas.

The supreme need is for more Mordecais, stiff necked, resolute, preferring death to submission to any Haman, to refuse to bow down. Bowing down is ignoble, immoral, unpatriotic, slavish, unnecessary to any people daring to be free. For, let it never be forgotten, Haman, in spite of all his pomp and power, was hanged fifty cubits high. It seemed impossible, but it was done.

IS TAFT A PROGRESSIVE REPUBLICAN?

The President has now gone far enough, and made speeches enough, to make it fairly evident where he stands on economic issues of importance.

At Boston he stood for a central, national bank of discount through which the finances of the government may mainly be transacted. While this harks back to before Jackson's time, and will have the support of the "interests," it would be almost revolutionarily progressive as an administration policy.

At Chicago he spoke strongly upon the administration of justice and favored a congressional commission that the subject may be gone into thoroughly and needed reforms inaugurated. He also spoke of remedial legislation of a moderately progressive character as to the abuse of the power of injunction. His Chicago address was progressive.

At Winona, Minnesota, he spoke of the tariff, the most unsatisfactory address he has made since he left home, but even in that address he stood for a tariff commission and promised to crowd upon the little, half-equipped schedule commission grudgingly given him as many of the functions of a genuine tariff commission as possible. On the whole even this speech, though conservative, looked forward and not backward.

His conservation address at Spokane was progressive, with some unfortunate reservation, but, at San Francisco, he pushed the subject further, at least as to reclamation, and especially as to public control of privately owned forest lands. In respect to the latter he was away out on the frontier firing line of progress.

At Denver he stood for the summary distribution of great estates and for a prohibition of their being converted into trusts to be held together in mass, against perpetuity of inheritance in any guise. This speech shocked the financial nerves as nothing else in recent years, and, while it and a progressive inheritance tax, which he also favored, is, by him, relegated to the states, his stand on this whole line is splendidly progressive.

He has committed himself to a rehabilitation of our American merchant marine by a ship subsidy, to the corporation tax (which the conservative courts would probably knock out) and to the adoption of the income tax amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

His address at Des Moines, on corporation control, the strengthening of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the creation of an interstate commerce court, outlined constructive statesmanship of a high order.

Now all these issues are important and, if they can be put in issue before Congress, they will divide political forces, not on party lines, but on lines of progressiveness and conservatism with the President on the progressive side of many sharp controversies.

But these are not the things that are dividing Republicans into progressives and conservatives. Republicans are dividing more along lines of popular, as against corporation, control of government; direct legislation, the initiative and referendum, a workable direct primary law, direct election of United States Senators, a non-partisanship elected judiciary, the emancipation of the national government and the governments of the several states from corporation domination. On not one of these issues has the President so far let drop one syllable showing where his sympathies are.

The conclusion therefore must be that, as a statesman, our President is on the whole splendidly progressive while, as a Republican, he has said nothing to indicate where to place him. And the fact that he has said nothing raises a fear, if not a presumption, that time, and his appointments, may disclose him to be an "organization" man. The issue as to whether or not government is to be of, by and for the people, or of, by and for great aggregations of corporations, is too important to be ignored. The issue of whether or not this is to be a great republic composed of lesser republics, or an incorporated plutocracy, transcends every other issue the President has raised as El Capitan towers above a mole hill at its base.

The Handicap of a Phrase.

If the thing which ship-subsidy is could be called by some other name it would meet with a more hearty reception among the people. The transcontinental railroads made the term odious. The promoters of those enterprises grabbed everything they could get in the way of subsidies, clapped on all the traffic would bear in freights and fares, watered stocks, manipulated stock markets, undertook to run the governments of states and nation as well as their railroads and made the American people fearful of chiseling out any more Frankenstein's to harass them beyond endurance. It is small wonder that the passions are inflamed at sight of the term "subsidy" wherever seen.

And yet the issue is before the American people and it is to be hoped that they will not permit their final decision to be made through a pre-judgment, although not without great provocation.

This nation, in very self preservation, has got to give the rest of the world a robust dose of its own medicine, and it has got to do this as certainly in the rehabilitation of its merchant marine as in that of its navy. There should be no half-heartedness in doing it either. Uncle Sam should say to the nations, "I don't want a big navy and will meet you half way in disarming, but if you are bent on seeing which can fool away the most money on ships of war I'll give you a race for your money."

He should speak to the nations regarding a merchant marine to the same effect, saying to them, "I don't want to embark on this subsidy business, but if you fellows will have it that way I'll go you until we have matched you ship for ship on every sea where your ships sail." As Uncle Sam's purse is the longest he can stand it better than the other fellows can, but, all the while, he should be ready to meet them half way in discontinuing such a world policy.

Mr. Dickie's article in this issue of The California Weekly is extremely apropos of the President's visit. It dovetails perfectly with what our chief executive had to say on the subject, and it makes the course of events leading to our present humiliating condition perfectly intelligible.

We, as a nation, have got to carry our "American idea" of protection to its logical conclusion or abandon it. We must either extend the subsidized wall to a finality or level it. We have erected an artificial standard of living and scale of profit for our country and we must either maintain it to the limit or throw it away and take our chances with the rest of the world, catch as catch can. Seeing no prospect of taking down the wall it behooves us to extend it, and yet it cannot be otherwise than with dread that a new era of subsidization is entered upon.

That Immunity Bug-a-Boo.

There is no question that, beyond that tired feeling that attacks so many not of steadfast character, the most difficult obstacle Mr. Heney has to get over in his campaign is that of having granted immunity to the boodle board of supervisors. And yet his defense of that policy is so plain as to convince every person open to conviction that there was no other way of getting hold of the raveling end of the thread of evidence. The bribers "sat tight," as Mr. Fingy Connors would say. If they had been held up they refused to complain of the atrocity and refused to give the officers of the law an inkling of transactions that disgraced our civilization. That a rotten condition of municipal life existed everybody knew, but no whit of legal evidence to that effect could be obtained until the line of rascality could somewhere be broken. That line was attacked at its weakest point, was broken and the rest is so written into history that not one person charged with complicity in San Francisco graft will live long enough to get the taint of it out of his clothes. The issue is as plain as noonday and those who stumble over the immunity contracts should be denied the suffrage on the ground of being non compos mentis.

That Injurious Confession.

There are those who object to carrying the graft prosecutions further lest the ulcerous nakedness of San Francisco be laid bare to derision. It is small wonder that the passions are inflamed at sight of that nakedness through the use of a brave show of tawdry rags and so keep up a pretense of decency at all cost. In cogency of reasoning these people do not differ from the swill hauler who refused to take a bath until mortification set in for the reason that to take a bath and change raiment would imply that he had needed both, a confession of uncleanness he could not bring himself to make, and so was not washed until washed by the undertaker. It is no doubt true enough that there are other American cities as municipally corrupt as San Francisco ever has been, but it is not true that the cities of Great Britain and continental Europe are in a similar state. European conditions are unhealthful in so far as they are based on immemorial privilege, but they are free from graft.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

There is a time in the life of every normal child when it is an animated, interrogation point. It desperately wants to know. Fortunately the child is, during this period, it finds itself in the hands of parents patient to tell the things it wants to know about, patient to listen, patient to encourage the spirit of intelligent inquiry at the cost of a hundred tired, almost hourly, interruptions that, seemingly, silly questions may be answered.

For the exercise of this prerogative of questioning seems everything to the growing mind of the child. It is to determine its degree of intelligence, its power of observation, its faculty for understanding in after life. During this period, in large measure, is determined whether or not the person passing through it is to be a human mudsill, a knot on a log, a person of pith or of punk.

How many of the readers of this would recognize the song of the robin if he were to hear it in an adjacent tree top? Or does the robin take his perch at the top of the tree? Who knows about that? Many birds never venture to the top of any tree. Some birds always do. Every tree is divided into social strata by bird life, each going to its appointed place and seldom venturing above or below. How many knew that?

As for the writer of this, he never feels the disgrace of ignorance, the shame of stupidity, as he does in woods or garden. The commonest things are the things about which he knows the least, and when, in desperation, he turns to someone else for information he generally finds him as ignorant as himself. It is only a professor in a university, with a Ph. D. after his name, who knows about the common things, and only now and again one of these knows.

"What is it?" "How does it live?" "What is its use?" "Is it a pest or is it a friend?" "Is it poison or is it a potheb?" Not being able to answer these questions concerning the commonest things by which we are surrounded, counts our commonest untold millions every year, millions that have been subtracted from our accumulations that need not have been, and millions that might have been added to our substance but were not.

But our pecuniary loss is not our greatest. Indeed it is hardly worthy of mention when compared with that daily loss of companionship with the common things that surround us, beset us on every hand pleading for recognition, but which we go blindly by, stupidly ignoring to an immeasurable impairment of our own powers. It is the common things of life that make up life. These are they which constitute our environment and mainly make us what we are. If we go blundering through them, heedless of them, our stupidity is not mitigated, our wits are not sharpened.

All that lies above the jellyfish is our capacity for taking notice of things, common things, that surround us. The jellyfish is unconcerned about everything. We are unconcerned about almost everything. That is a main difference between us and the jellyfish, and it is only the seeing eye and the apprehensive mind are developed that the understanding is formed, that we are made into sentient beings, in short, that we live.

The world is forming a concept of salvation different from what it has cherished all along. We are now coming to a new revelation, consisting of a more abundant life, a life that reaches farther as well as higher, life with many sympathies instead of few, life that sees and knows and feels, that takes an interest in all things. As we are to call nothing that God has made unclean, so we shall find nothing that God has made uninteresting if only we come to see and know the things that He has made. Where shall these common things of life be learned if not at our common schools? We grown-ups do not know them. There are not enough Ph. D.'s to teach us. There seems to be nothing but to do as we always do—lean the burden upon the public schools, already staggering under their load.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

How Germany Handles Her Forests.

While the United States is facing the problem involved in a threatened lumber famine, due to our care-free devastation of our forests, Germany has faced a similar problem, and has solved it. She did it by insisting upon a "sustained yield"; that is, the forest must be made to produce wood as fast as it is cut. This may seem like a difficult thing to do, but Germany has demonstrated that it is not. Witness the figures: In 1830 the yield, restrained as above indicated, was but 20 cubic feet per acre; in 1865 (before the plan had had the effect fully to demonstrate itself) the yield had increased to 24 cubic feet, or 25 per cent. By this time the system was fully under way, and, as a result, in 1890 the yield had increased to 52 cubic feet to the acre, or 160 per cent over 1830; and in 1904 the yield was 65 cubic feet, a gain in 74 years of 225 per cent. And the gain in financial returns was even greater, the net returns per acre in 1850 being but 28 cents, while in 1904 they were $2.50, an increase of just about 800 per cent. So it will be recognized that Germany handles her forests, not only with judgment, but also with much profit. The time is at hand when we must do a similar thing or pay a heavy penalty, and it would seem that her example is worthy of thoughtful attention.

Accident Insurance in the Fatherland.

Speaking of Germany, her management of her forests is not the only instance in which she sets an example which is, at any rate, worthy of consideration. Such another instance is her state-enforced insurance against accidents, old age and sickness. Under its conditions a workman is insured in case of total disability a sum equal to two-thirds of the amount he has been accustomed to earn, and this entirely regardless of whether his condition is due in any degree to his own negligence. It will be seen that this is an absolute departure from the old doctrine of contributory negligence. Of the amount thus paid one part is paid by employers, another by co-employees, and an additional $12.50 is paid by the state in cases of old age or invalidism. During the year last past sickness insurance was drawn by about 5,000,000 people, the average payment being 19 cents, which, by the way, goes farther in Germany than it would here. At the present time 12,000,000 people there are insured against sickness, 14,000,000 against invalidism and old age, and 19,000,000 against accident. Of course, workers are compelled to contribute to the fund for this purpose. It is estimated that one-half of the people of Germany are thus insured.

Black Diamonds Found Only in Brazil.

We are wont to speak of the coal we use as "the black diamond," and both its chemical constitution and the price we sometimes pay for it appear to warrant the usage. Nevertheless, there is such a thing as a black diamond, and it is other than coal. It really is a diamond, but it is black, and nobody knows what it is that gives it its color. Moreover, it is found nowhere in the world save in a comparatively small tract of land—about 225 miles square—in Brazil. Nowhere else has any specimen of it ever been found. The black diamond does not sparkle and coruscate like its white brother, but it nevertheless is highly valuable, its value consisting in the fact that it is harder and less brittle than the gem of commerce and the bartender's shirt front. This makes it the best of all substances to be used in drilling. Because of this merit it has during the last thirty years increased in price from $5 to $85 a carat, and the price still trends upward, as it is likely to do, for no known substance can take its place in boring for gold, silver, copper and other mineral deposits. Some of these black diamonds are harder than others, and they are like a razor blade—there is no means of telling which is good and which is bad save by actual usage.

Do You Use Slave Cocoa?

The Anti-Slavery and Aborigines-Protection Society of Great Britain is appealing to the people of the United States to join in the British boycott of cocoa produced by slaves in Portuguese West Africa. It has now been several years since it was first reported that the cocoa which bears the San Thome brand was a product of slave labor, and subsequent investigations demonstrated that the report was true, missionaries and other credible witnesses testified that the negro laborers for the San Thome company were simply bought and sold. The situation being understood, public sentiment in England soon enforced a boycott, which was followed by a transfer of the traffic in this cocoa from that country to the United States. Now, as has been said, Englishmen are asking us to join them in their righteous boycott. There should be but one response to such an appeal on the part of men and women who believe that slavery is one of the blackest crimes born of "man's inhumanity to man." Better institute a careful search to see whether the cocoa you use bears the somewhat celebrated San Thome brand, and, if it does, try something else.

Where Actors Do Not Live High.

If actors in Germany do not spend more than their incomes, it is certain they do not indulge in riotous living very much. Indeed, their incomes, they assert, are so narrow that they are asking relief, in the form of new and more favorable theatrical laws, of the Reichstag. That their assertions do not go wide of the mark is indicated by statistics relating to their pay, which they are extensively circulating. According to these statistics 45 per cent. of the German actors receive what, in American coin, would amount to $170 to $240 a year, or $14 to $20 a month; 25 per cent. receive less than $600 a year, or $50 a month; 20 per cent. from $600 to $750 a year, or $50 to $60 a month, and but 10 per cent have incomes of more than $750. So stand the facts, as related by the actors, and as neither the managers nor anybody else appears to deny them it is probable that they are true. It would appear that a youth who there must have the taste never very bad before he would decide to make the histrionic art his own.

Leather Now Made from a Cactus.

It may be that the leather you sometimes admire grew on an alligator's body, and it may be that it grew in a cactus somewhere out on an Arizonan or Mexican desert. If the latter is the case, the cactus of which it once constituted a part was of the kind known as the giant saguaro, and it was but recently that it was discovered that it could be converted into a very good quality of leather, much resembling that made from the skin of the alligator. The method of making leather from the cactus is of the simplest, consisting in merely squeezing the water out of the plant. The discovery of this quality was made in a peculiar way. A man chanced to squeeze a bit of the cactus which he was holding, and later noticed that the piece was stronger and more pliable than it was before the moisture was squeezed out. This led to experiments and the discovery that an excellent species of leather could be made from the cactus. A peculiar quality the leather thus made possesses is that it can be shaped in any form before tanning, cutting, etc., thus doing away with the necessity of sewing. As the saguaro cactus is of considerable size, the "leather" from it may be cut into large pieces. It is probable that it will become more and more an article of commerce.

Russia May Be Our Railway Rival.

In the number of its miles of railway the United States stands far and away in advance of any other country in the world. Indeed, such an assertion does not begin to state the case, for this country to day has more miles of railway than all Europe, and nearly as many as all the rest of the world combined, while our development in this line still rapidly continues. Nevertheless, it is quite possible that some day we will have a rival, and, if so, that rival will be Russia. There is a country two and one-half times as large as the United States, and with a population one-half greater, and railways there, now in their infancy, show many signs of that rapid development which must take place if Russia is to take the place which she should hold among civilized nations. In short, there is room and demand in the Czar's realms for numerous railways, and if some day we are to have a rival she must be the one.

France to Use Aluminum Coins.

France is about to lead in a way in which it is probable that she shortly will be followed by other civilized nations. Before long she will have substituted aluminum for the copper coins which weigh down pockets, whether in France or elsewhere. Already she has entirely ceased the coinage of the heavier metal, and it is reported that the shortage is being felt as an inconvenience. It is expected, however, that the minting of the new coins will be begun by the end of this year. Aluminum will be used only in the coinage of pieces which in purchasing capacity are about the same as pennies and half-pennies. In size they will be both thicker and lighter than francs.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

"She Stoops to Conquer."

A play that is not theatrical, and that reads as smoothly as a narrative, wit without malice; burlesque without vulgarity; good humor and gentle satire and lovable characters; a play that is without a villain and in which nobody is discomfited—these are parts of the triumph of Oliver Goldsmith in his delightful old and perennially new comedy.

We do not know of another piece of English literature that retains so completely as this play the fresh bloom of an immortal youth, or one that comes to the reader, a hundred and a half years old, with such unmarred intimacy of immediate acquaintance with its kindly author. Better can be said of it than that "it might have been written yesterday"; when one reads it one feels the personal presence of Goldsmith, a real man with a striking and lovely and quaint character, smiling at you from the pages.

But, the critics say, the highest dramatic genius is impersonal. And they add, one does not see the man Shakespeare at all in his plays. Well, "She Stoops to Conquer" is a better play than some of Shakespeare's—"Coriolanus," for example—and maybe the critics have not absolute laws of criticism. Be that as it may, Goldsmith the man shines through this comedy of Goldsmith the dramatist as the sun shines through the solar spectrum, revealing to the reader rich and pleasing shades of character that are as immortal as his play.

POLAR VERSE.

A London evening paper prints a humorous communication from the "President of the Royal Eskimo Academy of Sciences," claiming the honor of the discovery of the north pole for Ahwels and E-lun-a-bunk (a synonym of Etukishook), but admitting they were assisted by Commander Peary and Dr. Cook, and then drops into this parody of a well known piece of verse:

Ah-gundrop-welsh and E-lun-a-bunk were very great men particular!
They used to climb up very steep bergs, exceedingly steep, perpendicular!
The bergs that they climbed were innumerable bergs, exceedingly so, multitudinous!
And every berg was a very high berg, exceedingly high, altitudinous!
And those very high bergs, those very steep bergs (which makes the thing more inexpressible),
Those unaccountable bergs, those impossible bergs, were every one inaccessible!

MARGARET ANGLIN'S TRIUMPH.

Margaret Anglin has achieved the crowning success of her career in the title part of "Helene Richie," a dramatization of Margaret Deland's novel. Franklin Fyles, the dramatic critic, gives an acute analysis of the greatness of the test to which the actress' powers were put upon her return to the American stage, in the following paragraph:

"To quite appreciate the significance of Margaret Anglin's re-entry into New York it is necessary to glance over the three years of her absence. She went away a popular and successful actress; she returned to face the most trying of tributes—the tacit acceptance of her as ranking among the greatest actresses of the period. She came back free from managerial restraint, but also from all guidance and aid—taking upon herself the financial and artistic burden of a big production. Furthermore, she returned in the glow of foreign acclaim, won by no easy means, but in the most exacting roles of classic drama. And she achieved a triumph—a greater triumph than was hers on the memorable 'first night' of 'Mrs. Dane's Defense,' because then she had the benefit of taking her audience by surprise, while now she faced an assemblage expecting so much that fulfillment seemed well-nigh impossible."

PERSONALIA.

Fanny C. Macauley, of Louisville, Ky., who wrote "The Lady of the Decoration," under the pen name of Frances Little, is an aunt of Mrs. Alice Hegon Rice, author of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." Mrs. Rice is the "mate" to whom the letters in "The Lady of the Decoration" were written. Her second book, "Little Sister Snow," the scene of which, like that of "The Lady of the Decoration," is laid in Japan, will be published this month by the Century company.

The Mayor of Tokio, husband of Mme. Ozaki, the author of "Warriors of Japan," has written to the President offering 20,000 cherry trees for the new park in Washington, and after the customary circumlocutions have been observed the national capital will have two blossoming Birnam woods for its annual decoration, and the Virginia Mayflowers in the markets will have dangerous rivals. Mme. Ozaki's book is to be illustrated by Japanese artists, and the correctness of its pictures is assured.

Mary E. Waller's "The Wood Carver of Lymhus" is in its twenty-fourth American edition, and an English edition is now in press. The book was first published five years ago.

SWANK.

For the information of readers who wish to keep abreast of current developments in language, we can state with authority that the newest slang word is "swank," the "a" pronounced as in "sank." It means "humbug." Its origin has been hunted down and it has been found to be a good old English country word, of whose acquaintance nobody need be ashamed.

It exists as a dialect word in the midlands and south and west country in all its modern slang meaning. So far it has only reached London, but it will soon be abroad in California, no doubt.

Californian Poets' Corner

Mrs. C. F. Hall Wood, who wrote under the name of Calista K. von K., was for a good many years a resident of Santa Barbara and while there pointed a volume of verse from which the following is quoted:

DANCING TRIPLETS.

By Camilla K. von K.

Shake the silver fringe of Folly's bells,
Dance, undaunted to the magic chime.
Dance, as erst the fauns in Grecian delles,
Shake the silver fringe of Folly's bells,
List the tale of love that laughter tells,
Webs to grip the wary feet of Time.
Shake the silver fringe of Folly's bells,
Dance, undaunted, to the magic chime.

Wait for age to teach thee melancholy,
Foot it lightly in thy gallant prime.
In thy youth be frolicsome and jolly,
Wait for age to teach thee melancholy.
Bind about thy feet the bells of Folly,
Joviously they swing to rhythm and rhyme.
Wait for age to teach thee melancholy,
Foot it lightly in thy gallant prime.

Here the youthful player stands, anointed
King of the soul-searching violin.
From his bow black demons fly, arointed!
Here the youthful player stands, anointed;
By Apollo's benison appointed
Dancing feet to revelry to win.
Here the youthful player stands, anointed
King of the soul-searching violin.

Where's the foolish working world? Forget it.
Dance, and jingle Folly's silver chime.
Fast departs the golden day—O, let it!
Where's the foolish working world? Forget it.
Here I take the merry dance and set it
In the mad mosaic of my rhyme.
Where's the foolish working world? Forget it.
Dance, and jingle Folly's silver chime!

THE FULTON-LESS CELEBRATION.

The Hudson-Fulton celebration in New York presents one anomalous humor to the New York Sun, as appears from the following: Down in Trinity churchyard the body of Robert Fulton lies buried, and over it is erected a handsome monument, so a Sun reporter was assigned to go down and see about it.

The reporter knew he would find the grave of Fulton decorated with flags and banners and streamers and garlands and bouquets and rosettes and quite a number of other things which he thought of as he strolled. That was where he was fooled, for Robert Fulton's grave in Trinity churchyard is undecorated.

Everything else within sight, including Trinity Church and St. Paul's Chapel, is decorated; all the skyscrapers surrounding Trinity churchyard, all the shipping in the harbor, are elaborately decorated. Out on Broadway peddlers rascally call their more or less official programmes of the Hudson-Fulton celebration, and the bright faced young girls leaving their offices and chewing gum and talking baseball wear Hudson-Fulton celebration decorations on their jackets.

The grave of Robert Fulton, of all things conspicuous or inconspicuous in that part of the city, animate or inanimate, renowned or unknown, is not decorated.

The reporter, lamenting his useless accumulation of decorative patter, went all about the monument looking for decorations. There were none. Pensively he stood aside to watch the passing couples, largely bridal couples upon honeymoon trips, to see if any were so poor as to do Robert Fulton reverence. None were. Pensively, too, the reporter called the attention of one bridal couple to the monument, but they swept proudly on, the man murmuring something about his being up to the wiles of confidence men.

Next came a couple who somehow inspired the winsome belief that they came from Kokomo, Ind. The reporter directed their attention to Robert Fulton's tomb, and they stopped, looked blankly at the inscription, at the bronze bust and then spake the man:

"Well, what about it?"

Came another couple, she fair and young and smiling, he tall, middle-aged and dark.

"This," said the reporter, and by this time his inflections were those of a gentleman operating the megaphone on a Seeing New York car, "this is the grave of Robert Fulton."

"Friend of yours?" inquired the bridegroom suspiciously.

"A friend," responded the reporter, "of mankind. He discovered the north—that is, he invented the night boat line to Albany and intermediate points."

"How cute," murmured the bride, and they passed on to the objective of all, the Hamilton monument.

The next couple, in response to the reporter's volunteered information, languidly inquired who Fulton was.

"Sir and lady," responded the reporter, who had insensibly become desperately in earnest in his purpose to spread the fame of Robert Fulton, "what are those boys, those many, many boys, those half grown men and whiskered men out on the sidewalk calling?"

"Why," responded the bridegroom, "they're calling programmes of the Hudson-Fulton celebration. There are three kinds, three cents, five cents and ten cents. We ain't just made up our minds which we'd better buy."

"This," said the reporter, "this is the grave of one of the parties concerned; this is the grave of the Robert of the Hudson-Fulton celebration of that celebration."

"I do declare!" exclaimed the bride. "Then he's dead. I didn't know they celebrated a man so much when he was dead. I think John, there's no use buying any of those programmes."

John Drew, in "Inconstant George," has just opened his sixteenth successive season as a Charles Frohman star.

LIFE AND DEATH IN SAN FRANCISCO

By GEORGE D. LESLIE, Statistician of California State Board of Health.

For recent years San Francisco shows the happy contrast of increasing births, with decreasing deaths. The birth registration rose from 3,923 in 1906 to 5,128 in 1907 and to 6,058 in 1908, the increase for 1906 to 1907 being 1,205 or 30.7 per cent., and for 1907 to 1908 being 930 or 18.1 per cent. At the same time the death total fell from 7,151 for 1906 to 6,575 for 1907 and to 6,260 for 1908, a decrease of 576 or 8.1 per cent in 1906-07, and of 315 or 4.8 per cent in 1907-08. The marriages numbered 3,539 in 1906, 4,158 in 1907, and 4,035 in 1908, the increase of 619 or 17.5 per cent. for 1906-07 being followed by a decrease of 123 or 3 per cent. in 1907-08, due perhaps to leap year shyness.*

Births.

Of the 6,058 births in 1908, 3,067 or 50.6 per cent. were male, and 2,991 or 49.4 per cent. were female. The per cent. male, 50.6 for 1908, was 51.3 for 1907 and 52.0 for 1906. The preponderance of male births is particularly great among non-Caucasian babies, of whom in 1908 52.5 per cent. were males, against only 50.6 per cent. for white babies. Moreover, the proportion of male births is greatest for white mothers born in other States than California (52.3 per cent.), next for those born in foreign countries (50.6 per cent.), and lowest of all for mothers born in the Golden State (49.7 per cent.).

The race distribution of births in 1908 was: White, 5,856 or 96.7 per cent.; Chinese, 98; Japanese, 91, and Negro, 13. The per cent. white was 98.6 in 1907 and 98.3 in 1906.

Nativity of Mothers.

The nativity of white mothers in 1908 was as follows: Foreign born, 2,450 or 41.8 per cent.; born in California, 2,323 or 39.7 per cent.; and born in other States, 1,083 or 18.5 per cent. In 1907 and 1906, respectively, the per cent. foreign born was 40.3 and 39.5; the per cent. born in California were 41.4 and 41.6, and the per cent. born in other States were 18.4 and 18.9 per cent. In San Francisco, the white mothers of foreign birth now outnumber those born in the Golden State.

Comparison of the nativity of brides and mothers indicates that foreign born women are more inclined to bear children than are Californian or other American women. Thus, the per cent. of foreign born in 1908 was no less than 41.8 among white mothers against only 32.3 among white brides or 32.1 among the single white brides alone. On the other hand, the per cent. born in California was merely 39.7 for mothers, as compared with 45.7 for all brides or 47.7 for single brides; similarly, the per cent. born in other States was 18.5 for mothers against 22 per cent. for total brides or 20.2 for only single brides. The corresponding figures for 1907 and 1906 likewise show that relatively many more mothers than brides were born in foreign countries, while, on the contrary, relatively more brides than mothers were native daughters or other Americans.

Deaths.

Of 6,260 deaths in 1908, 3,914 or 62.5 per cent. were male and 2,346 or 37.5 per cent. were female. The per cent. male in 1907 and 1906, respectively, were 63.4 and 62.9, while the per cent. female were 36.6 and 37.1.

Distributed by race, the decedents in 1908 were: White, 5,991 or 95.7 per cent.; Chinese, 157; Japanese, 58, and Negro, 54. The per cent. white was 97 in 1907 and 96 in 1906.

The nativity of the white decedents in 1908 was as follows: Foreign born, 2,668 or 44.5 per cent.; born in California, 2,001 or 33.4 per cent.; born in other States, 1,136 or 19 per cent.; and unknown, 186, or 3.1 per cent. The corresponding per cents. for 1907 and 1906, respectively, were as follows: Foreign born, 44 and 41.3; born in California, 33.2 and 33; born in other States, 19.2 and 18, and unknown, 3.6 and 7.7.

The classification of decedents by selected age periods gives the following results for 1908: Fifteen to 64 years ("productive ages"), 3,541 or 56.6 per cent.; 65 years and over (old age), 1,470 or 23.5 per cent.; under 1 year (infancy), 782 or 12.5 per cent.; 1 to 4 years (childhood), 279 or 4.5 per cent.; 5 to 14 years (youth), 185 or 2.9 per cent., and age unknown, only 3 or less than one-tenth of 1 per cent. The corresponding per cents. for 1907 and 1906, respectively, were as follows: Fifteen to 64 years, 57.2 and 52.4 per cent.; 65 years and over, 21.6 and 22.8; under 1 year, 12.9 and 13.1; 1 to 4 years, 5 and 4.8; 5 to 14 years, 3 and 2.8, and age unknown, .3 and 4.1.

Causes of Death.

Of the 6,260 deaths in San Francisco in 1908, those from diseases of the circulatory system (heart disease, etc.) numbered 1,054 or 16.8 per cent. of all, as compared with 16.2 per cent. in 1907 and 15 per cent. in 1906. The deaths from tuberculosis totaled 845 or 13.5 per cent. in 1908, against 12.2 per cent. in 1907 and 11.3 per cent. in 1906. The proportions increased for both heart disease and tuberculosis, especially the latter. In 1908 native Californians formed 319 or 37.7 per cent. of the tuberculosis victims in San Francisco, the per cents. for 1907 and 1906 having been 40.6 and 42.1 respectively.

Other notable causes of death in San Francisco in 1908 were as follows: Diseases of the respiratory system, 773; violence, 665; diseases of the digestive system, 560; diseases of the nervous system, 463; cancer, 409; Bright's disease and nephritis, 376; and epidemic diseases, 256. The leading epidemic diseases in 1908 were: Diphtheria and croup, 81; typhoid fever, 77; whooping cough, 25, and measles, 23. There has been a marked decrease in deaths from typhoid fever, the number for 1908 being only 77, against no less than 123 for 1907 and 220 for 1906.

Marriages.

Of the 4,035 marriages in 1908, 3,165 or 78.4 per cent. were the first for both parties; 414 or 10.3 per cent. were the first for only the groom; 264 or 6.5 per cent. were the first for only the bride, and 192 or 4.8 per cent. were the second or over for both groom and bride. The corresponding per cents. for 1907 and 1906, respectively, were as follows: First of both parties, 79.8 and 77.5 per cent.; first of groom only, 8.9 and 10; first of bride only, 6.8 and 7.2, and second or over of both, 4.5 and 5.3.

Among the grooms in 1908, 3,579 or 88.7 per cent. were single; 273 or 6.8 per cent. were widowed; and 183 or 4.5 per cent. were divorced. In 1907 and 1906, respectively, the per cents. single were 88.7 and 87.4; the widowed, 6.7 and 7.4, and the divorced 4.6 and 5.0.

Of the brides in 1908, the single numbered 3,429 or 85 per cent.; the widowed, 355 or 8.8 per cent., and the divorced, 251 or 6.2 per cent. The corresponding per cents. for 1907 and 1906 were: Single, 86.5 and 84.7; widowed, 8.1 and 8.3, and divorced, 5.4 and 7.

The widows remarrying outnumbered the widowers by 82 or 30 per cent. in 1908, as compared with 20.8 per cent. in 1907 and 12.3 per cent. in 1906. The divorced women marrying again likewise outnumbered the divorced men by 68 or 37.2 per cent. for 1908, against 17.3 per cent. for 1907 and 36.1 per cent. for 1906.

Nativity of Brides.

There were only 65 marriages of non-Caucasians in San Francisco in 1908. Of the 3,970 white brides, 1,815 or 45.7 per cent. were born in California, 1,282 or 32.3 per cent. in foreign countries, and 873 or 22 per cent. in other States than California. The per cent. born in California was 47.7 among the single brides, 40.4 among the divorced, and only 30.6 among the widowed. The per cent. foreign born was no less than 40.3 for the widowed, as compared with 32.1 for the single and merely 23.2 for the divorced. The per cent. born in other States was 36.4 among the divorced and 29.1 among the widowed, but only 20.2 among single brides. The figures for 1907 and 1906 were substantially the same as those given here for 1908, the proportions being particularly great each year for California girls among single brides, for foreign born women among widows remarrying, and for other Americans among divorces marrying again.

Of all the white brides in 1908, the single numbered 3,370 or 84.9 per cent.; the widowed, 353 or 8.8 per cent.; and the divorced, 250 or 6.3 per cent. The per cent. single was 88.5 among the brides born in California and 84.5 among the foreign born brides, but only 77.9 among those born in other States. The per cent. widowed was 11.7 among other Americans and 11 per cent. among the foreign born, against only 5.9 for the native Californians. The per cent. divorced was no less than 10.4 among brides born in other States, as compared with merely 4.6 for those born in California and 4.3 for those born abroad. These figures for 1908 like similar ones for 1907 and 1906 show that the single brides in San Francisco were mainly native Californians or foreign born women, while the widows remarrying were largely born in other States or foreign countries, and the divorces marrying again were principally other Americans, in contrast with California girls or the foreign born.

Alfred Noyes, whose "Drake, an English Epic" received most favorable comment from such critics as Swinburne and Kipling and is about to be published in this country, will be twenty-nine years old this month. Two years ago he married an American girl, Miss Garnett Daniels, youngest daughter of the late Colonel B. G. Daniels, U. S. A., who was for some years United States consul at Hull, England. Since leaving Oxford university, Mr. Noyes has deliberately chosen the writing of poetry as a means for earning his livelihood, and, in spite of many warnings as to the impracticability of such a career, he is said to have experienced but little difficulty in the sale of his verse.

* For the first eight months of 1909 the totals were: Births, 4,371; deaths, 4,103; and marriages, 2,675. On this basis the total for 1909 would be about as follows: Births, 4,350; deaths, 4,150; and marriages, 4,000. The relatively small figures for marriages in San Francisco are explained by the fact that many city couples go to the suburban country to be married.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

"Time for Bed."

I remember, I remember, in a cottage long ago,
When the world was all a-sparkle in its mantle of the snow,
How we used to play together, just my sister and myself,
Where each shadow cast by firelight was a tiny, dancing elf.
There, my grandfere read some volume, though today I am afraid
That his reading was a labor in the racket that we made,
For we youngsters were not angels—so, at least my aunty said—
And the elders oft suggested mother's "Now it's time for bed."

Time for bed! Well, I should say not! Other times may come and thrive,
But the time for bed for urchins—who has known it to arrive?
So in anguish we protested, tried some scalding tears to shed,
But our woe was wholly wasted on that changeless, "Time for bed."
Then there came the dread disrobing, bed-side prayers (I somewhat fear That the spirit oft was lacking), then our mother, mother dear, Stooped to kiss us. "Heavenly Father, bless my little ones," she said—
Years that fly what have you brought me like that blessing o'er my bed?

All adown life's dappled meadows I have wandered, I have strayed,
'Till that cot is but a shadow in the dawning where I played;
I have found Time's gilded baubles, but I lost, in lands afar, Somewhat fairer, somewhat better, than these later tricks are.
We are weary in the struggle, we are burdened by its pain,
And we sigh for dawning summits that we nevermore attain,
And full often one is waiting, with a gray and lowered head,
For a mother's voice to whisper from the silence, "Time for bed."

The Bright Side of Fleas.

We are too prone to dwell upon the dark side of annoyances, forgetting that they may possess mitigating features which, looked at aright, serve to lighten the gloom and make the life-journey easier. Take fleas, for instance. We look upon them as a pest and a nuisance which should be suppressed, or, at any rate, turned over, and yet even a flea has a joy-giving capacity which we may find if we look for it.

The young lady who sat in front of me in church last Sunday was quite beautiful, and her air of sweet and placid devotion would have been unbroken if it had not been for the flea. Of course I could not see the flea, but I knew, and so did the young lady, that it was on that part of the back, somewhat north of the center, which can be reached only by calling in some other member of the family, no human arm being long enough to perform that mission for its owner.

The silent struggle that followed the victim's discovery of the whereabouts of the flea was so pitiful that no spectator could have seen it without smiling. The sermon was excellent, and it was evident that the young lady wished to enjoy it, but she didn't. She wriggled, twisted, and endeavored, in a manner to attract as little attention as possible, to prevail on the intruder to move on, but it was in vain. I might have helped her, and, as I witnessed her anguish, I almost felt it my duty to do so, but we had not been introduced, and I feared she might consider that I took a liberty if I did. So the poor girl had to struggle alone, and the sight was so pathetic that sometimes I had to hide my face. Still, recognizing the light that permeated the gloom of the occasion, I had quite a good time.

Thus it will be seen that even the loathed flea may bring joy to us—when it is on some other person. When it is not, of course, it is very different. * * *

The Opinions of Rufus.

Main difference between christianity an' creed, es I see it, is that if you watch a man you kin form a fair idee whether er not he's a christian, but you can't watch him long enough to tell what church he belongs to.

An', again, a creed is like a fiddle, mighty little good without the music that comes from it, which is christian livin'.

An', yit again, p'raps we'd better recollect that like es not our creed fiddle ain't the only musical instrymint the Almighty keeps on hand. He may have some pianiers, horns an' harps. He gits considerible music out of 'em.

Remember! that the curve in the line of beauty, oh, my brethern, let's paws to pay a deserved tribute to the femal heroes who, without a shudder conceal sech lines an' dress themselves up to look like the bottom stroke of the figger nine. We men are heroic, but not thus regardless.

Es the scripcher says, men don't hide their light under a bushel, but if some did I don't b'lieve they'd be any noticeable difference in the illuminashun.

The ghosts of Patrick Henry an' John C. Calhoun met. "It's true," they both says at once, "that I respect you, but when I think of what come of mixin' your blood an' mine—then they broke down an' melted away in tears."

The poet says that "friendship is a sacred trust, which puts it in a class by itself, the other trusts generally not bein' so regarded."

I b'lieve it would do some real pious men a heap of good to remember that the Nazarene denounced the scribes an' pharisees ruther more than he did the publicans an' sinners.

I don't mean to reely object to payin' the fiddler, but sometimes it does seem to me that his prices are away above union figgers.

Er—Well—Perhaps.

In my dream a being clad as I never had seen mortal clothed appeared before me.

"I come from a far world," he said, "and seek information. I have been informed that this is a government of the people, by the people and for the people. Is this true?"

"You bet it is," said I.

"The people, of course, are intelligent, honest, and govern themselves wisely?"

"Right you are," said I.

"And undoubtedly they select none but the wisest and best to represent them in office and manage their affairs, for them?"

"Why, of course."

"That, for example, was why Schmitz was elected mayor, was it not?"

"Er—well—" said I, and couldn't think of anything more to say.

"And it is why the supervisors who served with him were elected?"

"Er—well—" said I, and again hesitated.

"And it is why the same wise and intelligent people are now permitted to make a choice between McCarthy, Leland and Crocker, I presume?"

"Er—well—yes," I varied my answer.

"And I suppose they can be relied upon to act with an intelligence, acumen and judgment equal to that they have displayed in the past?"

"Er—well—I hope so," said I.

"The vision faded away so rapidly that I didn't have time to ask it what it meant, as I desired to do. I wish it had stayed longer, for I fear it meant to insinuate something."

Yes, He's Always Dead.

The man who sought the office.
He is richly clothed and fed,
But the man whom office sought for—
He is dead.

Pa an' His Four Tens.

One Sunday Parson Perkins preached about the heathen race
That need the lamp of righteousness to shine upon their face
An' pa'd been out the night before, an' then to ma explained
That by his business he had been regretfully detained,
An' so he slept the sermon through. "To help the sech strayin' ones,"
The parson said, "I ask your aid, for thus your duty runs.
Don't backward be. What have you got in answer to my plea?"
Pa gave a lurch an' most fell down; "I've got four tens," says he.

Oh, then the parson's heart was glad. "The angels give applause
Whenever sech sums are give," he says, "to help the heathen's cause.
Jest forty dollars is the sum—" "Er—say—hold on!" says pa.

"Don't be a fool two times in church—once is enough," says ma.

So pa he wrote a check right there—it busted his account.

"Sech strikin' grace," the parson said, "must lead to Zion's mount.
Let brethern haste, to do likewise to help the heathen live."

I'm grieved to say that fifty cents was most the others give.

When pa an' ma was goin' home it seemed to me, I know,
The atmosphere around them both was twelve degrees below.

At last ma said, "I need a hat." "It's yours," was all pa said.

"I also need a gown," says ma. Then pa, his face turned red,
An' then he says, "You'll git it, too; but hear me from my perch:
The day'll be chilly next time when I hold four tens in church."

But when he got me all alone he says, "Here's my advice, Remember, son, there's some blamed games that are not worth the price."

The Teacher Who Whips.

Over in Haywards the old trouble anent the teacher who whips his pupils is on, and a petition has been circulated asking that corporal punishment be abolished in the schools. Well, I don't know. People will view the matter differently, but I was whipped many score times in school when I was a young and enterprising boy, and I am pausing right here to thank the teachers who thus sternly dragged me back to the path of duty. But one of them, I am guessing, was misapplied, and I allowed that to partly offset a thousand and one that I deserved and didn't get. They did me good, and I know it now, although I didn't enjoy them much at the time. There is a species of juvenile ruffian (thank heaven, quite rare) who can be controlled in no way except by the method advocated by Solomon, and I have observed that the parents of such frequently are the ones who yell the loudest against corporal punishment—probably that principally is what ails the kid. There are children who never deserve a whipping, and there are others who rarely deserve anything else. If my child were whipped in school he would have to prove very conclusively to me that the teacher was wrong before I would file a protest. It may be that the children who were whipped in Haywards were the youthful saints and embryo angels of the school, but, then again, perhaps they were not.

Faith and Works Combined.

"What makes you think he is a man of both faith and works?"

"Why, I, myself, have heard him pray to be relieved of dyspepsia."

"I don't see that that proves it."
"But he always takes liver pills afterward."

WHAT AUTHORS EARN.

The London correspondent of the New York Sun has collected the following data regarding the earnings of authors and publishers:

The case of Stephen Phillips, the poet and playwright, who is in very straitened circumstances, has opened the question as to whether English writers can on the whole be called successful financially. Mr. Phillips has had many plays produced in England and America, yet he is now in actual poverty, which he attributes to the failure of his last two plays, "The Lost Heir" and "Faust," both of which were presented in London.

The very recent death of John Davidson because he was tired of struggling to make a living from his poetry; the death of Francis Thompson, also without means; the case of Matthew Arnold, who after all his years of successful work left but $5,000, and that of Charles Godfrey Leland, author of "Hans Breitmann's Ballads," whose estate was valued at about $2,000, are instances cited, which are balanced by the case of Lord Tennyson, who left nearly $300,000; of Swinburne, who left over $100,000, and of Robert Browning, who left $60,000.

As to authors of successful books, many have amassed considerable fortunes. Henry Seton Merriman, Edna Lyall, John Oliver Hobbes, Mrs. Isabella Lucy Bishop and George Meredith all left estates of value. But Florence Marryat, Mary Kingsley and even Lewis Carroll left such small sums as $7,395, $17,055 and $19,000.

Publishers in many cases left very large fortunes, the chief among them being G. Smith of Smith, Elder & Co., $3,899,800; Thomas Nelson of T. Nelson & Sons, $3,154,335; George William Petter of Cassell, Petter & Galpin, $2,602,805; Alexander Macmillan of Macmillan & Co., $895,055; Adam Black of A. & C. Black, $736,305; George Lock of Ward, Lock & Co., $595,050.

"It was not so very wonderful that when Lot's wife looked back she turned into a pillar of salt." "Not a very wonderful thing to have happened in the age of miracles perhaps, but none the less, so wonderful happens in these prosaic days." "Oh I don't know; we were going out Main street last evening and when my chauffeur looked back he turned into a telegraph pole."—Houston Post.

Mr. W. E. Pence, writing from the City Club of New York, sends the following addition to "Shear Wit": Richard Mansfield, the actor, went into a restaurant for supper. The young man who took his order had at one time done a singing turn in Mansfield's company. He recognized the actor, and said, "I suppose, Mr. Mansfield, you are surprised to see me doing this kind of work." Mansfield said: "No; I heard you sing."

"Mrs. Peck tells me she did not learn to swim this summer as she had intended to." "I should say she didn't." "What was the trouble?" "Henry got all ready to give her her first lesson and began by telling her to shut her mouth, and she scratched him clear across the face and chased him two miles up the beach and into a tree."—Houston Post.

The first grade teacher had been able to spank Tommy with the greatest enthusiasm, but his next teacher had not reached the point where she felt she could do justice to him in spite of all his naughtiness. "Send him to me when you want him spanked," said the first grade teacher one morning, after her colleague had related his many misdemeanors. About 11 o'clock Tommy appeared at the first grade teacher's door. She dropped her work, seized him by the arm, dragged him to the dressing room, turned him over her knee and did her duty. When she had finished she said: "Well, Tommy, what have you to say?" "Please, miss, my teacher wants the scissors."—Everybody's Magazine.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Party Loyalty Not for Bosses

How to get the citizens who desire good government to vote together at a primary election without imitating the methods of the machine is the problem which the Los Angeles reformers are trying to solve. As has been explained in The California Weekly, the Republican party, still clinging to old methods and trying to fit them to new conditions, called a partisan city convention which was supposed to be composed of two thousand delegates, and this convention nominated a ticket which Republicans are being asked to support on party grounds, although no party designations can go on the primary ballots and the whole intent of the charter provisions under which the primary is held is avoidance of party politics. Naturally the reformers do not wish to perpetrate a similar absurdity, but some means they must find to secure concerted action in order to win. By means of wise selection of candidates, by quiet conferences and by public discussion, they are seeking to do legitimately what the machine has sought to do through a method which can no longer be regarded as legitimate. Of course the success of the reformers depends upon acting in strict accord with the spirit of the charter and in making the citizens recognize that they are doing so. A good deal depends upon the Democrats, who, with the machine help, such as Mayor Harper had, might win a party victory which would not be a victory for good government. But if the Democrats, or a fair share of them, recognize that the charter has banished party politics from city elections, they will make common cause with the anti-machine Republicans, and will win a common victory.

Common Sense Not Partisanship

Meanwhile in San Francisco we are witnessing a contest involving substantially the same issues of good government which took place in Los Angeles, but which has been shaped up under a primary law that is almost the direct antithesis of the other. Some persons are disposed to say that the State direct primary law enthrones partisan politics in municipal affairs; indeed The California Weekly itself may have used about the same expression regarding it. And yet, so to say does not fairly represent the spirit of the new law. It was created and made applicable to city elections, not for the purpose of enthroneing partisanship therein, but in the belief that it was already enthroneed and in order to secure an honest kind of partisanship—in other words, to bring about the government of each and every political party by a real majority of the voters composing it. And neither does our State law defeat, or even seriously interfere with, non-partisan control of cities, a majority of voters favor that plan. Republican and Democratic partisans are now trying to make voters believe there is something about the new primary law which requires them in the regular municipal election to vote as partisans, but that is mere machine claptrap. Good results can be obtained under either the Los Angeles plan or the San Francisco plan if only citizens will manifest sufficient intelligence in operating them. In short, under any primary plan the whole issue is passed up to the common sense of the voter.

Criminality Hurts Us Worse Than Partisanship

Mean time it would somewhere clear the atmosphere in which primary systems have been discussed recently if it were borne in mind that no kind of election ever was or ever will be an unmixt blessing; on the contrary, the best elections will always be attended by serious evils. More than a hundred years ago one of the greatest statesmen and orators said in a speech in the House of Commons certain things about election which are still true. "To govern," he said, "according to the sense and agreeably to the interests of the people is a great and glorious object of government. This object cannot be obtained but through the medium of popular election, and popular election is a mighty evil. It is such, and so great an evil, that though there are few nations whose monarchs were not originally elective, very few are now elected. They are the distempers of elections which have destroyed all great states." If Burke lived today, he would say it differently, but, so long as the tenderloin and criminal wealth join hands to control elections, he would not have occasion to change the spirit of his sweeping assertion.

Hard Sledding for the Engineering Department

California's experience with a state engineering department has not been happy. Nearly a generation ago William Ham Hall undertook to build up a state engineering department that would map the state like one's back yard, gauge all the streams and, in short, accomplish about what is now being done through a co-operative work between state and nation, by the nation. There is little doubt that he did his engineering work admirably, but his success in educating the statesmanship of California to the need for having that work done was not so marked, and the result was that the office was abolished, the data scattered to the four winds and state engineering dropped up into as many parts as there are phases of state business requiring engineering services. Each state institution hired its own engineer and its own architect as it needed one and there was no uniformity, and little conformity, in architectural and engineering services throughout the state.

Lessons From the Great Earthquake

The great earthquake of April 18, 1906, taught state officials having power to think a thing or two worth knowing. It disclosed the truth that state buildings had been erected by architects without the aid and aid of engineers with the result that great damage had been done that might have been avoided if sound engineering principles had been observed. Tons of ornamentation set on the tops of wiggly walls for architectural effect were thrown to the ground with disastrous results; brick buildings had been girdled by stone water-tables, but, preeminently, the egregious blunder had been made of placing great water tanks at the tops of high brick towers, built into and made parts of the walls of buildings, the swaying and swishing of which, during the earthquake, crushed such walls like eggshells. Furthermore, the superintendents of state institutions, without engineering advice, often, in making improvements, caused walls to be cut and laced with a total disregard for the integrity of the structure as originally planned and built, and the dangerous weakening of the buildings. Furthermore, the engineering cost, in the aggregate, under that systematic system was causing the state great expense.

How the Department Came Into Being

Nathaniel Ellery is, first of all, a Humboldtian. That of itself is equivalent to cards and spades in the estimation of Governor Gillett. Then he is, or was, related by marriage to the Gillett family. That counted for something, too. He had been State Highway Commissioner under Gage and Pardee and had done good service. He had inspected all the state buildings after the big earthquake, at the request of Governor Pardee, and had become more and more of the opinion that a state engineering department that should embrace all engineering and architectural needs of the state, and his own ambition to elevate his office to the dignity of a state engineering department (with himself at the head) ran on parallel lines with the common good as their common goal, and he persuaded Governor Gillett to the same effect. The Governor threw his influence into the scale on behalf of Ellery's plans, and a State Engineering office was re-created.

The Indictment of The Department

Now come the several state institutions of California and, by way of indictment of the Engineering department, allege that it never gets anything done, that state work is delayed for want of plans and specifications and that, when plans and specifications do come to hand the estimated cost always exceeds the appropriation. It took two years to get out of the architectural department of the State Engineer's office plans for a receiving cottage at the Southern California Hospital, and the contract for the cottage has only just been let, although the appropriation for it was made by the legislature of 1907. Appropriations were made for improvements at San Quentin prison four years ago, architects hired and plans made, which the new State Engineering department promptly set aside, and it was not until after the last legislature adjourned that plans for two cell houses were gotten ready. Great delay occurred in getting the plans for the Agnews Hospital buildings ready, and now after some of them are up and ready for occupancy they cannot be used because the tunnels and laying of service pipes are not ready and may not be made ready all winter, solely because of the tardiness of the office of the State Engineer. In short, the general allegation is that state construction work is hampered and not helped by reason of this new department of state government and through its tardiness and inadequacy.

Where the Trouble May Be Looked For

No one who knows Nathaniel Ellery will doubt his integrity of character. His professional standing is good. What he can do we may be sure that he is doing to make good in his office, but it is unlikely that he has under him a single man of his own unhampered selection. It is altogether likely that the filling of subordinate positions in the state engineering department has been dictated by "organization" men in the interests of the "organization" of the Republican party. If there be inefficiency in the office it is likely to be mainly attributable to this cause. Furthermore, Mr. Ellery is not a particularly gifted manager of men. He is not of the type of man who can sit in his office and direct others to do the work. He must be upon the ground himself, take all responsibility and leave to subordinates only the details. That puts him on the keen jump all the time, and only his staff, and those who are waiting for the work to be done, have an easy time of it. If Ellery fails of making good with his department it will not be through lack of need for such a department, but, in part at least, because he himself is unable to do too much rather than too little of his work.

Discounting Complaints

In justice to State Engineer Ellery it will be profitable to allow something in the way of discount from the face value of complaints by reason of the reluctance with which boards of directors and state officials generally relinquish any part of the authority they once possessed. No official willingly yields any prerogative of his office, and the tendency is to reach out for more power and larger influence. Nevertheless it is quite possible that the State Engineering department has gone too far in taking to itself functions that the several institutions themselves should exercise. As the woman who is to use the kitchen should have something to do with the planning of her kitchen, so the superintendent of a state institution should be the one to determine what manner of buildings are needed, and it should be the function of the department of engineering and architecture merely to put the ideas of the executive force of each institution into form, first, for submitting to contractors and, second, to see to it that contracts are executed in accordance with plans and specifications. For the department of engineering and architecture to assume to dictate what manner of buildings are needed is a usurpation of power. The idea of a state engineering and architectural department is a good one. It is a great misfortune that it was ever abandoned, and the policy the new department superseded was intolerable. If Mr. Ellery is proving not to be the man to work out the state engineering department without embarrassment to the state it is the duty of the Governor to find the right man for the place, and yet no right man can ever be found unless he, and not the "organization" politicians who infest the land, is given unhampered power to fill all subordinate positions in his department.

When Politics Enters Tranquility Takes Wing The Watchman sometimes wonders if women who are clamoring for equal suffrage realize how uneasy rests the head that seeks repose on a political pillow. Those who attended the State Suffragist convention in Stockton last week (convened about the time The California Weekly went to press), must have gotten an inkling of the truth of this statement. The convention straightway divided into conservative and liberal groups and, afterward, redivided into those who wished the convention to endorse the struggle for the establishment of justice in San Francisco and those who wished to adhere to the traditional policy of endorsing nothing that had not already endorsed the equal suffrage movement. The traditional policy won the day, and the Heney campaign was not entered, although a large majority of the delegates present were personally heartily in favor of the Heney campaign and stand for what Mr. Heney stands for in upholding a justice as equal as these very good women desire suffrage to be. The wisdom of following the traditional policy is making no official interest in anything that does not take a favoring interest in the cause of equal suffrage is to be doubted. It is not by a narrow exclusiveness that a sympathetic interest is created in any cause, but in the broadest reciprocity with other moral movements of the day. The suffrage movement is a moral movement in so far as it has any claim at all upon public consideration.

Common Good Must Determine From press reports of the discussions at the Equal Suffrage convention The Watchman gathers that the equal suffragists are still fighting the old battle of woman's rights. Women have rights, lots of them, and perhaps they ought to have more than they have got, but suffrage is not one of them. Suffrage is not a right. It is a privilege and a duty, and those having it who do not so regard it should forfeit it. Whether or not women should vote is not an issue of abstract right, or even whether or not it would be a good thing for women to be enfranchised, but whether or not their voting would be a good thing for the Common Good. The Watchman is of the opinion that it would prove beneficial, that it would bring into our political life a factor that would humanize it; but it would be a very heavy burden upon womanhood, and those among women who would be spared the drinking of the political cup are not so out of their heads as some of their more enthusiastic sisters seem to think. It is a good subject to keep alive. Meantime, the best way for women to gain the suffrage is to make themselves indispensable to the betterment by taking a keen interest, and lending a helping hand in public affairs whenever and wherever their influence can be made to count for making things better than they are. There is no power of reasoning that so convinces as a helping hand when help is needed. At the time when justice is being dragged to the altar men to be offered a living sacrifice to the cupidity of ambitious men. The Common Good must determine the issue.

Out Flanking City Charter Limitations Some of the good people who live in the city of Alameda have been wondering how it is that, with the State rate of taxation and the county rate of taxation both reduced, they are going to be called on to pay higher taxes than ever this year. After the paradox has been explored it is discovered that the difference comes in through the changed method of levying certain school taxes. In former years the support of the high school was provided for in the city tax rate, which, as in most cities, is subject to a charter limit. Through an amendment of the school law by the late legislature, all high school taxes are to be levied by county boards of supervisors, and in some counties the common school taxes also are now being levied in that way. This enables the cities with charter limitations to continue levying $1 on $100, or whatever the limit may be, without making any provision for schools, the school taxes coming in as special district taxes levied by the supervisors of the county. This is as near a move to circumvent charters and get more money as the railroads make when they alter the classifications of freight and thereby get more money out of the shipper without making any change in their nominal rates.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

A company composed of citizens of Petaluma has purchased a tract of land and is boring for oil on Glazier creek, near Ukiah. The prospects are reported to be good.

The Pomona Progress recently issued a creditable thirty-eight-page edition in recognition of "Pomona Day," wherein the Southern California city advertises its merits to the world.

From three acres near Selma Wallace L. Lynn this year produced twelve tons of Thompson seedless raisins. This is the record, so far as it has been reported.

The California Dried Fruit Agency, located at Fresno, is offering one and one-half cents per pound on delivery for raisins, the only condition being a three-year's contract.

A ledge of gold has been discovered on the ranch of W. A. Fields, near Colusa Valley, which runs somewhat over ten dollars to the ton.

The Citizen and the Express, of Winters, have been purchased by business men of that town, and henceforth will be run as a single sheet.

An oil gusher, which is estimated to carry a flow of 15,000 gallons a day recently was struck on the Silver Tip property in the Coalinga field.

The third annual Parade of Products of Orange county has just been held. It is reported to have been notably successful.

Work is in progress on the roadbed of the Vallejo and Northern Electric Railroad company on the place of Lewis and Clark near Susan, and it is understood that it will be continued.

The Southern Pacific company is preparing to reconstruct its roadway between Vallejo and Susan. Ninety-pound rails will be laid in the place of the lighter rails now in use.

ONE THOUSAND SUCCESSFUL MEN.

(From the Juvenile Court Record.)

I have on my desk a list of 1,000 successful men of this nation. By "successful" I do not mean mere money-makers, but men who have given us new conceptions of steam, electricity, construction work, education, art, etc. These are the men who influence our moral as well as physical lives. They construct for better things.

How these men started in work is interesting. Their first foothold in work is a fine study.

Three hundred started as farmers' sons. Two hundred started as messenger boys. Two hundred were newsboys. One hundred were printers' apprentices. One hundred were apprenticed in manufacturing.

Fifty began at the bottom of railway work. Fifty—only fifty—had wealthy parents to give them a start.

AMERICAN SHIPPING IN AMERICAN SHIPS

IV. WHY THE UNITED STATE HAS LOST INTEREST IN ITS FOREIGN SHIPPING.

By G. W. DICKIE.

It is self-evident that to a nation like this, having an immense seaboard on the two great oceans of the world, sea power both naval and commercial is a very desirable thing. Yet the history of this country, and the wonderful progress it has made, show that at certain stages of development it is not a prime necessity.

In its earlier history the population of this country, centering on the Atlantic seaboard and depending for a livelihood on an interchange of commodities with the mother country and her other colonies, naturally turned its energies and accumulated wealth to the upbuilding of a sea-borne commerce. Behind were great virgin forests of magnificent materials for building ships; in front, the ocean highway leading to all the markets of the world. With such opportunities the young and vigorous republic prospered. In the beginning of the last century, that an extensive mercantile navy in the foreign trade was an absolute necessity in its development and growth in wealth and power. The first Congress, as has been shown in a previous article, was very careful to protect this growing sea power, and imposed duties on foreign ships so that as long as these duties were in force they prevented the foreign vessels from getting any share of the export and import trade of the United States.

During the Civil war a portion of the shipping of the North was destroyed, and this is often given as a reason for the rapid decline of our foreign shipping. This was referred to by some of the Congressmen who lately visited San Francisco in a way that shows that this belief, natural enough forty years ago, still prevails even among our lawmakers.

Steady Decline of American Shipping.

I have shown elsewhere that a steady decline in the proportion of its own trade carried by its own ships began at the time that the foreign carrying trade was opened to our foreign ships and the last restrictions removed from the free competition of all countries in the foreign trade of the United States. The following statistics will show how steady the decline has been.

	Per cent of Imports.	Per cent of Exports.
In 1840 we carried.....	86	80
In 1850 we carried.....	78	66
In 1860 we carried.....	63	69
In 1870 we carried.....	33	38
In 1880 we carried.....	22	14
In 1890 we carried.....	17	9
In 1900 we carried.....	12	7

It will be noticed from the above figures that the decline had begun long before the war and that when the great struggle was over the decline continued; it is of course plain from the above figures that the Civil war did cause an increase in the rate of decline, as would of necessity be expected, for much shipping was destroyed and the natural direction of trade changed somewhat from American to foreign ships so as to avoid danger of capture by Confederate States cruisers. It will also be noticed that our foreign shipping is approaching absolute extinction.

Civil War Not the Cause.

The Civil war did not, then, destroy our shipping in the foreign trade; a great deal of floating property was destroyed as well as other property, but all property that was obliterated in the course of that struggle except shipping was restored in better form than ever before, wherever such property was needed in the development of the country. The past experiences of San Francisco are cases illustrative of the point I wish to bring out in regard to the upbuilding which will follow any sudden devastation or disaster whenever such upbuilding is necessary. San Francisco has been built in some ways that are grander than before, because the country needs a city here.

It is so with every product of man's labor; so long as the thing is needed and man's ability to produce it is not destroyed, whatever takes away from him the tools he works with acts as an incentive to him to devise and produce more and better tools. That the foreign shipping interest of the United States is not resting on the injuries inflicted during the Civil war but kept on steadily declining as it had done for years preceding the war, is in itself an indication that a merchant navy was not an absolute necessity to the development of the country. Had a merchant navy been a prime necessity to them the people would have demanded and secured laws fostering the interests of their own shipping engaged in foreign commerce. About the time immediately following the close of the Civil war other causes, which, in conjunction with the destruction of these enterprises, became powerful factors in preventing a prompt restoration of American shipping, were at work.

The Iron and Steel Ships.

One of these factors to which I referred above was the change then taking place in the methods of building ships and in the adoption of a new material for building them. The native oak of Old England that had enabled her flag to "brave a thousand years the battle and the breeze" was becoming very scarce, and ships being an absolute necessity to the maintenance of her position and power among the nations, a new material had to be found out of which to build them. This new material, first iron and then steel, had been gradually gaining the confidence of those who "go down to the sea in ships and do business in the great waters of the world." The Confederate cruisers burning the best wooden ships that carried the stars and stripes the British shipyards were learning the most economical methods whereby iron and steel plates and bars could be worked into the necessary shapes for building ships that would only equal their wooden predecessors in strength, and power to carry, but would far exceed them in size, speed and economy. In this new material Great Britain found her opportunity not only to maintain her position on the sea but to extend it to a magnitude that became the wonder of the latter half of the nineteenth century.

The American shipowners and shipbuilders saw all this going on, and no doubt understood and foresaw what the end would be, but in this country at that time shipowning and shipbuilding were not national necessities in the same sense that they were in Great Britain, and the people, most of whom had never smelled salt water, were indifferent to their opportunities in this particular respect. The necessity was claimed to be a personal one of material interest to the shipbuilders and shipowners only, and not a national necessity; this was the American view. In Britain the condition of her national merchant shipping was considered an issue second in importance to none. The position of Great Britain geographically, politically and commercially demanded that she get and maintain a paramount naval supremacy; such being the case, the shipbuilder there had only to learn his business of building good ships, and the government saw to it that the shipowner did not lack encouragement to use them.

In those days it was customary to represent the "Yankee" as always whittling wood; probably a great many of them loved to whittle, for the ships they whittled out of their vast forests of matchless timber were in many ways probably the best expression of the art of wooden shipbuilding that the world has ever seen. The men who so deftly hewed the timbers of the famous clippers that graced the middle of the last century were not the kind of men to take kindly to angle bars and iron plates and, while it broke their hearts to see the glory of their life depart, they were unable to get their country to make any real effort to hold the commercial supremacy of the sea. To keep their place in the shipping business required the mastery of a new craft, the founding of a new art in the working and manipulation of a new material. Most of all the new industry required protection. The adoption, almost universal, of this new material necessitated a change in the industrial life of the country amounting to a revolution; this change had to come gradually and as a result of growing needs, necessities and opportunities.

The Development of an Empire.

Just about this time there was a paramount demand for all the wealth and energy of the nation. It was the dawn of the era of railways. The type of men who could handle great enterprises on the sea was all recruited to the great work of making highways for land-borne commerce and in clearing away a wilderness that a great empire might be built up in its place. The opening up of the vast interior of the continent was a more pressing necessity to the United States than learning to build ships of iron and steel. So it came about that the generation now active in the affairs of the country is purely and solely a railway generation. That is to say, that as a rule the leaders among our people, whether in finance or commerce, have been trained to regard the development of railways as the one great and absorbing field in our country for displaying their energies and talents.

Perhaps at no time in the history of the development of any other country has one generation absorbed and brought under the power and influence of civilization such a vast territory as has the present generation in the United States. While this great work was in process of accomplishment ocean commerce would appear a very small thing to the men spending billions of dollars of borrowed money on railway improvements and extensions which were opening up new States to settlement and extending the national power to regions hitherto undreamed of. The government itself, equally engrossed in the extension of its territory, allowed the shipping interests to languish while it devoted great sums and princely estates to the development of means of interior and transcontinental communication.

Evidences of Change.

There are not wanting among our citizens thoughtful men who are beginning to feel that a change in the position of this country relative to the outside world has taken place and that we shall have to go further afield for markets for the products of our labor, whether in the form of agricultural products or manufactured articles; the internal development of our resources has outstripped the external exploitation of our commerce, and the time is not far off when we shall find it is necessary to begin to anew the task of building up an ocean commerce borne out ships flying our own flag. Whenever the country at large realizes that the time has come when at last it is a national necessity that merchant ships, built in our own shipyards, offered by our own citizens, owned and operated by our progressive men of affairs shall represent our enterprise and power in all parts of the maritime world, there will be found a way to do it.

The necessity of this revival of shipping must be felt throughout the length and breadth of the country, in the interior as well as on the coast, in the North and in the South, in the East and in the West, in order to carry with it the strength and momentum to give practical results; a sentiment in favor of the desired legislation must be cultivated in such a way that the efforts to revive and stimulate shipping will be understood by the masses of the people. When this happy condition of things has been arrived at all questions regarding such matters needing legislation will receive the treatment that their importance demands.

The need of this encouragement to our foreign commerce is growing upon us faster than some people care to admit. The statistics of our trade with the world point to the approach of the time when we must reach out for a greater share of the world's trade than we have had in the past. Under present conditions the value of our exports is, in round numbers, about $1,750,000,000, and the value of our imports about $1,250,000,000, leaving a balance of about $500,000,000 in our favor. It is the balance in our favor which insures continued prosperity. With these exports and imports carried in our own ships one-half of this balance would produce the same results. Will this country be able to maintain such a balance in our favor as will enable us to continue paying about $250,000,000 every year for foreign vessels to carry it for us?

In fifty years from now the population of the United States will probably be in the neighborhood of 150,000,000 people, and if we continue to employ foreign ships to do our carrying for us we will have to export annually from eight to nine hundred millions of dollars more than we import, with a tariff as high as it is now, to maintain a balance of foreign accounts with any degree of success. Whence will come these extraordinary exports?

The growing population will continue to consume a greater and greater proportion of the edible portion of our products, leaving less for export to foreign countries, while our imports will continue without abatement, in fact may increase in amount per capita should the tariff be in any way reduced. We point with pride to our export trade of over one and one-half billions of dollars, claiming that it is the result of our skill as producers and of our foresight and ability as international merchants. I would suggest, however, that this great export trade is in nowise due to our skill as manufacturers or our ability as merchants. Of the aggregate exports, about one billion of dollars consists of raw cotton, food products, petroleum products, crude copper, lumber, and other raw materials of which we produce a surplus which the world not only wants but must have.

There is a time coming, and certain recent indications point to its rapid approach, when our increasing population will be more largely urban than it is now, when factories will multiply rapidly at the expense possibly of the increase in farms, a time when we shall need new and important markets not for our raw materials but for our manufactured articles. The rest of the world may and does now come to us in its own ships for our raw materials and the products of our farms, but it will not willingly come to us in its own ships for the products of our factories. When that time, which I think is near at hand, comes we shall need international merchants, international bankers and an international merchant marine.

Why Government Aid Is Necessary.

National conditions over which the ship-builder and shipowner as such have no control make the cost of building ships in the United States much greater, 30 per cent at least, as we have seen, than the cost of building ships in foreign countries. The cost of manning and outfitting these American built ships is also much greater, probably not less than 30 per cent, more than the similar items on foreign ships. In addition, there are other expenses in the operation of vessels which are greater in the United States than in foreign countries, such as taxes, repairs, outfit, and equipment.

Most of these higher costs are the outgrowth of a condition resulting from the policy of high protection to industries. This policy, as we have seen, was first adopted by the very Congress which removed all protection from shipping engaged in foreign commerce. This policy has been in action during the whole period of the decline of America's foreign shipping.

The cost of the materials used in the building and outfitting of American vessels is necessarily high because of the conditions that obtain in other industries that are highly prosperous under the influence of the protective tariff; these industries produce precisely the same materials that are employed in shipbuilding and outfitting. The wages of American shipyard hands are upon the same high scale as the materials, due to the general high scale of wages prevailing in similar industries that are possible only under tariff protection. In the matter of wages I made some time ago a comparison between the wages paid here and in twelve of the British yards. This comparison showed that the rate of wages here averaged some 90 per cent higher than in the yards there; the shipyards on our Atlantic coast were paying at that time a rate of wages averaging about 50 per cent higher than the rate obtaining in Britain.

It is sometimes claimed that the American workman is superior to his British brother and will produce as much for the wages paid as any workman in the world. There does not appear to be much foundation for this claim as applied to American shipyards, for many of the very best workmen come here from the British yards. For piece work the prices paid here are about 75 per cent, in excess of those prevailing in Britain.

While this condition continues it is futile to suggest that ships can be built as cheaply here as they can abroad. If it could be shown, which has been made at times, had any foundation in fact, shipowners who are in the foreign trade would have their ships built here and operate them under the foreign flags; the fact that they are not built at all indicates that their excessive cost renders their use impossible in competition with foreign built vessels.

If none of the other nations did any of the things they have done so long and still do for the encouragement of shipping the difference in cost of construction, operation, etc., between American and foreign vessels would suffice to make it unprofitable and hence unattractive for Americans either to invest in or build ships in the United States for the foreign trade, but when we add to these undeniable disadvantages our citizens suffer under the advantages the foreigners possess through the assistance and regulations of their governments, then the reason why American vessels carry only about 7½ per cent of our total foreign commerce (which is valued at $2,800,000,000 annually) and the reason why foreign vessels carry about 92½ per cent, collecting for this service freight charges and adding to $250,000,000 annually, can be readily understood.

Chapter XV.

A VISION AND A VOW.

SILAS SINGHAM'S days in jail, as punishment for contempt of court, afforded him the first extended period of physical rest he could remember to have taken, and he gave himself up to it without sense of shame because he believed himself to be in the right, and the law, or the court's exposition of the law, in the wrong. Others had suffered for conscience's sake, and why should he not?

But if his body was at rest, his mind was not. He applied it to the issue in hand with an intensity that made him as weary when night came as though he had followed the plow all day, so that he stretched himself upon his iron bed at night well disposed for sound sleep until morning. And so the time passed quickly and not unfruitfully.

The day of his deliverance from jail, having duly purged himself from contempt of court by suffering the measure of its displeasure, was a day made memorable. A great surprise was in store for Silas Singham. Not only did all of the neighbors turn out to do him honor in the hour of his liberation, but the "dry" farmers of the county joined in making the event one of great significance. A brass band was imported from Fresno, a great feast was spread on the court-house lawn, and at the hour of noon, when the jail doors were thrown open and Silas Singham strode forth, he found himself in the hands of a committee who conducted him to the head of the tables, escorted by a band of school girls clad in white and strewn flowers in his path, while the band played and the people cheered, and, from a blacksmith shop hard by, the anvil-cannon boomed a salute.

The oratory was deferred until after the hungry were filled, when John Middleton, on behalf of the assembled multitude, assured the guests of the honor that the demonstration was not made by a lawless people out of disregard for the law, but out of regard for one who, for their sakes, had endured contumely in protest against what they believed to be a mistaken interpretation of the law.

In his reply to the address Silas Singham made the speech of his life and, whether of itself good or bad, it was a truthful representation of the man.

"My friends," he began, "my kind and thoughtful friends, I have been thirty days in the wilderness, and it has given me my first opportunity to think for myself. While my body has been within those four walls yonder, reinforced by bonds of steel, my spirit has ranged as free as the eagles that soar about yonder mountains. In area I have covered the great interior valley from rim to rim and from Shasta to the Siachapi. In time I have covered so much of eternity as is confined between the uplifting of the Sierra Nevada mountains from out of the deep, when the spirit of the Lord moved on the face of the waters, and the transformation of this great interior valley into a garden of Eden began. Such a time it will become when man's laws have been made to conform to God's laws, and enterprise shall have made use of nature's bounties for man's comfort.

"Yes, I have seen the making of this our Eden that is to be. The Lord hath shown me the power of His works. I have seen this vast region a landlocked bay extending from Red Bluff to the foot of Tejon mountain. I have seen innumerable snow storms of innumerable ages falling upon the upheaved bulk of mountains rising range after range. I saw those snows melt with the warmth of the springs and summers of innumerable years and pour converging rivulets of waters into the canyons, chiseling the rocks away and filling the bay below with layer after layer of sediment brought down from above. As season succeeded season, and the streams came running into the valley at right angles to its trend, they heaped their burdens of detritus across the valley, and the great settling basins were made, sediment was deposited more evenly and dreary mudflats were upraised, the salt waters were forced back and the dry lands appeared.

"The sun dried the surface, the winds rose and whipped the mud into dust and the dust into windrows, making more settling basins which the recurring floods broke down, draining the higher basins to the lower levels, only to have the process repeated until the valleys were upraised more than a thousand feet and the mountains had lost half their altitude. The consummation of the Lord's working without haste and without weariness is the broad valley, all of made land with soil deep as the wellsprings of human hope and rich as the bounty of God's love.

"I saw vegetation spring up and scatter its seed, and little earth-born animals appear to burrow in the soil and let the air into it to vitalize it. Then larger animals came, and finally men and women; but they were red men and women who went about half-naked, lived on the nuts that fell from the trees, on the roots of grasses and the flesh of animals and fishes, but sowing no seeds and improving no breeds of animals.

"Then came the white man, bringing cattle to eat the herbage, but only as dire necessity compelled did he take out the demonstration in the sand on the river bed at points most convenient for himself, and proceed to water a few acres at the largest expenditure of water with the smallest benefit to the land.

"Then I came, advance guard of you 'sandlappers,' to spy out the country. As the cattle man did little better than the Indian, inasmuch as he brought domestic stock to eat the wild feed, so we did a little better than the cattle man by bringing domestic seed to sow in place of the wild grasses, but no one of us is doing the Lord's will with our heritage. We are none of us making of it an Eden.

"To support a Christian family as Americans ought to live, as many as 400 head of these common cattle will be required to be kept by each family. It will require at least ten acres to sustain each animal, on an average, and, therefore, an average holding of 4,000 acres to the family will be necessary if this is to be a stockman's country. It is not much of an Eden that this valley will make at that rate.

"As for us 'sandlappers,' I have given 'dry' farming a fair trial. It has been weighed and found wanting. The handwritting upon the wall is plain to be seen. Failures and partial failures of crops will consume our substance and the substance out of the soil. There is no Eden to be looked for in that direction. We deceive ourselves to our hurt if we think there is.

"Let us take the waters out of the rivers where they enter upon the plains and before they are half lost in the sands. As we increase in wealth let us cement our canals and ditches that there may not be loss by seepage; let us build reservoirs for the impounding of flood waters, or construct distributing systems for the ramification of the valley in wet seasons, so making reservoirs of the sub-soil, and when, in the fulness of time, these things are done, instead of supporting one animal to each ten acres, our cattle men shall sustain at least two animals to the acre and they shall be so much better of breed, and dairy products shall be so valuable that forty cows shall be the equivalent of four hundred of our mustang stock-cattle, 'rustling' for themselves, and every forty acres shall be a farm with a prosperous family living on it.

"Good friends, this is the end toward which we must strive. This is the new Eden out of which the Lord our God will not thrust us forth. I have seen it all as in a vision and I heard celestial voices proclaim: 'The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof; for he has founded it upon the seas and established it upon the floods. Oh! that men would praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men. He turneth rivers into a wilderness and there he maketh the hungry to dwell that they may prepare a city of habitation, and sow fields and plant vineyards, and he suffereth not the cattle to decrease, as we have seen them whiten our plains with their bleaching bones.'

"But friends, we must first make man's law conform to God's law. The laws of God are the laws of God, and those laws only ought we to obey. I would be just to the riparianists. They came here first, and first in time should be first in right, and they should irrigate their riparian lands before we irrigate ours; but they must join with us in taking the waters out of the thirsty sand, and the dry ground, and so receive their waters through lateral ditches running back toward the river channels, which must be left open for drainage.

"I have seen it all from Alpha to Omega, and in that jail yonder, in the lone watches, I have heard the voice of duty, and I see no ground against riparianism and waste as Joshua went up against Jericho, and you are likely to hear my trumpet blowing any hour of the day or night. If you stand fast when you hear the call, the 'sandlappers' will prevail, and that right mightily.

"I have read that the best way to get rid of a bad law is to enforce it, and if you find me a riparianist of riparianists for a season, don't marvel at it. My plans are laid, and I must haste to put them into execution, for I say to you here and now that I have resolved to go up against the monstrous doctrine that would make a wilderness of what should be an Eden, and neither love of women nor hate of men shall dissuade me from my purpose."

"There was cheering when he had concluded and a general shaking of hands by everyone present, each promising to strengthen him in whatever he might undertake to do. And so the assemblage broke up, and the long procession of carriages, farm wagons and horsemen took its way to Tulare, preceded by the band, and when it got there another informal reception was held, more cheers and pledges of support were given, then a final disbanding for home.

"It had been a great day for the 'sandlappers,' and especially so for 'St. Sling'em,' as he had been commonly called ever since the day at Hell's Half Acre when he threw the dam-breakers into the water as though they had been bullfrogs.

Chapter XVI.

A WAY TO THE PROMISED LAND.

"John," demanded Silas Singham as he burst into Attorney Middleton's office the very next day after his release from jail, "I want your individual attention for half a day. Lock the door so that we may not be disturbed and let us get down to business."

"At your service," was the reply, and the two went at it.

"You see, it is this way," continued Singham, when he had tossed his big pipe hat into a corner and thrown himself into a chair. "I am going to take a heap of money to take the water out of the river high enough up the stream to avoid the sands, and so save it for the dry lands. The people ain't got the money, but they have got the land, and if the land can get the water it will become good security for the money needed. All we need is ditches; besides, it is right that the land that gets the water should bear the expense."

"Now we voted bonds to build a school house out at Enterprise district; why can't we vote bonds to build ditches if we can make an irrigation district big enough? All we need is the law and the votes, and I'll get the votes if you'll get the law, and you've got to go to the legislature."

"Men have gotten together here and formed first a county, and then school districts, and now we have two towns in the county that are incorporated. All of these have voted bonds for one thing or another, should the bonds and spent the money for things the people wanted. Why cannot we do the same for irrigation ditches? It is as simple as swapping horses. Get busy now, and let's draft an irrigation district.

And so they fell to work, these two, in that dingy little office, to draw a law for submission to the next legislature whereby the desert wastes of California might be made to blossom. It was no easy task, nor was it an easy task to elect John Middleton to the legislature over the opposition of all the riparianists and big land owners of the county, but it was done, and this is how it was done:

The county was normally Democratic by a majority of 400. John Middleton was a Republican. The saloons were the recognized center of political activity, and they were mainly Democratic, too. Silas Singham had little use for liquor, though he could take a drink upon occasion without compunction, but he detested saloons and rarely went about them. John Middleton began life as a bartender, read law between other men's drinks, and so grew from one bar to practice at another; and the saloon atmosphere was neither unfamiliar nor wholly unbearable to him, although he had outgrown the environment. But he had repeatedly guyed the Democrats and denounced their principles from every platform in the county, and now he had to have Democratic votes or fail of election.

Although Singham and Middleton kept their own counsel as to legislative plans beyond the merest outline, the riparianists "smelt a mice," as the saying was, and early took the offensive. They knew that "money talked" in saloon campaigns, and so they poured it out in abundant supply. Their candidate for the assembly was a young fellow just out of college and the law school, a boy orator with plenty of rhetoric with his easy reach, and he was looked upon as the coming public man of the county. John Middleton was as plain as "Dick's hot hand," no orator at all, but gifted with a faculty for roasting and toasting his adversaries that made them wary of him.

The campaign waged fast and furious. Silas Singham sought out every individual in the county who needed water, talked him to his side and set him at work, while John Middleton roamed over the county singing his opponents, the riparianists and the fogies on the bench, to his heart's delight whether he made votes or not. Blythe Holland took charge of the saloon end of the campaign, but at the dry side of the argument had little cash to spend that way the heart of Blythe waxed heavy and his spirits drooped the more as the campaign progressed. While he could carry as much liquor as the best of them, the lines of misery he could make face the bars over the county were lamentably short compared to those that Moses Brayton and his handy men could line up. The only defensive line he could throw out to advantage was through the device of inducing a crowd of his own adherents, of known stand-pat proclivities, to follow Brayton's men from bar to bar to drink up their money to no effect. He called these his Unquenchable Band of Hope.

It had been a hard fight, and a bit three-cornered, for the third party, the Prohibitionists, were making the fight of their lives for a full ticket. Their candidate for the assembly was a farmer-preacher whose farm had the largest area of alkali on it, and the least good land, of any quarter section in the settlement where he lived. He drove the oldest mules attached to the rickettiest conveyances and raised the poorest crops; but he could talk like a coyote on any possible subject for fifteen minutes. If he ventured to talk sixteen minutes interest lagged, and if for twenty minutes he was undone. His information, or imagination, never sufficed for more than a quarter of an hour. After that it was the same thing over and over again. Had he known enough to stop when he had finished he would have proven invincible; but he didn't. Always he talked on, and on, and on, until he had himself again and again, and finally down and out.

As there must be an end to all things, there was an end, or almost the end, of the campaign. Three days only intervened. There was a gathering of the "dry" clans at Tom Helm's saloon, John Middleton's informal headquarters. All the workers had been called in from the county to compare notes. The prospects were dubious, or, to put it more plainly, seemingly hopeless for Middleton. Brayton had marshaled his forces well, and Blythe Holland's Unquenchable Band of Hope had been unable to drink Brayton's "sack" to the dregs. Blythe was not at the meeting. His absence was looked upon as unaccountable.

Presently Blythe slipped in through the alley-way door. "Mum!" he said, holding his hand up warningly. "Not a word, and don't one of you dare to leave until I get back. I am in conference with the Prohibition central committee."

They gave him the ha-ha and he was gone again. It was an hour before he returned, and when he did it was through the same door, opened just wide enough to let him in. He had his red handkerchief tied over the lower part of his face and with fist clenched and index finger protruding like a pistol he demanded "sacks up!" and when the hands were up in the spirit of the thing, "Now stand on your heads until I shake the cash out of your jeans. Got to have it."

"What for?" they called in concert. "It's this way," he explained. "I am at heart a Prohibitionist, as you all know. Never saw any good thing come out of a gargle shop yet. No, thank you, Tom, not for twenty minutes. It would make my breath smell, and that would queer the whole job. Well, as I was saying, my Prohibition friends are up against it. The 'Prohib' ticket got for five hundred straight votes from top to bottom, no matter whose name is on it. They won't look to see. They are voting for principle, while you sealawags are voting for pelf. That's why I am a Prohibitionist."

There was another loud ha-ha, after which Blythe resumed: "They are out of 'soap' worse than we are, have blown in their whole treasury importing preachers from outside to talk temperance to the people, while you fellows are working to the same end by trying to drink everything up faster than the distilleries and breweries can turn it out. Their tickets are still unprinted and the Blatter man won't print them until the coin is in hand. He hasn't been paid for the last ones. That takes fifty dollars, and there isn't that much cash in the whole Prohibition constitution. They're dead up against it. Me to the rescue! Says I, just take that farmer-preacher's name off your ticket and put John Middleton's on and in fifteen minutes I'll be back with fifty 'plunks' for the tickets, and the county will be safe."

"And will you believe it? It took me more than an hour to beat the righteousness, patriotism and necessity of the scheme into their impractical heads, but I did it. The farmer-preacher's resignation is in escrow in the hands of the chairman of their committee—press of business, duty to family, you understand—the principle is bought by with his ticket, and for the money, and you fellows are delaying proceedings and endangering the results by making me explain why I want the money instead of coughing up on the mere assurance of my well known probity of character. Fifty dollars, even money, seven hundred votes, to go on—and John Middleton is elected, with a hundred votes to spare."

"We can't sell whisky unless we have water to go with it," observed Tom Helm, as he turned to his safe and tossed a twenty out on the bar. The other fellows fumbled around in their pockets and made up the balance, which Blythe Holland promptly swept into his pocket and slid for the alley-door, as he had come in.

And that is how John Middleton was elected with a hundred votes to spare, greatly to the surprise and chagrin of the river men, for not a word was said, or a thing of it known, until election morning when the tickets were being handed out at the polls. "A mere fusion," as Blythe Holland explained it, "of irrigation water with water for drinking purposes —the salvation of the former however it may affect the latter." Is it any wonder that John Middleton found a job for Blythe Holland as clerk of a legislative committee when they both went to Sacramento?

Chapter XVII.

THE YEARS AT THE UNIVERSITY.

To Helen Singham the University of California was an institution of learning. To Clayton Brayton it was an opportunity to see out into a larger life than he had been brought up in. While Helen lost herself in her studies, and only came to herself in her horseback rides with Gabriel, for health's sake, Gabriel was self-conscious to a degree. He was painfully aware that he was not as grown as a side of bacon, that his clothes were not tailor made, and that his feet and hands were obvious.

He saw, too, that while Helen appeared as fresh and lithe and as well formed as any girl on the campus, she was unmistakably from the back country, and her clothing, becoming enough in its plainness and simplicity, was not such as the sorority girls wore. It lacked what his lacked—dash, and she lacked what he did not—a desire to cut a dash. He wanted to be abreast of the best of them. She wanted to make the most of her time, for she did not know how long her moment would last, or if there would be any more when that was gone.

Athletics had had a minor place in the Tulare high school under Professor Hamilton. To his way of thinking the body was an indispensable incumbance to the mind, whose development was the one concern worthy of a second thought.

Clayton Brayton had done his full share of breaking bronchos and roping steers, and his muscles were as well developed as they could be in a lad of eighteen.

He stood six feet tall, and in his examination at the gymnasium, weighed 180 pounds stripped to the buff. His examiner gave him a clean bill of health and "tipped him off" to the instructor in athletics as promising material.

But he was timid and the athletic spirit had not dawned on him. He was not interested in getting himself into top-draw togery and appearing on the campus with a pipe in his mouth. The position of the freshmen in the college life was galling to him, and when the sophomores undertook to break up the freshmen class, organized by the faculty, his fighting mad. Yet nothing important would have occurred if he had not himself been tackled. That appealed to him as a fight, and a fight he made it, with sorry results for three or four sophs who came within reach of his right arm. They left black eyes to spare despite his awkwardness as a boxer, and the freshman class was enabled to complete its organization. This incident gave him a distinction that made him all the more conscious of self and determined him to learn what the gym had to teach. This, as much as anything else, certainly more than any conscientious scruples, kept him free from the formation of bad habits which, otherwise, he would have been perilously near doing. He was by nature "sporty." His father was so before him, and in that atmosphere he was brought up. Hence he was no long time in getting into the full swing of the athletic life of the university.

In the cultural studies he fared less well. There was no background of cultural tendency upon which to build. Helen's home had been filled with books and magazines, since she could remember, his with newspapers. Helen upbraided him for his lack of scholarship and suggested that he go to the "cow college" instead of to the college of letters. He went, and for the first time found that which appealed to him. He had had to do with live things all his life, would probably have to do with them as long as he lived, and in the cow college he remained. This cost him something in social station, and would have cost more if he had not shone in the athletic field and proven a liberal sportsman by his interest in agricultural studies was genuine. He could see the use of them.

But he had not divided his university allowance, as Helen had done, by the number of weeks in the University year, so as to know just how much could be expended each week.

His bank account began to run low before the second semester was more than half through and he hardly knew what to do. His father, though liberal, was not a spendthrift, and knew the value of money. He had tried to appeal to him. His mother, he knew full well, would send him her last nickel if he asked for it, but her only independent source of revenue was her chickens and turkeys and it made him feel mean to the last degree to take a dollar of her money. In his perplexity he turned his eyes to the Emeryville racetrack, then just under way. He studied its methods, timed its horses, tried a few ventures with the book-makers, and finally found what he was looking for, a lad who could learn to ride, but as he had not thoroughly learned as yet was not much in demand.

Then he went to Helen. "No, that would be gambling. Nothing else could be made of it. Roanoke should not run."

"But he had run for money once, and, if he had not, she would not now be there at college. It was only now that it was his turn to send his services that horse racing was so bad."

It was the nearest to a quarrel that the two had ever come, and to refuse him did look like ingratitude, inasmuch as Gabriel had borne the whole expense and care of his keep since coming to Berkeley, "just to have him company for Peacock," as he had been careful to explain.

"But Roanoke would not run his best without her on his back, and for her to ride at the Emeryville races was unthinkable."

"Perhaps that, too, could be managed. He, Gabriel, had found a likely boy who should have full care of Roanoke every day. Helen should introduce him to the horse and explain the matter fully. Perhaps the horse might take a liking to the boy. There would be no harm in that."

The experiment was made. Helen took the boy to the horse, explained the situation the best she could, took the lad's hand in hers and with it stroked the horse's nose and neck. After that the horse was fed, watered, exercised, and through him the young jockey came to be kept at a stall adjacent to his in the barn. It had been only every two or three days that Roanoke had seen his mistress since they came to Berkeley, while the boy was with him night and day for more than a month. Perhaps that made the difference. Anyway, the boy and the horse got on well together. Peacock also was trained. He looked every inch the running horse. Roanoke did not. Gabriel had planned well the class the horses would run in, and entered them with as little ostentation as possible. If the college authorities learned of it there would be trouble. On the event Gabriel had staked all he had and all he could borrow. It was win or go home in disgrace before the college year was out.

The day came. Helen was to slip off from her associates, go to the racetrack and view the race from the grandstand. Roanoke acted badly. He threw his rider during the warming-up process, and was clearly in bad temper. Helen must go down to the stall and talk to him. She went. Roanoke seemed much mollified, but when the lad went to mount again he threw the third rider against the post, enough this time to put him out of commission. Evidently the horse's toleration of the boy was not to extend to great events like this. If he could not be ridden by his own mistress he would not run. Gabriel was at his wits' end. There was only one possible salvation for him. He must slip into the box stall, change her clothes for the jockey's and ride the race. She would not. She must. There was not time for parleying. She did.

Never was costume changed quicker. She reached the starting point barely in time to be off with the others. The tears so filled her eyes she could barely see. Never had she seen so many people, nor ever heard such a clattering of hoofs upon a track. Through her tears she saw three horses ahead of her, then there were only two, but ever so many just behind whirling and twisting. And so they went, the quarter, the half, the three-quarter. Then her horse's head was at the rumple of the foremost, then neck and neck! the goal was getting nearer, almost there; "yip-e! yip-e! yip-e!"

and she went under the wire a length ahead, but with some other horse so near that she could feel his hot breath. Right on around the track at a fast canter, not daring to go back through the crowd, and so to the stable, where Gabriel ran breathlessly to meet her. Into the stall she went, out of her jockey suit, into her own clothes anyhow she could, and straight for the gate and home, cheeks hot, eyes brimming, too angry and ashamed to look at Gabriel or care what became of Roanoke.

An hour later Gabriel rang the bell at Helen's boarding house. "Could he see Miss Singham?"

"He could not," the Japanese boy brought answer. "Miss Singham not at home to Mr. Brayton."

He would see about that himself. Thrusting the Japanese boy aside, Gabriel bounded along the hall and up the stairs three steps at a time and threw himself against the locked door of her room. The bolt gave way and, half falling, half standing, the impetuous youth faced the girl rising from the sofa, eyes red, face aflame, hands clenched. "How dare you!"

"Helen, I love you! Helen, you shan't hate me. Helen, forgive me this once and I'll never bet on another horse race one long as I live. I never will, so help me God, and Helen, see here," as he emptied first one fist purse and then another on the table; "it's all yours. It's Roanoke's share. Peacock won enough to see me through. He followed Roanoke nose to tail all the way round, doing his best to keep up. See, Helen, there is more than enough to pay your way through the university all next year. Helen, I'm awful sorry—no, I ain't, either; I'm glad. No, that ain't the right thing to say. I'm glad and sorry both, but I can't stand it to have you look at me that way, like a panther just ready to spring. I love you, girl! Don't you understand I love you?"

Yes, she understood, or began to understand. The situation dawned upon her little by little. Her hand that had clenched so that the nails dug into her palms, relaxed; her bosom heaved. The fire went out of her eyes and the flame came in its stead. She prepared him to fight, and when Gabriel held his arms out to her she threw herself into them and fell sobbing against his bosom.

"It was all so horrible," she said, when at last she had recovered herself so that she could talk. "What would the other girls say if they knew? And what if the university faculty should find out? We would both be expelled and sent home in disgrace. She had thought that he had been selfishly willing to put her to shame merely that he might have money with which to pay his debts of extravagance. It made her almost hate him, but if he were really sorry and really loved her as he said she did, and wouldn't do so any more—no, not ever again—she would forgive him and—love him, too. Oh why was it that such bad things sometimes turned out so awfully profitable!"

From that day forth these two frankly confessing lovers finished their college courses without further incident worthy of especial mention. She prepared herself for teaching and he prepared himself to be a scientific farmer. He took stock in horses, prepared himself to revolutionize the farming and stock interests of his county. For he learned to love his work, and the honors he took in the track team and in football gave him quite as much of a standing on the masculine side of university life as honors for scholarship gave to Helen among the co-eds.

THE GRAFT CASES.

The trial of Patrick Calhoun has been postponed until November 15th. This was done because of the sickness of the defendant, through his attorneys, that he could not obtain a fair trial while the present municipal political campaign is in progress. The prosecution consented to the postponement.

The hospital of which Dr. Martha G. Ripley is in charge is said to have the lowest death rate of any institution of the kind in this country or Europe. It is the Maternity Hospital of Minneapolis.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Mill Valley, Cal., October 1, 1909.

Editor: The California Weekly. I have been thinking of the managers of a business knows the detail work of a store made. I am convinced it would be in the hands of a director to help in the management of the firm to be able to employ a given amount of work. I have a feeling that the way up from errand boy or else has understood some older and wiser head, in an exact efficiency as to the place and only in creating efficiency will hold it.

The knowledge that justice exists is most gratifying and ennobling to all, so for each dollar the best service and the best materials should be given and received. Probably women feel a lack of justice, they feel that their position and work in a home are secondary and they seem to be responsible. Therefore twice as much money must be earned (if not borrowed or stolen) to keep women under the paid supervisor just as we rely more fully upon the manager's judgment than upon the errand boy's or bookkeeper's judgment than upon more fully upon the home-maker's or dietitian's judgment than upon the Chinese cook's or Jap waiter's judgment.

A woman to be rightly placed in a home should be kept as a homemaker, thus distinguishing her from the paid house-keeper, cook, waitress, etc., and in dignifying the name the position will be dignified, and in the position of a homemaker, she will be able to do self-satisfaction to work well done, and let us hope that she will earn the priceless blessing of some noble person's love. Is there, after all, anything more difficult?

MARY ROBINSON THOMAS

The home is the foundation of civilized society. In comparison with it all other institutions among men are relatively unimportant. For this reason The California Weekly purports giving increased attention to whatever may help to exalt the home and woman's place in the home. Woman's place in the home has nearly always been subordinate and often menial and she has had less than she should have been entitled to from inventive genius and scientific research to help her to make home-making easy, intellectual, a fine art and a great happiness.

The California Weekly is in no great hurry to go the length of endowing woman with the elective franchise, although it entertains the expectation that the hope that she will ultimately attain her equal station with the opposite sex. There are other concerns more vital to woman, more important to humanity for which we can wait less well than for equal suffrage. The broken homes we see on every hand are not the product of a denied suffrage. A great many of them are due to the fact that home-making has not, as a general thing, reached the dignity of art or science.

Contributions in the direction here suggested, while they cannot as yet be paid for, will be thankfully received by The Editors of The California Weekly.

"CALIFORNIA ANNUAL."

The California Promotion Committee has just issued a revised edition of the "California Annual." This edition contains statistics for the year 1908. In addition, it includes a rapid, but comprehensive, survey of the advantages of life in California, under such sub-titles as History, Topography, Climate, Soil, Irrigation, Agriculture, Outdoor Life, etc. Each of these subjects is handled in a most graphic manner, giving facts concerning them in a way that is impressive and especially appealing to one who desires concrete knowledge of conditions. The book is one that entertains as well as instructs and is especially adapted to outside circulation. Every Californian who has friends away from the state who ask questions will find the book admirably answers all of them so far as the industries are concerned. The book is sold by the committee at ten cents a copy, the exact cost of production, postage prepaid.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The New Constitution and Public Morals.

Those interested in this department of the California Weekly will do well to bear in mind that when the new constitution was before the people for adoption it was vehemently opposed by that element in our social life which looks upon itself as especially prudent, safe and sane—the social backbone without which society would go to pieces in short order. They branded the document as revolutionary, socialistic and economically unsound, if not actually immoral in its tendencies. They made a strenuous campaign against its adoption and, in fact, it carried by a majority of only 11,000 votes out of 145,000 cast at the election.

The writer of these articles has felt it worth while to analyze the document to see if, in fact, it was so very bad. After thirty years of reflection and observation we should be able to approach the issue with unruined tempers and in a spirit anything rather than partisan. With this object in view the attention is further invited to a consideration of the new constitution of California in its relation to the moralities of public life.

The old constitution guaranteed the free profession and worship of all religious sects, with the wise provision that such freedom must not be construed to allow practices inconsistent with the safety or peace of the State. The new constitution made this section its own without addition or limitation.

One of the most demoralizing institutions anywhere tolerated is the lottery. It is commonly said that mining is a gamble, and it would be only natural to suppose that, in the early days when mining was the chief industry in California, the State government would have been lenient toward lottery enterprises. Such was not the case. Mining was a hazard of fortunes, but not a gamble. The gambler produces nothing and makes no attempt to increase the general supply of money or anything else, but only to gather in and redistribute by chance what has already been produced. Anyhow, the old constitution forbade the lottery, and the new one copied the old section just as it stood.

In relation to the crime of the bribery of a legislator the new constitution is extremely severe, even going so far as to abolish the legal maxim that an accused person can not be required to testify against himself, or to avail himself of the excuse that such testimony, if given, may tend to incriminate him or subject him to public infamy. This was, at the time, taking advanced ground in sustaining public morals.

The use of public funds for private profit is made a felony by the new constitution. Therefore many public officials, having public moneys in their charge, had lent money to banks or to private persons at low rates of interest, and pocketed the interest. It cannot be said that the practice was wholly broken up by virtue of this provision, but it is no more common than ordinary defalcations and far less common than graft in the other moneys.

Section 2 of Article XX deprives all persons convicted of dueling, either as principals or seconds, or of sending or accepting challenges to light duels, of the right to hold any office of profit or to exercise the right of suffrage. It is not impossible that the Terry-Broderick tragedy may have been the provoking cause for incorporating this provision into the new constitution, although many other states had taken similar action during the Civil war. At all events it was on the side of sound public morals.

The provision of the old constitution making one who had employed bribery in securing his appointment to office ineligible for holding any office of profit was adopted into and made a part of the new constitution. It is unfortunate that this provision is not held to reach other forms of bribery as well as that which implies the use of money or other thing of value. Men are as truly bribed with office as by money, and many an official bribes his way to a position of profit and political preferment through the use of patronage as certainly as, under former conditions, officials sometimes bought and paid for their positions outright.

When the public mind comes to discriminate more clearly between the right and wrong ways of office getting there will be more offices seeking men and fewer men seeking office.

Section 6 of Article X prohibits the farming, or contracting out, of prison labor, a system under which great abuses had grown up in this and other states. This was a step in the right direction, but California has now gone to the extreme of forbidding the employment of prisoners at gainful pursuits, outside of the requirements of the prisons themselves (except as to jute bags and crushed rock), out of which as bad a state of affairs has grown up as out of the other system.

It may be objected that, while the new constitution contains little that is immoral in tendency, and much that makes it easy for public officials and private citizens to do right, yet there are some right things contained in the constitutions of other states that are not to be found in the new constitution of California.

There is some truth in this, but the spirit of California is not, on the whole, well disposed toward compulsory righteousness. It leaves the people free to observe the Sabbath, for instance, as well as they can, while other people are equally free not to observe it. It makes temperance perfectly practicable, but it is not disposed to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors. While there is comparatively little in the document to enforce exemplary conduct, there is nothing in it that puts a premium upon misconduct.

On the whole, few apologies need be made for the new constitution of California on the score of moral delinquency. It was fully abreast with, if not in advance of, the prevailing moral standards of the people then and since then.

When the manuscript of "Inconstant George," John Drew's new play, came from the binder's, to be added to the large bookcase that stands in Charles Frohman's private office, it was found to be number 400—that being the exact number of plays Mr. Frohman has produced since he began his career as a manager.

"The Coast of Chance," a California play, by Eugene W. Presby, will be presented in New York in the early part of November, after a week in Toronto and a week in Montreal. Hamilton Revelle will take the leading part. The play is adapted from the novel of the same name by the Misses Esther and Lucia Chamberlain of San Francisco.

Thompson Buchanan, the young newspaper man whose comedy, "A Woman's Way," provided Grace George with one of the successes of last season, is to make his second bid for fame as a playwright at the Bijou theatre on Wednesday evening, when his new comedy, "The Intruder," is to have its first metropolitan performance, under the managerial wing of William A. Brady and Joseph R. Grismer.

Will Mr. Crocker Further Explain?

Will Mr. "Bill" Crocker, as he prefers to be called, that he may not be confused in the public mind with certain scions of the royal family of that name, kindly explain what he means by promising, if elected, to pursue a more "liberal policy," as to San Francisco, a policy that "better suits a seaport town than a town of the interior," without, however, "throwing the town wide-open" or "taking off the lid"?

The California Weekly gathers from Mr. Crocker's remarks, made with a reiterated frequency, that he regards the policy maintained by the present administration as illiberal, not such a policy as befits a city frequented by seafaring men, for the liberality of Jack on shore-leave is proverbial.

Does Mr. Crocker regard San Francisco, with 1,774 licensed saloons, reinforced by 134 licensed hotels and restaurants, selling liquors with meals, as too greatly resembling the Dry Tortugas to be attractive to seafaring men? Is he of the opinion that nineteen drinking places on one side of Market street between Montgomery street and the ferry building is an insufficient number of life-saving stations to meet the reasonable needs of mariners cast ashore? Does Mr. Crocker think that the requirements of legitimate business at a seaport warrant more effective methods for standing men on their heads, and going through their clothes that their pockets may be emptied into the common fund, than are employed for a similar purpose upon ranch hands, half-sea-sick, in such interior towns as Stockton and Sacramento?

In what particular, Mr. Crocker, is San Francisco illiberal toward vice? Is the tenderloin cramped, are the dives too few, the saloons too far apart? Upon precisely what liberalizing proposals are you making this bid for the tenderloin vote in the ensuing election? It would be a misfortune to you if, after making this bid for that vote, you should fail of getting it away from McCarthy through lack of making your meaning perfectly clear. There are also some thousands of decent voters that would like to know precisely what you mean by a "liberal policy" toward vice but with the "lid" on.

In the Right Spirit.

The women of the W. C. T. U. in state convention at Pacific Grove, exhibited a more liberal policy toward a great and pressing issue than did their suffrage sisters at Stockton. Without asking whether Mr. Heney and his friends are, or are not, in favor of prohibition they heartily endorsed the effort being made in San Francisco for the establishment of equality before the criminal law and warmly espoused the candidacy of Francis J. Heney for district attorney. The sooner all hands learn that all good movements are one and inseparable the better for all causes that have a just claim upon our attention and suffrages. The allied iniquities understand this perfectly and stand, or fall, together like a row of bricks. It is by lifting what we may call the water table of public righteousness that drought, injustice and iniquity disappear, and not otherwise.

THIS NUMBER CONTAINS

A Contrast With English Justice

By Warren Olney, Sr.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

Anderson on Libel.

The California Weekly is not partial to Judge Anderson of the United States District Court of Southern Indiana. His decision in the $29,000,000 case raised a presumption that he remembered at the critical moment what influence it was that made him a federal judge.

But we are disposed to give him his due. In deciding that the persons libeled by the Indianapolis News in the famous Panama canal canard must bring suit in Indianapolis, and not in the District of Columbia, he took a reasonable view of the fitness of things. Men are often under the disagreeable necessity of going to the editor's office in order to assassinate him, why not also to prosecute him?

The judge also affirms with sanity of reasoning that the editor of a paper is under the necessity for publishing the news and for interpreting it, which he may do with liberality of statement. It is the editor's prerogative to draw inferences for the people. Great latitude must be allowed in the performance of this function or its adequate performance will be out of the question.

Take the case of the candidacy of Mr. P. H. McCarthy for mayor of San Francisco. It would be difficult to prove that the effective influence of the higher-ups, the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company and the mobilized tenderloin vote are all making common cause for the election of McCarthy and a negotiable board of supervisors, to the end that conditions which existed before the great fire may obtain again, but who doubts it? It is in the air we breathe. Things squint, and smell, and point that way unmistakably, and it is the duty of the press of the city to say so, albeit upon evidence that could not run the gauntlet of rules of evidence.

It might be almost equally difficult to prove that Sheriff Dolan is letting Abe Ruef out of jail to take a hand in the election of McCarthy, but there is evidence to that effect.

The liberty of the press must be liberally, not wantonly, construed. Howbeit, the action of the Indianapolis News in traducing notable men without evidence was wanton, Judge A. B. Anderson to the contrary notwithstanding.

Walsh and Morse.

In Chicago John R. Walsh and in New York Charles W. Morse, convicted of having used other people's money by the millions as though it were their own, and to plunge with, have successfully passed another stage in their journey toward state prison; and yet they have been on the road only about two years. Only one more stage is now in sight, the Supreme Court of the United States. Walsh's case is running neck and neck with old age, as he had passed his three-score-and-ten years before it began, and Morse's with alleged ill health. Therefore we may anticipate that, if finally convicted, the President will be besieged to spare the first because he is a "poor old man," and the other because imprisonment is likely to prove fatal. We shall then see what our big, good humored, tender hearted President will do about their cases.

Democracy and Justice.

There is no greater hope of establishing justice in this country than that such men as Warren Olney, Sr., are giving the subject their serious attention. No thoughtful person should fail of reading Mr. Olney's second article on this subject, to be found elsewhere in this paper. It goes straight to the heart of the issue.

There is in the article a note of doubt as to the quality of justice that may be hoped for under a democracy. This will not be pleasing to our vanity, but only the heedless disregard the truth that democracy is still on trial. The same spirit that, under our form of government, paralyzes the arm of justice, is manifest in sending to Washington one set of men to represent states, another to represent districts and nobody but the President to represent the common good of the American people. When we have so risen above a precinct patriotism as to make tariff bills and appropriations for army, navy, rivers and harbors, public buildings, etc., with eyes fixed upon the common welfare, and not upon local and perhaps personal advantage, then may we hope for a judiciary and a bar established on broad lines of fitness, endowed with power to establish justice.

Unless this elevation of ends and ideals is possible under a democracy then a democracy becomes impossible, and the note of doubt in Mr. Olney's article is abundantly justified. The California Weekly has faith to believe that frank treatment of these issues by leaders at the bar and in public affairs will produce the needful elevation of ideals among the people. If those ideals existed once, as Mr. Olney tells us they did, they can be restored.

The Los Angeles Express, denying on behalf of Southern California all unkindliness of spirit toward San Francisco, cheerfully admits a desire to accord the city by the Golden Gate the second most important rank of any city on the coast. Second, indeed! Now we know that Southern California quills are pointed with venom and steeped in guile.

THE MISTAKES OF HENEY.

Mr. Francis J. Heney, during the last three years, has said and done many things of which no modest, self-controlled, well-behaved, lady-like gentleman can approve. He has blustered and he has blown, he has threatened to prosecute and he has called names, he has defied his enemies and dared them to battle. The speech he made at the conclusion of the Calhoun trial would not have been tolerated in any court under the protection of the British flag, and neither would any of the speeches of any of his seven professional adversaries. Nobody—not even Mr. Heney, himself—will attempt to justify all that he has said and done. Heney has made mistakes.

But there are wrongs that cannot be wiped out with a bath sponge.

Mr. Heney has been fighting wrongs of that kind for three years without compensation and with scarcely so much as an armistice to give him time to bury his dead. If he has been peeping the Philistines with rocks, so did David of old, and if the reader will turn to I Samuel, 17th chapter, he will discover that David was not more modest in telling Goliath what he intended to do to him when he got a chance than Mr. Heney has been in telling our modern Goliath what he proposes to do to him if he can be elected district attorney and have another two years in which to campaign against an entrenched and insatiate financial rapacity.

To our way of thinking Mr. Heney lost the opportunity of a lifetime when, in closing the case against Calhoun he did not confine himself wholly within the evidence, make a clean-cut, candid and perfectly intelligible explanation of the facts, to a jury already worn to a frazzle with oratory, and leave his case with the jury all summed up in three hours instead of three days. But we have to remember that Mr. Heney had watched the empanelling of that jury for weeks and months and probably knew its temper better than any outsider could have known it. He probably understood better than any outsider that a San Francisco jury in a criminal case watches the encounter between attorneys much as a crowd at a hippodrome would watch an encounter between Jeffries and Johnson, jealous lest their money in blood, and fearful that one side or the other may "fake the fight" and "throw" the decision for a part of the swag.

And what of the audience that struggled, day after day, to get into Carpenters' hall to hear Heney—what would those people have said if he had been as mild mannered as a professor of ethics, reasoned as dispassionately as a philosopher and stopped talking when he had gotten through? Would they then have come out of that hall saying: "What a collapse!" "Heney hardly hit back at all." "Calhoun's money must have got Heney, too." After all we have to admit that Mr. Heney may have known the occasion, the time and his audience better than those of us who were looking on at a distance and in a temper at least moderately critical if not superlatively so.

Are we very certain that, while Mr. Heney was taking the public into his confidence in regard to the graft prosecutions (by way of offsetting the scandalous falsifications of a subsidized press) he would have fired the heart of justice-loving Californians had he gone from rostrum to rostrum, and pulpit to pulpit, singing a falsetto treble instead of roaring baritone, reasoning dispassionately instead of delivering philippics that made the rafters ring and set the echoes flying? That Mr. Heney can suit his temper to his audience we do know, for, at Pacific Grove, when he addressed the Methodist Conference, he roared as mildly as a sucking dove and talked as dispassionately as a supreme justice.

No, Mr. Heney's methods are not such as to commend themselves to tranquil souls devoted to sweetness and light. Not many of us could bring ourselves to do as he has done, any more than Charles Reynolds Brown, Elbert R. Dille or Bradford Levitt could bring themselves to head a procession with screaming wind instruments to "fire volleys" and wave banners in the cause of Christ, but they all of them rejoice that God gave the globe General William Booth and the Salvation Army, as they also rejoice that He gave San Francisco Francis J. Heney, at a time when San Francisco needed a Heney as much as it needed a smiling, affable Rudolph Spreckels with the "dough."

Martin Luther threw his inkstand at the devil, John Brown called men out of their beds and shot them down, Oliver Cromwell added the torch to the sword, and General Grant engaged friend and foe in a common crater—all done in the interests of the Rights of Men, and must we stop to groan in travail over the "Mistakes of Heney" in not doing as we should have done in his place, especially when no power on earth could have put us into Heney's place and make us stay put? Never mind the mistakes of Heney! It is the mistake of allowing his mistakes to be the cause of our being half-hearted in the cause of equality before the law that hurts.

WHAT IS TO BE THE END?

Man to man the question is being asked (and evaded) a thousand times a day in San Francisco, "What is to be the end of these graft prosecutions?"

In the event of the election of Mr. Charles M. Grant to the office of district attorney an answer to this question may be hazarded with small danger of being brought to confusion by an enforced confession of obscurity of prophetic vision. The motions of prosecuting Mr. Calhoun and one or two others will be gone through with, in which acquittals will promptly result, after which the rest of the indictments will be dismissed for want of evidence to convict; "civic peace" will be restored, and public service corporations will re-establish the business of grafting at the old stand in the old way with the difference that grafting officials will not be encouraged to do business independently of regularly qualified attorneys under a fee system more open to reproach than to attack. Scoundrelism will take care to be better buttressed by the forms of law. This much is easy.

With the election of Mr. Heney to the office of district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco prophecy can not be ventured with the same degree of certainty. The people of San Francisco can no more see the end than the people of America could see it when Grant was fighting it out on that line from the Wilderness by way of Spottsylvania and the North Anna to the James river and Appomattox. Only God Almighty foreknew that Appomattox and an indissoluble union awaited the end of that struggle that so tried the souls of men. But it was there from the first. Grant did not know that it was there. He only knew that the path of duty stretched out before him until lost in an invisible distance, and so he "fought it out on that line," not only all summer but all the fall and all winter and until the succeeding spring was well advanced before he reached the consummation which he knew must be reached if Lincoln's Gettysburg speech was to be fulfilled and the government of the people, by the people and for the people was not to perish from the earth.

So will it be with the graft prosecutions if Francis J. Heney is elected district attorney, with a good board of supervisors to support him. He will fight it out on this line if it takes two years to reach the end, but what that end will be is just as uncertain as was the end when Grant plunged his forces into the Wilderness in his "on to Richmond" campaign. Grant left the end in the care of the God of Battles and pressed forward. Mr. Heney must leave the end to the God of Justice and fight on, too, and it is the part of good citizenship to sustain him, to fill the ranks of the friends of the prosecution as they are thinned, as Northern manhood hurried forward to fill the depleted ranks of the Army of the Potomac.

It is not impossible that, with all the effort that Mr. Heney and his friends can put forth, rich rascality will slip through the torn meshes of the law and escape legal punishment, but if this happens it will not be without such a demonstration of the failure of our system of criminal jurisprudence as will set the best thought and conscience of nation and state to the reformation of a judicial system that has been openly confessed by the head of the nation to be a disgrace to our civilization. And this consummation, if no other, will be worth the cost of electing Heney and defeating Pickert. The election of Pickert will even prevent being tried to a logical conclusion the issue of the insufficiency of our system of jurisprudence. There will be substituted for that issue the issue of the inefficiency of a political system based upon an incorporated plutocracy, and that we have already decided to be intolerable.

Therefore, when next some one demands of the reader to know what, in the event of the election of Heney, is to be the end of the graft prosecutions, tell him that the end of the battle of the Wilderness was hopeful end resulting from that carnage was then promised to a stricken nation.

A CONSUMPTION LONG DESIRED.

It is now six years since the California Water and Forest Association undertook to induce the State of California and private owners of timber lands in California to do something for the protection of California's invaluable timber supply from destruction by fire. It was long slandering. The owners of timbered lands appeared to care the least whether their timber burned or not. When the fires were raging protective work could not be done, and when there were no fires no protection was needed, and so, with true Arkansas indifference, every season the smoke from a hundred forest fires hangs heavily upon the prosperity of our state.

The Water and Forest Association induced the Forestry Service of the United States government to prepare a model state forestry law and it was introduced into the legislature. The Southern Pacific railroad influence, and the influence of lumber men and forest owners were unitedly against it. Jere Burke got the bill pigeonholed, as he thought, for good. Governor Pardee forced it out into the open again and it was submitted to a merciless stripping to a bare skeleton, but the Pardee administration was resolved that a start, at least, should be made, and the Governor and his official family, with a few zealous friends of forestry, stayed with the fight and saw a beginning, only a beginning, toward a state forestry policy placed on the statute books, and this was done in the hope that forest owners and lumber men would finally become convinced that the state was working for their interests and not against them and that co-operation and not antagonism would result.

With the advent of Gillett the cause was again brought to the verge of the precipice. The new Governor announced his hostility to the forestry law and his intent to have that law wiped off the statute books. He knew about a redwood log from the standpoint of a logger and that was the extent of his interest in the subject of forest conservation. When this fact became known to the state the new Governor heard from the state, with the result that his attitude is believed to have been changed from one of hostility to tolerance if not to a downright championship of a constructive forestry policy for California. Perhaps the President's utterances on the subject may yield our Governor increase of faith in the new gospel.

But the most fortunate incident in this trying history was that of the coming together, in San Francisco, on Friday of last week, of representative timber owners and lumbermen, to act with the State Forester in outlining and perfecting a system of private forestry protection for California. An organization has been initiated looking toward a co-operative effort all along the line of forestry preservation. This should mean a great deal for the state and a very great deal for the timber owners and milling interests of the state.

But little of practical value will be accomplished unless the policy entered upon is abundantly "buttressed by law," as our President would express it, and that buttressing must be done through new legislation founded upon the affirmative power of the commonwealth to compel private owners to protect their holdings, or sell them to someone who will protect them, in order that the public may be protected. This is an untrod field, but it must not remain so. Every forest owner owns as a trustee for the common good and, without laws compelling the co-operation of forest owners with the state, and with other owners, there will be just enough individual timber hogs to defeat any co-operative movement based wholly upon a community of interest. It is always so in all walks of life. There are enough wanting the umbrella of protection held over them, without their holding it, to cause the umbrella to be shut up in disgust.

The beginning made on Friday last was splendid. The California Weekly heartily tenders its good offices in aid of so good a cause. It hopes that out of this movement will evolve as good a state forest policy as the Pardee administration sought to induce the timber interests to consent to five years ago this coming winter. The atmosphere was not then charged as it now is with the spirit of conservation. Theodore had not then spoken and "Big Bill" had not added his stentorian amen.

The Crane Incident.

Unless our big President enjoys trouble and grows fat on it he is not likely to be annoyed by taking on flesh until the position of minister to China has been definitely and physically filled. Not enough of publicity has yet been given to make it clear where the center of difficulty in the Crane incident really is. It may reside in a feeling in the Knox breast that the secretary of state should be consulted about diplomatic appointments, and he may feel, too, that such stations should be filled by promotion from the service and with trained diplomatists who early learn to "don't talk." But this much is clear: By taking his troubles to the press, and justifying his talking by what the President told him, instead of shielding the President at all hazards, Mr. Charles R. Crane has made himself an impossibility no matter what China or Japan may have to say about his appointment. The perfectly frank man is perfectly defenseless in politics or diplomacy and it is only on the Day of Judgment that he can face his record with serenity.

The Real Enemy of Democracy.

The profoundest enemy that democracy can have, the man most traitorous to free government, is he who would set up a government of all by a single class out of all. When class enters in democracy goes, for democracy has to do with citizens and not classes. The ideal of democracy is the sitting down together around the council table of banker and mechanic, merchant and professional man, all representing citizenship and not one representing station in life, property or poverty, title or nation of nativity. P. H. McCarthy, his party and those who are giving him aid and comfort, have, if they only knew it, arrayed themselves in open and dangerous rebellion against the very life spirit of American institutions. When class comes democratic institutions go. These men could not be more traitorous if they were striving for a monarchy. The only extenuation they can claim is that they know not what they do.

Not a Question of Party.

To talk party loyalty to any voter in relation to a municipal election is to insult his intelligence. There is not one party issue involved in the San Francisco election. The only function a party can perform in a city election is to name a ticket and there is no obligation upon any party man to vote more of his party's ticket in a city election than the best interests of his city require. Party loyalty obliges only when and where party issues are at stake. There being no party issue in municipal affairs it follows that no party obligation applies.

There is an issue before the people of San Francisco that concerns every man, woman and child. That is the graft, prosecution and the equal establishment of justice. On this issue McCarthy is openly with the grafters and Crocker will not say that he is not. Dr. Leland has been frank to say that he will stand for the graft prosecution and the platform on which he stands declares for it. This leaves independent Republicans no alternative except to stand for Leland, and that every free man among them should do.

The terror of politicians for the saloon influence in San Francisco would be laughable if its consequences were not so serious. All three mayoralty candidates made haste to throw a sop to that Cerberus. McCarthy hugged it. Crocker assured it that he was its friend, while Dr. Leland declared that the saloon business should be treated exactly like any other business, which everybody knows is not done here or anywhere. Is there no constituency not under saloon domination worth being considered in this election?

Now come careful mariners who declare that neither Peary nor Cook can be perfectly certain that he reached the pole, and for the reason of the variability of instruments and calculations under conditions which must obtain in every polar expedition. If this be so then about the only way to prove that one has been to the pole is to go right on over the top of the earth and come down the other side.

Among the misfortunes which from time to time have befallen San Francisco the decision of Rabbi Stephen S. Wise to accept New York, and not San Francisco, as his field of labor may well be classed as not the least.

On the whole, President Taft left California without having either gained or lost in flesh or anything else.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Of all the hardships encountered by Dr. Frederick A. Cook on his expedition to the north pole no other single experience so weighed upon his soul as passing beyond the line of life. The storms of the boreal regions, the bitterness and intensity of cold, the limitless ice, the cutting winds, the horizon shrouded with impenetrable fogs and mists, the hunger, the looking into the toothless jaws of starvation, the venturing upon a fifty-mile stretch of open water in a little canvas boat that must have swamped in any sea—all these he could stand without the heart sinking into depths of despair; but to pass beyond the line of any living thing, to be alone with his Esquimaux and his dogs beyond the line of life in any form, beyond the whirr of wing, chirp of insect, cry of wolf, growl of bear; beyond where, of the twenty millions of forms of life known to exist in the world, not one had survived; no seal, no walrus, no fish, no bird and no beast, only the strongest mind (or the dullest) could stand that strain and suffer reason to sit secure at the helm of purpose. Out in that breathless, lifeless (and therefore deathless) zone of cold the soul of man stands alone with God and eternity. Of what undaunted metal must that man be fashioned who can see and feel and know the awfulness of that truth and yet struggle on to his hitherto unreach goal!

And yet do we not all of us, almost every night of our lives, look out upon just such a scene? The moon is dead and Mars has no atmosphere. There is small probability that life, as we know it, can exist upon a single one of the planets belonging to our solar system. The stars we see are mainly boiling, burning, heaving, tossing agonies of unconsumable gases, white hot, and betwixt our earth and these lies a fathomless abyss of space blacker than polar night, more bitter than polar cold, voiceless, measureless, cold, alone with God and eternity.

Yet out upon that untracked waste of space there have ventured more men almost than there are stars in the firmament or grains of sand by the sea, and they have gone forth, more alone than was Cook, attended by neither man nor dog, not trembling nor dragged to the brink by force, but resignedly if not boldly, not infrequently with joy. Sometimes, indeed, they have leaped into the arms of that abyss of their own volition, pursuing life and hungering for oblivion.

Is it any wonder that there are those who wander along the brink of that void, as near to the edge as they dare venture, with hand to ear listening, if perchance, by straining very hard, they may catch some whisper, some answer to their call into that voiceless deep? Is it any wonder that men of science have formed societies for psychical research that they may, with unshared patience, test with scientific methods the value of every variable of phenomena that can lay the faintest claim to having an origin beyond that dead line? One by one all stand as Cook stood in farthest north, alone with eternity and God, and then, in the twinkling of an eye, the plunge is taken, the transition made, and the soul passes, waving no hand, whispering no perfectly authenticated syllable of remembrance. The chasm closes and the eternal voicelessness of ice and snow, cold and darkness, exists to laugh at our hopes and baffle our fears.

Down through the ages, from the dwelling of the cave men to the palaces of present-day kings, the spark of hope for a life beyond that impenetrable night has not ceased to burn, and, sustained by that spark, based on no tangible, material evidence, men and women go down into the valley of shadow fearing no evil. And yet, if science could yield so absolute, tangible proof that so much as one microbe died and survived to live again, with continuity of personality, the discovery would be heralded by the world as the crowning glory of all ages! Believing is not knowing, and, if we all of us, dreadfully want to know if immortality be true,

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Aeroplane and the Sahara.

The airship evidently is going to stay, the methods of which it can do practical service are under consideration. Such a method has been suggested by Dr. Quinton, president of the National Aerial League of France, and the French authorities are giving it serious attention. French officers in Marseilles announce three dreary months in crossing the Sahara desert on their way home. Dr. Quinton would have them cross it in three days, of eight hours each, by means of aeroplanes. The distance is 1,000 miles, and the doctor holds that it would be better and pleasanter to cross it at the rate of 330 miles a day than at the rate of eleven miles, the scenery of Sahara becoming monotonous if indulged in too long. Two or three stopping places would be required, and it would be highly desirable that the airships be so perfected that there would be no danger of stopping between stations, as a long walk on the desert is considered dryly tiresome. However, when the aeroplane has been perfected, as it will be, Dr. Quinton's plan should be both feasible and vastly advantageous. It is so probable that airship travel over the great desert will be a feature of no distant days.

Is Japan Preparing for War with Russia?

The St. Petersburg Novoe Vremya is a Russian newspaper, and views affairs through Russian spectacles, but it is a paper of influence and must be recognized as giving the Russian view of events. Hence the announcement of its belief that a war between Japan and Russia will come in the near future is of importance. The St. Petersburg paper says that Japan is now preparing for this war. To this end the Japanese troops are being strengthened, supplies of food and ammunition accumulated, artillery reorganized, and daily maneuvers are being executed regardless of the condition of the weather. "What next?" it is believed that next year will see the beginning of this war, and because of this belief leading merchants are selling out and moving away, while Japanese peddlers, who are presumed to be spies, are flocking into the Amur territory. So strange Russian belief, as voiced by the Novoe Vremya, but, on the contrary, it should be remembered that Japan still is pretty seriously disabled financially and is not unlikely to desire a breathing spell for a long time to come.

Exit the Dramatic Critic?

Is the curtain to ring down on the dramatic critic? Is he to be disabled and put out of business? Are we to read (or skip) no more of those opinions of the drama which are sagaciously tempered by the business office of the paper? Since the revelations connected with William Winter's resignation as dramatic critic of the New York Tribune, this would seem to be a not undesirable consummation, and it is of course which may be carried into effect by an Italian invention, which is now being tested in England, is generally adopted. The invention which is to achieve this striking result, if it has good luck, is known as the psophograph, and its inventor is Eugenio Boggiano. In appearance it somewhat resembles a nickel-in-the-slot machine, but it has three slots instead of one. Over these slots are the words "Good," "Bad," and "Indifferent." As an audience leaves a theatre on the first night of a play, let us say, each member of it is supposed to drop a disk into one of these slots that expresses his opinion of the entertainment. Thus a popular opinion is secured, and the dramatic critic may hide his diminished head. To illustrate, if 700 disks were dropped in the slot marked "Bad," a dozen in "Good," and twenty in "Indifferent," the business office of a paper and its critic together might assert that the play was a success, but they would find few believers. Thus it is that Boggiano's invention may make the dramatic critic out of business. It is said that the machine has worked very satisfactorily in Rome and other Italian cities.

Concerning the World's Biggest City.

A book of statistical information relating to London has just been issued and, of course, it contains many items which are of general interest. Here are a few of them: The population of Greater London is "estimated" at 7,537,196 (which is strikingly close figuring for an estimate, that data of London county is set at 4,843,612. Under the English laws a little more than one-eighth of these are voters, the remainder being denied the voting privilege. On January 1, 1908, the number of paupers was 148,644, or just about one-fifth of the population. At the same time there were 28,796 certified lunatics, to say nothing of those who had not as yet succeeded in having themselves certified. The number of places licensed to sell alcoholic liquors was 4,823, or one to every 1,563 inhabitants, which, to Californian eyes will not look like a wet record. The number of children on school rolls was 750,121. The wages paid to some mechanics, approximately given in American coins, follow, all referring to the weekly schedule: Bricklayers, $11; and carpenters and joiners the same; plumbers, $11.50; painters, $9; turners and fitters, $9.75; smiths, $10 to $12; cabinet makers, $10.50 to $11.50, and bakers, $6.75 to $9. An inspection of this list of wages may give an idea of why former English mechanics so frequently are found in this country.

Radium as an Agent of Murder.

For the first time in the history of mankind, probably, radium is believed to have figured as an agent of murder in a case which now is interesting Belgian authorities. In Liege an old and wealthy man, whose name has been found dead, and it was at first supposed that he had died of apoplexy. Further investigation, however, disclosed a curious discoloration of the scalp, which experts testified to be probably due to long exposure to the influence of radium. Thereupon the police began an investigation, and a student of chemistry who had occupied a room in the building immediately fled. Then was revealed the fact that the student had made a particular study of radium and its influence. Experts now believe that the old man was done in by his death by prolonged exposure to the radium rays, not improbably while he slept, such a result being attainable particularly in the case of an old and feeble man. A Poe might have imagined such a murder, but it remained for twentieth century science to make it possible.

Some Evidences of Prosperity.

Lest the reader should not fully have convinced himself that prosperity really is here, Uncle Sam, through his bureau of statistics, calls attention to some facts which should, at any rate, satisfy one that the signs are good. These facts have to do with imports; that is to say, with the things which American citizens feel able to buy from their neighbors. They do not feel able to buy very much in 1908, for, now that it is past, we may as well admit that that really was a hard year. But it is different in 1909—decidedly different. Our pocketbooks are feeling so thoroughly convalescent that during the first seven months of this year we imported fully 50 per cent more (both in quantity and value) than we did during the first seven months of 1908. Encouraging symptom, is it not? For instance, last July our imports were valued at $37,350,000, while in July of last year we imported no more than $27,000,000 in value—we were feeling $10,350,000 better, which indicates a decided improvement both in pulse and temperature. Moreover, these importations covered a wide field, including valuable lumbers, woolsens, silks, hides and skins, iron ore, wood pulp, and a long list of other things. These are the things which Uncle Sam mentions in introducing us to prosperity, and they are comforting. Still, we would like to know whether we are selling enough things to pay for those we buy and have a neat little surplus left.

The Copper City an Air City.

It was not a great while ago, as formerly noted in The California Weekly, that an expedition composed of Europeans set out from Cairo to find a "city of burnished copper," which Arabs had reported as sitting in solitary and lonely state in the north central Sahara. The expedition now has returned, and it did not find the burnished municipality. It did not find it for the sufficient reason that there is no such city. The Arabs who claimed to have seen it were indulging in what might be termed a pipe dream. The expedition found oases, temples of ancient Egyptian construction, salt marshes; in short, many things, but no copper city. So ends another fairy tale. What is it the song says? "We listen a while with pitying smile, then"—stand ready to accept the next one we hear as unadorned truth.

The second biennial convention of the National Women's Trade Union League is to be held in Chicago next week. About eighty delegates are expected from various quarters of the globe. Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the British Women's Trade Union League, comes from London; Mrs. Werner Hegemann of Munich from Germany, and Miss Agnes Herman, secretary of the Verband Kaufmännischer Weiblicher Angestellten, from Berlin.

Orville Wright's motto is, "The only bird that talks is the parrot, and the parrot is the only bird that cannot fly."

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

JACK LONDON'S LATEST BOOK.

To the casual reader who is not personally acquainted with Jack London the question how much of his latest book Martin Eden, should be considered autobiographical and how much fiction, becomes more and more curiously interesting as he reads. Manifestly a large part of the book is autobiographical, but, just as manifestly, a few parts, at least, cannot be so considered. All that portion relating to the hero's struggles to market his literary wares—and it constitutes a great share of the book—evidently is based upon London's experiences. Thus far the case is clear; but was it Martin Eden, or was it Jack London, who was impelled to his literary toil by love of a very shallow girl? The question inevitably presents itself, and, of course, there is no answer.

In the turning of Martin Eden to socialism as a panacea for the universal hurt we again see Jack London, but was it the former alone, or was it the latter too, who, as a result of either too little or too much recognition, became bitter, pessimistic and morbid? Eden certainly does this thing, but there still is room for a friendly hope that in this ill respect he differs from London.

At last the hero, having become morbid to the point of insanity because of long brooding upon a little self in a big world, commits suicide, and at length the reader stands upon firm ground. Jack London has not taken his own life; clearly the last page is not autobiographical, whatever the rest of the book may be. It is pleasant to be relieved of this little of the question that has overshadowed the entire book.

Like all that London writes, the tale is well and strongly told, but it also is morbid and gloomy; and it leaves in the mouth a taste that is not entirely pleasant. The reader closes the volume with an admiration for London's undoubted ability and with a regret that he does not use it to lighten the world of men rather than to add to its gloom. He sees things so clearly that it seems a pity that he must see them through smoked glasses. (The Macmillan Company, $1.50.)

STANLEY'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

The following advance notice of the autobiography of Henry M. Stanley, to be published tomorrow, will interest all who have read "In Darkest Africa," and especially those who remember the thrill that ran round the world when Stanley emerged from that then mysterious, unknown land:

A part of Stanley's notable and adventurous career is told in his famous book, but here for the first time the reader is given the complete story of his life in all its pathetic grandeur. With his deep sincerity, wonderful self-revelation, and splendid style, he makes the reader see the babe in the cottage cradle, then the grim workhouse, the squalid life in Liverpool, the terrible experiences at sea, the dawn of freedom in America, where he was adopted by a New Orleans merchant; then his life as a planter, his enlistment in the Confederate army, the wonderful picture of Shiloh, and his life in prison, and escape. From his journals, and letters, speeches, etc., it has been possible to continue the story of his life largely in his own words—his return to England and experiences in journalism; the finding of Livingstone, exploration of the Dark Continent, the founding of the Congo State and the rescue of Emin, and finally his Parliamentary career and closing years. His journals and private letters bring out the inner history of many important events and episodes which have not hitherto been made public. Stanley was a remarkable man, and this revelation of his personality and of his career as an individual, as well as on men and affairs should take rank as one of the books of permanent importance in its field. The volume, which is edited by Lady Stanley, is handsomely printed and bound, and is fully illustrated with portraits, map and other illustrations.

L'ENVOI.

By Edwin Chase.

(For The California Weekly.)

Go, my Envoi, On thee the venture waits.
Groom up thy diplomacy, and fit thy Manner to a lady's way. Take then this Letter, and turn thy course of duty toward My gracious queen. Go as a barque forth borne

By a chivalrous wind, and fend thee well
'Gainst any other star that gleams to trick
The compass of thy heart, and miss for thee
Thy waiting port. Put bolts upon thy care:
Thou holdst there a patent, a title
To my heart's best province, its castle, all
Its fair demesne. Observe if she receive
It well; read twice, and hesitate, thrice sniff
The witching smell. And mark you if she sigh,

Or if the salutation wake a smile:
And if the valediction, Priest of Love,
Shall win a sweet confession from her eye.

Does she so read and wait;
Does she so smile and sigh;
And ope the tell-tale eye?
Then home! My Envoi, 'Home! Home speedily.

Prepare thee for a greater embassy!
Thou hast the signet; naught could be more plain.
She's ready to accept my whole domain.

WESLEY'S DIARIES.

The life of John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, will have to be rewritten now that a large body of his writings have been recently brought to light. These are original diaries and manuscripts, written in an elaborately abbreviated longhand, in obsolete shorthand, and in a complex and keyless cipher. The Rev. Nehemiah Curnock, with the assistance of expert students, spent four years in the work of unraveling the cipher used chiefly in an Oxford diary and relating to religious beliefs. The cipher for a long time baffled Mr. Curnock, but a missing letter at last came to him in a dream. The documents throw a new and strange light on the development of Wesley's character, on his literary, political and social activity in America, on the part he played in the creation of a new church hymnology, and on his early life at Oxford.

PEGGOTTY'S HUT IN RUINS.

A correspondent writing from Great Yarmouth to the New Orleans Times-Democrat tells some interesting things about the modern appearance of one of the scenes described in "David Copperfield."

"A Yarmouth hundred of herring really counts 132, and in many ways the inhabitants of the old town are credited with an open handed generosity. Peggotty told David Copperfield, you remember, that it was the finest place in the universe, to which the boy replied that 'a mud and or two might have improved it, and also that if the land had been a little more separated from the sea and the town and the tide had not been quite so much mixed up, like toast and water, it would have been much nicer.'"

But presently, when he got into the streets and "smelt the fish and pitch and oakum and tallow, and saw the sailors walking about and the carts jingling up and down over the stones," young Copperfield admitted that he had done Yarmouth an injustice.

The remains of Peggotty's hut may still be seen, sad and forlorn, alas! but suggestive nevertheless of the quaint home where David was so happy, of Peggotty's jokes, of little Emily's pretty ways and of the dolefulness of Mrs. Gummidge. There are many ancient buildings that have stood the test of time better than the queer boat-home of Peggotty.

Formerly Yarmouth was one of the principal ports of England and its merchant adventurers enjoyed the patronage of Queen Elizabeth. Its Tollhouse claims to be the oldest municipal building in the kingdom.

THE PLOT OF "POIA."

The following is the plot of "Poia," Arthur Nevin's Indian opera, soon to be produced by the Berlin Royal Opera company. The story is taken direct from an ancient legend of the Blackfoot Indians of Montana:

Poia, the leading character, is a Blackfoot brave who is in love with Natoya, a beautiful maiden, but she is in love with Swatits, a warrior and hunter and an evil man. To be rid of Poia, Natoya tells him she will not have him for a lover until the scar on his face is removed. A medicine woman informs him that the scar was affixed by the Sun God and can only be removed by him. Poia must penetrate into the kingdom of the Sun God.

Poia sets out and endures great hardships before he finally reaches the court of the Sun God, whose favor he wins by saving the life of Morning Star, the Sun God's only son. The scar is effaced, and Poia is seen coming down the Wolf Trail, as the Indians call the Milky Way, accompanied by Morning Star, who gives him a magic flute, which will make the player loved by whoever hears the music.

Natoya is with Swatits when she hears the flute and she turns from Swatits to Poia. He is acclaimed a great prophet by the tribe and receives the homage due such an one. Swatits is furious at Poia's triumph and attempts to kill him, but Natoya receives the spear thrust as she leaps in front of her lover.

The heavens open, the Sun God appears and strikes down Swatits with a bright shaft of light and calls the lovers to the sky. Bearing the dying Natoya in his arms Poia mounts upward and disappears forever from the Blackfoot country.

SIENKIEWICZ AGAIN.

Henry Sienkiewicz, the eminent Polish author, recently spoke of his literary work as follows:

"I started to write a book on the Venice of the doges, but had to lay it aside on account of the extraordinary complexity and peculiarity of Venetian history. I no longer have inspirations like the ones which produced 'Quo Vadis.' That I obtained by studying three masterpieces—one by Tacitus, my favorite among the Latin classics; one by Chateaubriand, 'The Genius of Christianity,' and, most valued of all, Cardinal Wiseman's 'Fabrizio,' a beautiful, picturesque story which fascinated me in my boyhood."

"I am now revising for an autumn volume a novelette to be called 'The Whirlwind,' which appeared lately in a Warsaw newspaper. After that is done I am anxious to devote my remaining energies to a theme that has long been my special delight, the personality of Napoleon the Great."

THE LIGHT TO READ BY.

The Philadelphia Record has the following account of the effects of various kinds of light upon the reader's eyes:

"Our grandfathers, who were obliged to read their wily papers by candle light, escaped many of the eye troubles which are common among their descendants, who use electric lamps and incandescent gas mantles. It is the ultraviolet rays in our brilliant lights that are at fault, say oculists. Dr. Terrien has found that the arc light contains three times as many of the objectionable rays as the Edison lamp, four times as many as the ordinary gas light, or the petroleum lamp, six times as many as the old-fashioned oil lamp and indefinitely more than candle light, which is almost free from ultraviolet rays."

"MLISS."

An elaborate review of Bret Harte's "M'Iss" as a play was announced some time ago on this page. It is interesting to note, in the Los Angeles Express of recent date, in a quotation from the Express of Oct. 8, 1894, this line: "Tonight at the Grand opera house, the great play of 'M'Iss'."

THE RETURN OF PORTOLA

GRAVE AND GAY COMMENT ON THE FESTIVAL.

THE ANGELUS.

By Bert Harte.

Heard at the Mission Dolores, 1868.

Especially appropriate at this time of the Portola celebration is Bert Harte's well-remembered poem, The Angelus. Bells of the Past, whose long-forgotten music Still fills the wide expanse, Tingeing the sober twilight of the Present With color of romance:

I hear you call, and see the sun descending
On rock and wave and sand,
As down the coast the Mission voices blending
Girdle the heathen land.

Within the circle of your incantation
No blight nor mildew falls;
Nor fierce unrest, nor lust, nor low ambition
Passes those airy walls.

Borne on the swell of your long waves receding,
I touch the farther Past,
I see the dying glow of Spanish glory,
The sunset dream and last!

Before me rise the dome-shaped Mission towers,
The white Presidio;
The swart commander in his leathern jerkin,
The priest in stole of snow.

Once more I see Portola's cross uplifting
Above the shining sun,
And past the headland, northward, slowly drifting
The freighted galleon.

O solemn bells! whose consecrated masses
Recall the faith of old—
O tinkling bells! that lulled with twilight mus-sic
The spiritual fold!

Your voices break and falter in the darkness—
Break, falter, and are still;
And veiled and mystic, like the Host descending,
The sun sinks from the hill!

HAIL, PORTOLA!

It's catching; nearly everybody has it; the heel-taps on the pavement up Market street beat their rhythm to a lightsome tune; the swagger of the crowd is just another symptom. By Tuesday next we'll all be virulent. It's the new disease: Portola!

Who was Portola? Zoeth Eldredge knows, maybe Rufus Jennings does. Who cares? No body.

What is Portola? Ah, that's another story. Festival, Mardi Gras, mummings, confetti, a thousand streamers and a million lights, music, mirth, care-free gayety, and—and—just a little business on the side, just a little, you know, to help the suburban population enjoy itself by reducing the burden of that sagging feeling in the pocket where the crop money lies.

But we're all going to have a good time. Don't doubt it. The California Weekly's man strolled up the street on Discovery Day. Alas, poor Columbus! They were few that did it. True, the banks were closed—but everybody knows that bankers have nothing to do, anyway. Everybody else was on the streets, and one thought was in their every mind. Portola! The bell of red and golden lights at Market, Third and Kearny gently tolled ('told')—catch it? it to the eye; the upstuffed, rampant banners, gold and red, fluttered over every street; the red-headed youths and maids with golden locks flashed a new signal of spiritual communion from the windows of the soul, for this, now, is their hour of triumph.

Well, 'tis a fleeting hour, this hour of triumph, but each in his way will make the most of it. Virgilia, queen of the rout, has written a book; a dozen poets have rhymed the praises of her beauty; one music store flaunts her portrait over both the "Portola Maid" song and the "Portola Queen Waltz." Gaspar himself is not forgot: "La Portola," tra-la, tra-la, is their companion-piece. And the rhythmic honors of the day are crowned and sublimated by the sweet melody, the insinuating appeal, the subtle promise of this charming lyric printed on the "only Portola invitation postal card":

"Bring your father—sister—mother—
Bring your friends—don't come too late.
We will entertain you royally.
As becomes OUR GOLDEN STATE."

Indeed we will! With our Portola came in hand, our Portola tie discreetly tucked into our Portola waistcoat, and our brand-new and inimitable Portola smile illuminating our face, we will join you at the Ferry building and lead you gaily into the merry measures of Folly's "Dancing Triplets" which we inadvertently reprinted last week as "Dancing Triplets."

Even now, below us in the harbor, the guns are booming a welcome to the Dutch cruiser with the unpronounceable name. Yesterday it was the Idzumo, Captain Takeshita in command. Tomorrow it will be the Calabria, Italian cruiser, from far Brazil. The Chronicle has promised it, and the Chronicle's wireless station is bringing the ships to port. (See the Chronicle.) Another day it will be the Germans, and last and best, three cruisers of His Majesty's British fleet. These, with a score of ships from our own once White Navy, will grace the bay by day and shame the abashed and ineffectual stars by night.

At Tuesday noon a moment's hush will fall upon the world, steamers will pause mid-ocean in their flight, a toast will be proposed, framed by our president, and as the last drops of California wine trickle down ten million throats a thousand cannons will roar the message to the merry-makers that care has been sunk to the depths and mirth enthroned.

FRAY JUAN CRESPI.

By J. H.

(For The California Weekly.)

Sixty-four marched out from San Diego.

To the unknown northern regions led:

Sixty-four marched back to San Diego;

Gaspar Portola was at their head.

Seven and twenty soldiers de cuera;

Fifteen Christian Indians, to pack;

Senor Don Fernando, R. River,

Y Moncaldo riding at their back.

Coming all the way from Coronado,

Several dozen Spanish Dons, or more:

Soberano, Fages, Alvarado,

Cota, also Pedro Amador;

Pathfinder Ortega and Carrillo,

Yorba, Olivera, Costanoso,

Many a name with tide and cedilla;

Many a one whose name we do not know.

In the very midst of all these rather

Highly-sounding, elegant, graceful,

There was one, a quiet little father,

Whom I honor more than all of these.

He it was who when the days were dragging

Drearly as wearily to come,

Cheered the men with faith and hope, unflingling:

Fray Juan Crespi was his gentle name.

Every trial new and tribulation,

Only pointed him his Father's will;

Fountain he of sweetest consolation,

Seeing only good in every ill.

Patient countenance and calm maintaining

In the presence of what'er mishap,

While the soldiers, of their lot complaining,

Stamped their sorrows all along the map;

Registered their ills in names of places:

"Cursos Valley"—Valley of Disease;

Many another such their course defaced:

"Pulgas Rancho"—Rancho of the Fleas;

"Tumor Canyon", "Thin Bear"; names replacer

With grotesqueness hardly could be known.

For those places, the priest's names were sweeter:

"Lladislaw", "Domingo", "San Ibon."

Mattered not what problems were appearing,

Mattered not what dangers they might dare,

There was Fray Juan Crespi ever cheering

With his saints and symbols everywhere.

And behold! one evil cured another,

And with better heart they took their way,

While the sign-and-wonder-seeing brother

Thanked the Lord who led them day by day.

Starving in the valley of San Pedro,

Mussels found they sweet to their desire;

"Shell-fish Point," the soldiers called San

Pedro;

Call it "Guardian Angel," said the friar.

And the priest and gallant caballero,

On the afternoon of that same day,

From the summit saw the grand estero,

Joyfully beheld the splendid bay.

On that famous march from San Diego,

Following along the unknown track,

Sixty-four marched out from San Diego,

Sixty-four went marching safely back;

Every miner, sapper and soldado;

All the regulars and volunteers;

Coming safely back to Coronado;

All the Indians and muleteers;

Gaspar Portola and Olivera,

All the rest with Soberanes here,

Senor Don Fernando de Rivera

Y Moncaldo bringing up the rear.

From the mountains where the rains had wet them;

Down the beaches where the breakers foam;

Led by Him who never could forget them,

Fray Juan Crespi's flock came marching home.

In the decades following the Spanish

Were no spiritual gifts alive?

What could cause the friar's names to vanish?

While the soldiers' christianities survive?

Mercenary Time's historic humors,

Brooding ever on material plights,

Save the "Shell-fish," "Cursos," "Pulgas,"

"Tumors,"

Lose the "Guardian Angels" and the "Saints."

Lose them? Never! Vain imagination!

God be thanked, they're with us evermore,

Simple, silent men of contemplation,

Leavening and saving as before.

So while golden banners are displaying,

Hailing Portola, the brave and true,

Don't forget the man who did the praying:

Here's to gentle Fray Juan Crespi, too!

A GREAT WOMEN'S CLUB

THE IDEALS AND ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CALIFORNIA CLUB.

The California Club is probably the largest women's club in the state. It is the centre of the intellectual life of nearly 600 women, mainly residents of San Francisco.

The club's motto is a phrase from the writings of David Starr Jordan: "Wisdom is knowing what should be done; Virtue is doing it." By a consistency unusual in mottoes, this one really means something in the actual work of the California Club. This club's activities are divided into four broadly-defined departments: education, civics, social science, and the Outdoor Art League. The educational department is devoted to the self-instruction of the club members in things they want to know about. The other three departments are organized channels of activity through which the women "do things" for the causes they espouse, such as the bettering of public morals and the beautification of the city. So, the educational department personifies the Wisdom of President Jordan's phrase, and the other departments the Virtue of which he speaks.

Jane Addams, of Hull House, Chicago, whose vast service to humanity through her philanthropic work among the city poor is even less significant than the influence of her writings upon the minds of the leading thinkers and executive men of America, says, in her "Newer Ideals of Peace," that the most lamentable deficiency in municipal life in the United States in this industrial era is caused by the absence from the city administration of women in the capacities for which their centuries of training and their instinctive sympathies pre-eminently qualify them. The deficiency of which she speaks is the citizen's lack of immediate interest in government, caused by the fact that the functions of government touch the life of the citizen only in the presence of the blue coat and brass buttons of a policeman, with whom the average citizen has nothing to do. But, she says, if working hours were regulated by law, if sanitation were strictly regulated and the regulation enforced, and in these and other ways the law became an effective guardian of the welfare of all the citizens, government would become a real and immediate concern of the individual, and the administration of the functions of government would belong to women, because these functions are simply municipal housekeeping, and women are the traditional and natural and trained housekeepers.

Perhaps it is a combination of conscious following of President Jordan's formula, because of the unconscious promptings of Jane Addams's philosophy, that has led the women of the California Club to undertake many public tasks of high importance, which the men had overlooked or slighted. At any rate, the record of the club's achievements in public affairs is an enviable one, and worthy the emulation of such profound—and less effectual—organizations of men as the Commonwealth Club.

Here are some of the things that make up this record of achievement.

The San Francisco Parental School was established in 1907 through the efforts of a committee from the department of civics of the California Club.

A state law regulating the construction of tenement houses was materially helped in its passage through the state legislature by the California Club's co-operation with the Commonwealth Club and associated public bodies. This valuable piece of legislation was rendered ineffective by the governor's pocket veto.

The department of social science of the California Club has distributed several thousand pamphlets on tuberculosis and in other ways has helped in the campaign of education to stamp out the white plague.

The prison section of this department collected a library of 1,500 volumes for the women's jail in San Francisco. These books were destroyed in the great fire, but the section is now progressing rapidly in the work of replacing them.

The prison section has also obtained permission for women visitors to visit the state prison at San Quentin once a month. This opens the way for public inspection and especially for work by the club toward better conditions in the women's wards.

The department of civics secured the co-operation of the company that handles the street-car advertising, and inserted in the cars placards urging women to do their Christmas shopping early so as to relieve the strain of work on the clerks. Other placards urged co-operation in exterminating the bubonic-infected rats, and called attention to the subjects of pure milk supply and the expectoration ordinance.

This department secured the interests of the Franklin School when it needed apparatus for organized play.

This department secured the passage of an amendment to the city charter creating a Playground Commission in the city government. Two of the seven members of this commission are members of the California Club, and the important fruits of their labors have been described in The California Weekly.

This department is represented by a club member on the probation committee, and the department contributed money to the admirable and necessary work of the juvenile court.

This department has had sanitation cases prosecuted by the district attorney's office, has brought about the establishment of public convenience stations in various parts of the city, and has helped to introduce "certified milk" to general sale for the protection of infants and invalids.

The department of social science has done a large work to create public opinion demanding medical inspection of school children, and has persuaded the board of supervisors to appoint a physician and four nurses to begin the work of inspection.

This department is also working for the establishment of state sanatoria for the treatment of curable tuberculosis.

It is working for an amendment to the charter providing for an indeterminate sentence with industrial training for confirmed inebriate women.

The department of Outdoor Art League distributed seeds to refugees after the fire for the purpose of encouraging gardens and window-planting. The League joined in the work of cleaning the streets on March 3, 1907, and made a fine showing. The League persuaded the supervisors to include the Telegraph Hill improvement project in the bond elections. The League is directly and solely responsible for the exchange of lands by which the Calaveras grove of Big Trees last year became a national park, insuring the preservation of the most accessible grove of sequoia gigantes. The League has acquired the care of Laura Vista Park, on Telegraph Hill, and is maintaining it as a bright public park.

It is written above that the department of education is devoted to the self-instruction of the club's members. This is essentially true; but this section also has projected its influence in several directions, notably in the dissemination of humane education in the public schools.

But the internal work of this department is most interesting. This work includes the study of music, of literature and the drama, of French, and, as a recreation, of the finer points of whist.

Altogether, the work of the California Club is varied enough to interest many types of mind, and profitable, not only to its members, but to the public. It is a large service to society, in the general sense of the word, that such a club forms the centre of a social and intellectual communion for a large body of women. Here they enter into the current of modern thought and modern progress. From this club radiates a refining and ennobling practical influence in the life of the community upon those points where the spirit of womanly sympathy and understanding is most effective.

Practical Wisdom; constructive Virtue: a good motto well lived.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

California Leads, But In the Wrong Direction

Examiners have returned from the Eastern trip which they took in order to get ideas upon an industrial training school such as an act of the last legislature proposes to establish for graduates from the state-aided orphan asylums. According to interviews which appear in a Sacramento newspaper, the two investigators did not find what they went to seek, because none of the other states, so far as they could discover, has institutions of just the sort which is proposed for California; though there are many Eastern reform schools for bad boys and girls, no state has adopted the plan of assembling in a large institution a host of former inmates of orphan's homes for the purpose of teaching them mechanical trades and agricultural pursuits. This discovery causes Senator Price (for the Expert is also the Senator from Sonoma county) to remark that California is leading and is setting a good example to the other states to follow. It does not appear to have occurred to him that other states are not so much leading California as proposing to do because those states have a better way—that they have studied the subject and have reached the conclusion that no congregation but segregation is the best policy—in other words, that the thing to be done for homeless boys and girls is to find them homes. This can be done; that has been demonstrated; and that it is the best thing to do no person appears to doubt who has studied very deeply the subject of child dependence and congregation in orphan institutions and training schools.

Neglected Expert Advice That Was Ready at Hand

starting in to create a new institution which is going to be a great burden of expense to the State, had thought to ask the opinion of the State Board of Charities and Corrections they would have found that the members of that board do not endorse their proposal and that they believe the dome-hating policy is far better than the training-school plan, besides being very much cheaper. Very probably the members of the Board of Charities would also have told Senator Price that his idea of taking 14-year-old boys and girls from the orphan's homes, teaching them trades for a couple of years and turning them out on the world able to care for themselves was impracticable, because boys and girls of sixteen are still much too young to be left without home or guardians.

But of course neither the executive nor the legislative departments of the State government thought to ask the advice of the Board of Charities, though one must wonder for what purpose they suppose that board exists if not to advise on just such problems as this. The Board of Charities has been in existence now for five or six years; its support has cost the state something, and if it is not to be permitted to exercise the functions for which it was created, it should be abolished. It was not established to be a mere name; the reason for its existence is that it was expected to exert an influence in favor of better-conducted charitable and penal institutions and also to work for economy in such institutions. It might have done both if given a fair chance, but being side-tracked by ignorance and antagonized through prejudice, it has been unable, except in a small degree, to accomplish either of the purposes of its creation.

Shop for Boy, or Boy for Shop?

The Watchman hears that Senator Price and Secretary Deming came back enthusiastic for an orphan training school, and harboring the idea that it may be made self-sustaining. Woe unto those children if that be the object. A hundred boys and girls may be taken from the orphanages of the state and set to work manufacturing upon state account, and possibly earn their keep, although even as it is to be doubted, but to call such an establishment a school, or anything other than a factory, will be to beard the dictionary in its den. It is the besetting sin of almost every reformatory that the child comes to be for the reformatory and not the reformatory for the child, and an institution for orphans conducted on similar lines would be a wanton injustice for the reason that being an orphan is not an offense worthy of harsh punishment. No, a training school must be a school, and when the apprentice has learned enough to be worth his keep, his place is to be apprenticed, not turned out into the world and not kept in such an institution. A state training school may be made useful to dependent childhood, but if so it must be at the cost of the state, not the Portraits of Programmers It has been the immemorial custom in California to have the portrait of the retiring governor painted, after he has retired, that it may somewhere be suspended from the capitol walls. The uniform cost has been $500 and the portrait has been looked upon as proper, but the appropriation for it has, heretofore, not been made until after each governor had gone out of office. The last legislature desired to make sure that the benign visage of Governor Gillett should hang from the inner walls, perhaps through fear that the next legislature might be less inclined that way. Therefore it took time by the toplock and made the needful appropriation. So far so good, but it went farther and appropriated five hundred dollars for a portrait of that diligent performer, Mr. Warren R. Porter. Let it be said on behalf of Governor Gillett that he has had the good taste to make no haste in availing himself of the appropriation, and will likely wait until he is out of office before sitting for his portrait. Not so Performer Porter. His desire to see himself as an artist sees him was uncontrollable and he has had himself painted, the bill has been presented, allowed, and paid. Previous legislatures have seldom, if ever, thought lieutenant governors were worth painting by canvas and oil, but then, of course, there have not always been Warren Porters in that office.

The Best Joke of the Last Session

But the crowning hilarity of the last session of the legislature was the appropriation of a round thousand dollars of our dad's for painting the materializations of Speakers Beardslee and Stanton. In all the history of California, from Quereara to the Humboldt dynasty, no speaker of any assembly has ever been thought worth painting by canvas until Beardslee, Bo Beardslee of San Joaquin county. What marked him for this high honor, heretofore bestowed only upon retiring governors, must have been the unwavering idelty with which he took orders from his masters and the celerity with which he obeyed them. Having established the precedent as to Beardslee the impropriety of not securing an oil effigy of the genial Phil Stanton, only less obedient in taking program than his predecessor, was so apparent that the same appropriation that squandered $500 for Beardslee in oil included a second $500 for Phil. To be entirely true to life Phil Stanton's portrait should have been sketched in the act of taking the train, in September, to attend, at public expense, where will the state hang all its next Alaska-Yukon exposition which occurred in the previous June. Query: If the precedent be accepted as established and the portrait privilege is extended, as with equal reason it may be, to sergeants-at-arms, janitors, porters and pages, where will the state hang all its next famous celebrities? Will it have to construct a state rogue's gallery somewhere in capitol park?

Will the Senator Please Quit Kidding?

United States Senator Frank P. Flint of Los Angeles has not for-gauge of diplomacy is sometimes called a balloon d'essai, but which is the more expressive vernacular is known as "a feeler." In other words, the junior senator has said for publication that he is thinking strongly of voluntarily retiring at the end of his present term, because he cannot make money while he is a senator and because he believes it to be his duty to do this in order to provide for his family. He adds that if he should retire it would not be through fear of defeat in an effort to succeed himself, since he is practically without opposition in his own district. As this announcement found its way into the press the first time, it was more positive in form and practically amounted to a declaration of intention to retire; but the next day it was modified in a second interview and given the complexion before described. The cynically inclined are now saying that if the junior senator should hear a loud cry of protest echoing over the state from Shasta to Mt. Lowe, he would again pull in on the string and perhaps withdraw his withdrawal altogether.

He Would Be Prevailed Upon

And yet it may very well be that there is considerable sincerity in the junior Senator's statement, although from the manner in which it is put forth we cannot doubt that the main reason for making it at this time was a desire to return to the Senate, and in casting up the advantages and disadvantages, Mr. Flint is doing precisely what hundreds of others in situations similar to his have done; before it is gained a high office appears to almost every man as something very desirable to have, but after it is gained the question is sure to arise whether it is worth keeping; the honor has been enjoyed, and the burdens and sacrifices are very much in evidence. The particular sacrifice which Mr. Flint emphasizes, that of foregoing the accumulation of a competency at the price of remaining in public life, is the consideration which has turned the scale and led many a successful American politician, from Tom Reed down, to decide upon retirement. As may well be imagined, Senator Flint would find it easier to make the plunge, by withdrawing once for all, if he were satisfied that public sentiment is likely to array itself against him, while, on the other hand, a belief that he has really no difficulties to overcome in being re-elected would incline him to minimize the pecuniary sacrifice and to continue at his post in the Senate. Hence the reasons for sending up his trial balloon and watching the sky to see which way it has drifted.

Office Not So Bad But for the Stench

When he says that he has no opposition which is worth mentioning Senator Flint, as he is probably acute enough to know, is partly right and partly wrong. There is no avowed candidate against him. Neither is there any opposition of a kind which is regarded as a scandal. And again, his section of the state is unanimous in claiming the right to elect a Senator, and it is clear that just now the region south of the Tehachapi has no candidate except Flint. Indeed, there is no other man down there of sufficient political prominence to make him a natural rallying center for spontaneous opposition to Flint. But, despite all this, Senator Frank Flint is decidedly not popular, either in his own part of the state or in any other; the people know (and he knows that they know) how he was elected; it was so distinctly a corporation achievement that it was one of the hardest blows which has ever been struck at public respect in California. It was four years since that it occurred, but the recollection has not faded, and Senator Flint does not know how far the feeling might carry a majority of voters when they should come for the first time to exercise their privilege under the new law of voting in their districts for candidates for United States Senator. That he might make a good deal of difference, even though as arranged (in Senator Flint's particular interest, as many believe) it is only a series of local choices and not a state-wide referendum such as reformers desired.

He Will Withdraw His Withdrawal

It is too early to attempt to say what would fall out, or fall in, if Senator Flint should decide to make his suggested withdrawal actual. But one of the immediate effects would be a small political change south of the Tehachapi, where organization politics has been crystallizing around the assumption that Flint would again be a candidate and that his re-election would be the first consideration. It would be necessary to find another organization candidate for Senator in the south, and this would be a task attended with some difficulty. There would, as may well be imagined, be no dearth of aspirants, but with that primary vote staring it in the face, the machine would experience hitherto unknown difficulties in what used to be its easy art of "picking a winner." None of the organization heroes in the south—neither Judge McKinley, nor Speaker Stanton, nor Senator Leroy A. Wright, nor Senator Henry M. Willis—could run the gauntlet of a primary vote in eighty assembly districts with any probability of making a respectable showing. It is altogether probable that the machine would recognize this at the start and would manifest its usual shrewdness by side-tracking all candidates known to be offensively organization and by bringing out somebody whose standing, either business or professional, has been such as to give him a fair degree of popular strength, and whose indebtedness to the machine could be plausibly denied. But what is most probable of all is that Senator Flint will be prevailed upon to withdraw his withdrawal. He run the gauntlet. He, at least, does stand some chance of success; and no other known organizationist does.

First-Class Men for Second-Class Offices

The thought of an ex-Justice of the Supreme Court being a candidate for city councilman is so unusual as to occasion some surprise, because the office is generally looked upon as a minor one, which it really is not at all when the magnitude of the interests to be dealt with is considered. The surprise in question owes its origin to Los Angeles, where the so-called regular Republican convention put up for councilmen a list of men which made householders think of the advisability of putting new window-fasteners and door-locks on their houses. After considerable discussion the citizens decided that the only thing which could be done to beat a very bad ticket was to put up a very good one, and by dint of persuasion they induced several of the leading citizens to consent to accept councilmanic nominations, and so their names will go on the primary ballot, with a practical certainty they will be nominated. Judge John D. Works, formerly of the Supreme Court, and now a leading member of the bar, is the best known of these candidates, but another is a well known bank president, and the others are men of similar high standing.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

In order to secure access to what, it is claimed, will be the most valuable rock quarry in the United States, the Santa Fe company is building a spur line from near Redley to a point on the Kings river about fifteen miles from Fresno.

The supervisors of Monterey county have advertised for bids for a franchise for an electric line to be built from Monterey to Salinas, Spreckels and Castroville. It is expected that work on the line will begin as soon as the franchise is granted.

E. J. Emmons, one of the former state senators who were convicted of accepting bribes, will apply for a parole. He is the only one of these hoodlums who still is undergoing punishment.

Citizens of Palo Alto are taking steps to secure a referendum vote on the question of doing away with nickel-in-the-slot machines. Near Crescent City, recently John J. Johansen was instantly crushed to death by a log which rolled upon him.

Prompted by jealousy, Harry W. Vaughn shot and wounded Miss Cecelia Skehan. This demonstration of his love was made in Marysville.

Because the Chico trustees thought petrol was petroleum (which it is, or once was) they granted the Standard Oil company a permit to store that product within the city limits. Thereupon the company put up two huge tanks and stored gasoline (which is not petrol) in them, and an increase in insurance rates throughout the city became likely. Now the trustees propose to withdraw the permit, and it is possible that a legal battle may result.

George Kaminski was killed, near Fullerton, by coming in contact with an electric wire which carried voltage to pumping plants.

Citizens of Chico are trying to induce the Southern Pacific company to connect its Portland and trans-Sierra lines at Chico instead of at Vina, as contemplated.

Hichborn's History

So many applications have come to The California Weekly for copies of Franklin Hichborn's

"STORY OF THE CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE OF 1909,"

that we have arranged to take orders for this valuable book and fill them directly from our office, either in person or by mail.

The regular trade edition is $1.25, post paid.

Mr. Hichborn's book should be in the hands of every person who desires to gain an interior view of the government of California AS IT IS, and the function of legislation AS IT IS PERFORMED session after session under our very eyes.

Having resided at the state capital and attended upon legislative sessions for a number of years, Mr. Hichborn has had unusual opportunities for getting close up to the true inwardness of things legislative and he deals with his subject in entire frankness.

No better volume could be put into the hands of a young man preparing himself for citizenship and for doing his part in making political conditions better than they are.

A CONTRAST WITH ENGLISH JUSTICE

THE PRACTICAL OPERATION OF THE LAWS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

By WARREN OLNEY, Sr.

A few years ago a young gentleman graduated at the University of California and then went to Harvard College, where he graduated in the Law Department. Before returning to his California home he crossed the ocean to England, landing at Liverpool early in the morning. As soon as he had settled himself at a hotel he went out for a walk. Presently he found himself in front of a large building, saw a good many people going in, and on asking what the building was, was told it was where the Assizes were held, and that the trial of a celebrated murder case was about to begin. Thereupon he followed the crowd, entered the court room, and found a seat just as the murder case was called for trial. He sat there for four hours. During that time the accused was arraigned, pleaded not guilty, a jury was impaneled, the evidence taken for the prosecution and the defense, the arguments were made by the prosecuting attorney and by the counsel for the accused, the judge charged the jury, the jury retired to consider of its verdict, brought in a verdict of guilty, and the judge sentenced the accused to be hanged. He found afterwards that the circumstances of the murder had attracted considerable attention in the newspapers. No man can tell how long it would have taken in a California court to have tried the case. My informant thought it would have taken a month.

At that time no appeal was allowed in criminal cases in England. Therefore the convicted man was undoubtedly hung within a very short time after the trial, unless the judge was dissatisfied with the verdict or felt that he himself had committed some error seriously impairing the rights of the accused. In rare cases the Secretary of State intervened, but the rule was universal that an accused man was speedily brought to trial after his arrest, and, if convicted, promptly punished. Two years ago Parliament passed an act permitting an appeal in certain criminal cases where in the opinion of the judge or of the appellate court there is probability of error having been committed seriously affecting the rights of the accused. But the Appellate Court may re-sentence the accused if convinced of his guilt in cases where the accused is found guilty on one count of the indictment by the jury when it ought to have been on another count. Unless in the opinion of the court there has been a miscarriage of justice or a settled principle of law violated, the appeal is dismissed. The Appellate Court also has the right, which I see is not unfrequently exercised, of reducing the punishment where in its opinion the sentence is too severe.

Civil Trials Also Brief.

The trial of civil cases in England is as brief and apparently as summary, probably more so, than that of persons accused of crime. The judge, when Court is opened in the morning, has what is called a "Paper" before him, similar to what we call the docket. On this paper are set down the names of the causes for trial that day, usually from five to ten in number. The Court and counsel expect to get through the entire docket before adjourning court for the day. In fact in early times no case was permitted to last over the day. A jury of respectable householders and citizens is in attendance. His Lordship calls the first case and asks who appears for the plaintiff. An inquiry is then made as to who appears for defendant. The judge then asks what the issues are. The counsel for plaintiff briefly states, and turning to the counsel for the defendant the judge asks what the defense is. He is also asked how much of the plaintiff's case as stated by the counsel is admitted. There is a practice in vogue there by which, before the trial, either side may present a statement of facts to the other side and require either an assent to the truth of the facts or a refusal to make such an admission. If it should turn out on the trial that any fact which one party has requested that other admit is actually true, the party so refusing, even though he may win the case, must pay the cost of taking the testimony to prove such fact, and, besides, the counsel so refusing is subject to reproach if his refusal is not a reasonable one. By preliminary questions asked by the judge and statements by the counsel, the court is quickly advised as to what issue of fact is to be determined. He thereupon directs a jury to be called into the box. This only takes a few minutes. It is the rarest thing in the world for any objection to be made to the jury, or to any member thereof. It is common practice to submit every case tried during the day to the same jury. The counsel for plaintiff then makes a statement of his case and what he expects to prove, and calls witnesses to prove the precise facts in issue. There is no wrangling over the introduction of testimony. The court aids and directs the proceedings and confines the testimony to the point in dispute. No time is wasted. When the plaintiff's side of the precise fact in dispute is presented, the counsel for the defense makes a statement of what the defense is, and admitting all that has been well proven on the part of the plaintiff. A large proportion of cases goes off upon statements of counsel. The arguments to the jury are short and must be addressed to the point. The judge does not permit wandering away from the real issues. In submitting the case to the jury the court does not, as with us, elaborately discuss the law, but reviews the testimony that has been offered by the respective parties, disentangling involved matters, commenting upon the probability or improbability of the statements made by witnesses, their relative importance, and calling attention where necessary to matters where the jury is likely to be misled by the zeal and arguments of the counsel. The Court makes the vital jury retire they usually reach a verdict without leaving the box, the verdict is recorded, and the next case is called and disposed of with equal promptness. No excuse is allowed on account of the absence of counsel. If counsel cannot be present for any reason he must be retained and another lawyer goes on with the case. The result is that before the day's sitting is adjourned the court has disposed of all the cases on his "paper." As many as ten or twelve jury trials are thus sometimes heard and settled in one day.

Under our American procedure each one of these cases would take all day and some of them a week, some of them a month. Appeals are allowed in civil cases, but they are not common. In fact, a proceeding similar to our motion for a new trial, and appeal, is never taken unless on account of some supposed error committed by the judge which goes to the merit of the cause. The result was, prior to the Judicature Act of about twenty-five years ago, that fifteen common law judges, the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, an Admiralty Judge and a Probate Judge disposed quickly and in the main satisfactorily of the litigation in England and Wales, except the chancery business which was too great for the Chancellor and Master of the Rolls to handle. As population and business increased the Judicature Act was passed which provides for thirty-one judges to do all the law, equity, admiralty, probate, divorce and criminal business of the Kingdom, including appeals.

Our Multiplicity of Judges.

In California our superior courts, Appellate Districts Courts, Supreme Court and United States Courts have jurisdiction of the same subjects, criminal and civil, disposed of by the English judges above mentioned, except here the courts have no jurisdiction when the amount involved in monetary disputes is less than $300. In England the downward limit is fifty pounds. But we have in this State one hundred and eighteen judges to do the work that thirty-one judges do in England. As the population of England and Wales is more than fifteen times as great as California, it would seem that England, according to our system, would need sixteen hundred and seventy judges. Or putting it another way, it would seem that on the average an English judge does as much business as fifty-four average California judges. The percentage of depraved and criminal people is undoubtedly greater in England than here. The percentage of business is also greater. But undoubtedly there is a greater percentage of litigation and crime here than there. The reason for that is not far to seek. The speedy and effective administration of justice prevents crime and litigation.

The English people are not only satisfied, but are proud of the way justice is administered in their country. It is the admiration of the civilized world. The American people are ashamed and much disturbed over the administration of justice here. Yet the laws of the two countries are practically the same. Even the laws regulating the procedure in the trial of both civil and criminal causes are practically the same here that obtain in England.

Laws Alike; Results Different.

A few weeks ago there was a series of articles published in The California Weekly on the procedure in English courts in criminal trials, and if any of you read those articles, and are familiar with the procedure here, you could not see any substantial difference between the laws regulating court proceedings in the two countries. The law being the same in England that it is here and the procedure established for the courts being practically the same here as there, what is the reason the administration of justice in one country is so admirable and in the other is so severely criticized?

The principal causes of difference are only two or three in number, but as it is a practical impossibility to eliminate those principal causes of the deterioration in the administration of justice in our courts, for the reason that they are largely inherent in democratic institutions such as ours, I shall only state them, and then will try to make some suggestions for possible improvement under our system of universal suffrage.

Judgeships Contrasted.

In the first place, the judges of England hold office for life, are paid tremendous salaries, and are held in such high honor that it is the ambition of every gifted, learned and high minded lawyer to attain a seat upon the bench. The salaries paid to those thirty-one English judges range from five thousand to ten thousand pounds per annum, with retiring pensions. A judge of distinguished merit is sure of a patent of nobility. The appointments are made nominally by the King, but really by the Lord Chancellor. He is himself always a great lawyer and would not be Lord Chancellor but for that fact and the further fact that he is a man of broad views, familiar with public affairs, knows men, and knows the conditions and needs of the English people. Naturally he is attached to and proud of his profession, and when a vacancy occurs upon the bench he carefully looks over the members of the bar who belong to his political party in order to select a judge with the mental, moral and acquired qualifications that will enable him to fill the place to the satisfaction of the bar, the litigants, and the general public, and who will add credit to the Chancellor and his political party by his conduct on the bench. The pay is so large, the honor so great, and the permanency of the seat so secure that there is no difficulty in regard to the acceptance of the office by the most eminent members of the bar. The Chancellor's difficulty is to make a selection of a lawyer for judge who has the proper equipment for the place.

With us the salaries are small, the term of office, for the Superior Court for instance, is only six years, and the honor of holding the office not great, and, more than all else, the means to fill the place of judge is not selected by an expert, familiar with the acquirements and endowments of the lawyers from whose number the judge is to be taken, but is selected by political conventions. The result is that there has been a steady deterioration of the court in the land until now no lawyer in good practice can afford to take a judgeship. Under our system there must be some exceptional reason if a duly qualified judge can be secured from among the younger members of the profession. It is not advisable to select old men for judges, even though they may have been distinguished at the bar. There are men sitting on the bench of the Superior Courts, and even of the Supreme Court, who never have had any professional business of their own to amount to anything, and are absolutely without this experience as advocates in the trial of causes that is necessary to equip and qualify a judge to hold up evenly the scales of justice between contending litigants and active and unscrupulous attorneys.

English Bar a Guild

The second cause for the greater efficiency of the English courts is also beyond our reach in this democratic country, or probably it is beyond our reach—you can judge when I state it. The profession of the law in England and in the civilized countries of Europe partakes very much of the character of a guild of the Middle Ages. They constitute to a considerable extent a privileged class. In this country any man who can pass a reasonably satisfactory examination in the elementary principles of the law and can obtain two lawyers to vouch for his good character must be admitted to practice the profession by the courts. If he misbehaves himself there is no way of getting rid of him as a lawyer except by a prosecution in the nature of a criminal proceeding. That is to say, he must be accused of unprofessional conduct with the same formalities as an indictment for a crime, and must be tried, with the same safeguards thrown around him and with the same intentions in his favor that obtains when a man is accused of murder. The result is that everybody is admitted to practice law who wants to be admitted, and after having once got into the profession it is almost an impossibility to get him out. I have myself been on several committees of the San Francisco Bar Association appointed to prosecute lawyers for disbarment and notwithstanding the good of the accused persons was clear, yet we did not succeed in one-half the cases in procuring a disbarment unless the party had been convicted of a felony or of some gross and palpable fraud upon the court.

Bar's Disciplinary Powers.

It is far different in England, France and Germany. There the courts have nothing to do with the admission of members of the bar or with continuing them in their profession or turning them out of it. In England lawyers are divided into two classes, Barristers and Solicitors, or, using the old name, attorneys. Only barristers are allowed to take part in court proceedings. The solicitors meet their clients, interview the witnesses and prepare the case, and also employ the barrister or counsel to appear in court and try it. It is from the ranks of barristers alone that judges are selected. They occupy a distinctly higher position than solicitors are possessed of an esprit du corps that scorns tricks. They are distinctly and clearly officers of the court and to them the judge looks for support. Barristers themselves call members of the bar—that is, invite them to become members of the bar. That is the theory, though as a matter of fact young men are entered as students at the Inns of Court, as they are called, and when in the opinion of the benchers, who rule the Inns of Court, that is, the leading lawyers of the organization, the candidate is a suitable person and fitted by learning for the requirements for the practice of his profession in the courts and as part of the court, they invite him to become a member of the organization. It is much like getting into a social club. The result is that the barristers have become a powerful guild, and a man fortunate enough to become a member of the guild is recognized by the world at large as a gentleman and a man of attainments. He becomes thoroughly infused with the traditions and the ideals of the bar, and very well knows that any misconduct on his part towards the court or brother lawyers, or his client, will bring ostracism in his profession and cause his expulsion therefrom, to his utter ruin in the community.

In the regular army of the United States an officer may be cashiered by his brother officers for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. It is the same with the legal profession in the countries I have mentioned. One of the results of the high character of the bar is that in England, France and Germany statements by counsels to the court are rarely questioned by the court or by the opposing counsel.

If you happen to remember the account of any trial, you must have noticed that the cases seemed to go off not upon the testimony of the witnesses, but upon the statement made by the counsel to the court of his case. I should judge that in one-half of the causes disposed of no witnesses are called, but the case is determined upon the statements made by respective counsel. These statements are generally short and to the point and quickly determine the matters in issue between the litigants. There is a public opinion and an atmosphere of professional ethics, a fear of displeasing the judge, and above all a professional pride, that keep lawyers within the lines of etiquette and personal honor.

The advantages of these two basic principles of the administration of justice in England, which I suppose are impossible of attainment in this country, not only appear from the satisfactory way in which causes are disposed of as above stated, but also strongly appear in the improvement that has taken place in the last hundred years in the administration of justice in England and the deterioration that has taken place in our own country.

American Courts Once Better.

One hundred years ago the administration of justice in the states then constituting the American Union was probably on the whole more satisfactory than was the administration of justice in England at that time. The reason was that at that time the old system of pleading and practice had been carried in England to what was supposed to be logical and perfect condition, with the result that a very large percentage of the cases in the civil courts were not decided upon the merits of the controversy between individuals, but upon questions of pleading. The declaration by the plaintiff, pleas in bar, traverse, confession and avoidance, the demurrer, the rebutter, the sur rebutter, etc., and all the refined machinery brought about by hundreds Chapter XVIII. LEGISLATION AS IT IS.

WITH John Middleton in the assembly, as chairman of the committee on irrigation, and Blythe Holland as secretary of the committee, it seemed to Silas Singham that the irrigation district bill ought to go through without difficulty and become a law. It was so self-evident as to require little or no argument to commend it to the mind of any reasonable man. Besides, the rains had come, the plowing had to be done, and Silas, himself, had to do it. He could not afford to hire a day's work that he could do himself. So he concluded not to go to Sacramento at all.

But the legislative wheels did not go round. The bill was among the first introduced and John had no difficulty in getting it referred to the committee, which he called as a matter of course, but to get the committee together—that was a different thing. Just enough remained away from every meeting he called to prevent a quorum. Blythe Holland was set to work on the problem, and was not long in finding the difficulty. A majority of the members of the committee were not there for their health.

Besides, it required a great deal of man-to-man talking to convince legislators of the feasibility of the proposition—more than John Middleton could do unaided, for Blythe Holland was not a heavyweight on that side of the house. He was better at finding out what was what. Silas Singham was sent for.

He was much put out, and came with ill humor toward the legislature for what he regarded as dereliction of duty. Blythe Holland had found out that, for $50 apiece, he could secure the attendance of two committee members necessary for a quorum, one from San Francisco and the other from Sacramento. He did not have the money and knew well enough that no money was to be had, but he thought it no harm to have a little on hand. Silas and these two statesmen, anyway, so he told them to wait until the big "Sandlapper" came, and he would arrange an interview for them; that he owned thousands of acres of land, had money to burn and needed only to get his hands into the rousers pocket to meet their demands without question. He appointed a place of meeting just off the rounds on the second floor of the capitol, and was to steer Silas in that direction. He also "tipped off" the anticipated event to two or three newspaper reporters that they might be within easy distance.

Singham was unsuspecting, and Blythe Holland, who had been introducing Silas to all the legislators he could find, made these two assemblymen known to him, and then discreetly took himself out of the way. The assemblymen, being two to one, and therefore prepared to outwear the third man if he proved to be less than discreet, were not slow in making their demands plain to an ordinary understanding, but Silas' mind worked slowly that morning. The proposal, made in plain terms, rather dazed him. He questioned them to make sure, and when they bluntly blurted out that they were not there for their health, that if he wanted his committee to meet, with a quorum for reporting out the district bill, he would have to slip them the $50 each, the hot blood rushed to his head and there was a roar heard that echoed from the assembly hall to the senate chamber at the far end of the capitol building.

"What?" he demanded, reaching at the same time for the collars of both of them, one in either hand, swinging them apart to arm's length and then slamming them together as though they had been dummies stuffed with straw, "you hold me up for fifty dollars before you will even attend a meeting of the irrigation committee! Why, condemn your immortal souls! I ought to smash your brains out here and now. You ought to be drawn and quartered and burned at the stake. Hold us up for money! We who propose to convert these two great interior valleys into two magnificent cornucopias pouring their unstinted wealth into the pockets of Sacramento and the bay cities" (bellying forth a part of the story he had rehearsed in preparation for the much dreaded task of lobbying) accompanying his torrent of words with an alternate swinging apart and smashing together that fairly knocked the breath out of them. "Pay you money? Not till hell freezes over! But I tell you what I will do. That committee meets tonight in room 13, third floor, at 8 o'clock sharp. See to it that you are there, both of you—on time, too, or I'll be looking for you, and if I find you I'll smash the pavement with you. Now, git."

They got, and not again during the session was there an intimation that there was anything to be had "good for the health" in voting for or against the irrigation district law. Moreover, the two man-handled assemblymen attended the irrigation committee on time, made up the needed quorum and promptly reported the bill out with the recommendation that it "do pass." The newspaper men "played up" the incident, and Silas Singham's introduction to the legislature gave him the entree to every ear.

Silas Singham threw himself into the work of lobbying as he had thrown himself into the campaign for the election of John Middleton to the assembly. The intensity, the honesty and the deadly earnestness of those deep blue eyes of his fairly stabbed to the heart every legislator or press representative with whom he came in contact. If anyone ventured to raise an objection he talked him down and out. There was no withstanding so sincere an enthusiasm. He made converts right and left and cowed opponents into quiescence if not into submission.

But still the wheels did not go round. As the bill was gotten out of the assembly committee on irrigation, with the recommendation that it do pass, so was it gotten out of the senate committee with a like recommendation, but in both cases the bill went to the judiciary committees and there it stuck. Singham and Middleton were at their wits' ends. Not so Blythe Holland, who set himself to ferreting out the mystery.

Bursting into Silas Singham's room at a cheap boarding house, where Middleton and Silas were indulging in a spell of the blues over their prospects, Blythe poured out into them in this wise: "You are a pretty pair of babes-in-the-woods sent up here to procure legislation for the people, aren't you? You have talked to every man here until you have worn yourselves and them to a frazzle and you haven't turned a wheel—all because you have left unseen the one man whom you ought to have seen first of all. I am a little slow myself, but I'm not dead to the world."

"Who is it, and I'll run him down in a minute," declared Singham, reaching for his big slouch hat.

"Why Bill Stowe, the Espee boss."

"What has he got to do with it?"

"Nothing, only everything. Do you suppose that there is a bit of legislation going through this session that he does not supervise and approve? Not on your tinsy! As I say, I have been a little slow myself, but I have got it dead to rights now and don't you forget it. It is Bill Stowe and you for it, or no bill."

"Come on, John," called Silas, reaching again for his hat, "there is no time to lose."

"Oh, yes, there is," interrupted Blythe Holland. "Just you wait until I have an appointment with His Majesty, The Real Thing."

They waited, and, in a day or two, Holland had an appointment fixed for them, and Silas and John went to legislative headquarters at the Golden Eagle Hotel.

They explained their plans to the minutest detail and enlarged on what the enactment of such a measure would do in furnishing people and produce for the railroad to haul. The railroad boss appeared to be much interested. He promised to have the bill submitted to the law department of his company. If the report were favorable he would see what could be done in interesting some of his legislative friends in it. There would be some taxation of railroad properties which, of course, did not need irrigation and should be taxed nominally if at all, but that could probably be arranged. The big boss did all that he had promised to do, the legal report on the bill was on the whole, favorable.

Still the wheels of legislation did not move. The newspapers of the state had talked the measure up approvingly and a number of strong men in the legislature had awakened to its importance. In fact, the irrigation district bill had become the most talked-of measure before the legislative session, but still it did not make progress. Where was the hitch? The session was drawing towards its close, with the bill still in the hands of the senate and assembly judiciary committees. Silas Singham was becoming desperate. They must, they could not, fail. Once again Blythe Holland undertook to smoke the trouble out.

This was the first session of the legislature that Blythe Holland had attended, but he did not miss another until he had become so covered with the Suncoast brand as to be no longer of use. He was not slow in making the rules of the legislative game his own. Not only did he lobby for the irrigation district bill, but he soon found ways of making himself useful to promoters of other measures, for a recompense, proving tactful, resourceful and discreet. He had learned enough to know that if the railroad people were really behind the measure it would go through and receive the signature of the railroad-made governor. Otherwise, not. He got next to some of the Big Boss's hangers-on, who went to the influential statesman himself for a straight shot. It came. It was that the Big Boss would like to see John Middleton personally and alone. John lost no time in holding the interview.

"How is your irrigation district bill getting on?" the Big Boss asked, just as though he did not know all about it.

"Stuck," was the reply.

"Where?"

"In both judiciary committees."

"Pretty far down on the files, isn't it?"

"Yes, a good many bills have been advanced on the calendar ahead of it while it has been held up in the judiciary committees."

"Do you know Mr. Justice Blank of the state supreme court?"

"Only by sight and reputation."

"Reputation good, sight slightly failing, on the down-hill side of life so to speak, but he has a good deal of influence still. I shall be glad to give you my card to him."

"What can he do for our measure in the legislature? I suppose it will have to come before the court some day, but I never thought of broaching the subject to a supreme court justice in advance of its being enacted into law."

"Better go and see him," was the recommendation, "but go alone. Don't talk that Sandlapper with you. I understand that he is a strong character," he added with a merry twinkle of the eye, "but I am afraid he may not be discreet. His voice does not suggest discretion, and the more I am sending you on is one of great delicacy, as I do not need to assure you. I thought first of your man Blythe Holland, in whose discretion I have come to place great reliance. He has executed some minor commissions for us with so much acumen that I am planning larger things for him in the future, but he is not so strong on the law points, so I chose myself. I think you'll find the Judge on the next floor above at the end of the hall, and alone. If I were you I would go up and see him directly. Just rap Mr. Justice Blank, the Big Boss went on to explain, "is a jurist of the highest character. He possesses the full confidence of the chairmen of both judiciary committees, and his influence with both of them will be great. The railroad people do not look with disfavor upon your measure, except as to the matter of taxation, which, however, can probably be arranged afterward, but the bill if passed might fail in the higher courts. If that could be arranged for in advance assurance would be made doubly sure."

John Middleton thanked the Big Boss in silence of gratitude and went at once to the room of Justice Blank on the floor above, and at the farthest end of the winding hall. He rapped, handed in his card and was at once admitted. The Judge was alone, and apparently waiting.

The conference was long, plain spoken, man to man, face to face. Justice Blank felt sure that he could trust to Middleton's sense of delicacy and prudence in the matter, and so un-bosomed himself completely.

The legislature had made the Common Law of England the law of California where not otherwise provided, and while it was true enough that, according to the Common Law itself, any one of its rules failed of application when the reason for it failed, as it manifestly did, at least in part, with reference to riparian rights, yet, inasmuch as the courts and legislature had started that way, they could not now retrace their steps. Precedents once established must be followed, but the judges on the bench had been looking for a way around the difficulties presented by a rigid application of the extreme doctrine of riparianism and this proposed district law seemed to point in the right direction, only it would have to be modified in some particulars to fit the need.

Inapplicable as the riparian law of England was certain rights had vested under it. If the decisions of the courts relative to these cases were reversed it would have to be on the theory that the courts had erred in the first instance and that what they had held to be the law never had been the law, and therefore no rights could have vested under those decisions. So much of the wealth of California as had been invested in country real estate had been mainly invested along the streams. Those property interests must not now be disturbed. However favorable the head of the railroad political machine might seemingly have been to the measure he could not overlook, or refuse to protect, the property rights of his constituents, and that was why he, Justice Blank, had been consulted. Property rights; government is built on it. Civilization depends upon its perpetuity and protection. It was to that end that those at the head of affairs, whether legislative, judicial or executive, commonly consulted together before important matters were acted upon.

In short, if water be taken out of the streams for the irrigation of lands back from the streams the owners of lands lying along the streams would have to be compensated for the diversion. The right of eminent domain could be exercised on behalf of a community of farmers, and compensation be made for water taken. That would open the way for the irrigation of dry lands with such water as the riparian lands did not require, yet not disturb a line of decisions too long standing to be reversed. A few slight changes could be made in the bill that would make this result follow as a matter of course without specifically stating it, which might cause controversy. So amended, the measure was probably acceptable to the chairmen of the senate and assembly judiciary committees. Would John Middleton consent thereto?

He would, personally, but would have to talk the matter over with his associate, Mr. Singham, but, of course, without divulging the source of information. It was done. The committees quickly reported that the measure "do pass," and it did pass both houses, and received executive sanction. Silas Singham went home exultant.

Then came the formation of Enterprise Irrigation District, which included all the irrigable land between the foothills and the lake on the south side of the Kaweah river, a round 200,000 acres. What a fight was that!

These events must be passed over hastily. The river owners swore the greater part of their lands out of the district as not requiring irrigation. Others, being fearful of everything new, swore theirs out because of the existence of a dry ditch which sufficed for a pretended source of water supply already, so that, when the Board of Supervisors finally fixed the boundaries of the proposed district it contained less than 50,000 acres and a map of it resembled a section of a backgammon board.

Nevertheless the "Sandlapper" district went ahead with its formation, and voted a half million dollars in bonds for the acquisition of water rights and construction of irrigation works. Engineers were employed, plans were made and bonds offered for sale. There were few buyers. The banks were chary of the bonds because they were new and had not borne the tests of time, legal interpretation and redemption in good faith. However, by dint of hawking them about, trading them for water rights, materials and work, at ruinous sacrifice, a canal system was constructed and the water turned into the ditches. The district had a hard time to carry out its plan, and on the dollar of bonds voted, or half as much as the spot cash should have brought them. Over this the people felt extremely sensitive, not to say sore, but they rejoiced that a more certain and adequate supply of water was at hand.

Chapter XIX. ADVERSITY.

Succeeding years did not flow smoothly with the "Sandlapper" district or with the people who lived or owned property within it. The hand of every river man, and of every prior appropriator of water from the river, appeared to be against it, and to make conditions more difficult, there were successive seasons of deficient snowfall in the mountains, with consequent shortness of the season's run of water in the canals.

On top of these troubles came the panic of '98, when nothing that the farmer feared or grew commanded a price that repaid the cost of production. The people felt themselves "up against it" and no mistake. Many of them lost heart, and when the usual levy was made for paying the interest on the district bonds, few made any effort to pay their district taxes. Others, foreseeing an inevitable defaulting on the interest, thought it better to keep their money in their own hands than to pay it on an account certain not to be liquidated.

There was dissatisfaction, too, with the district law and the district idea. The capacity of the people for constructing and operating a communal system of irrigation, in place of a corporate one, appeared to have been overestimated.

Meantime an orchard and vineyard enthusiasm had struck the community, and plantings were made that strained the credit of the planters to the last notch. Being young, these plantings were non-productive. Mortgages were increased and interest was generally unpaid.

The community life was full of bickerings, heart-burnings and discontent. The people, and pretty much all these focused upon Silas Singham as the author of the people's miseries. He it was who had gotten them into the district enterprise and it was his advice, and that of John Middleton, that they had followed to their undoing. They forgot that money at the time did grow was the result of district water, and seemed to feel that but for these bonds they would have been prosperous.

At this juncture there appeared upon the scene certain lawyers. Looking out upon the state, and perceiving the great amount of irrigation districts in general, and this district in particular, they thought they saw a fruitful field for profitable litigation. They called meetings and harangued the people, declaring that the irrigation district law was unconstitutional, the organization of the "Sandlapper" district invalid, the voting of the bonds illegal, their sale effected contrary to law and the bonds themselves voidable at the pleasure of the taxpayers. They had come to "free the people from an unbearable burden."

Silas Singham attended the meeting and listened to the advice given by these barristers until they had finished, then he rose from his seat in the back of the hall and went to the platform. He was much incensed. His first utterance was: "Woe unto you, lawyers, who come to preach the doctrine of repudiation to this people!"

Then he went on to admit that the land owners were in a sad predicament, confessing his full share in creating it, but explaining that the primal cause, after all, was the great financial calamity that had come upon our common country and the civilized world; but he held that a community should be as honest as an individual would be expected to be, and to suggest a repudiation of a bonded debt was an insult to the integrity of the community.

"If, however," he declared, "time shall prove that the district has gotten into deeper water than it can pass through without losing all, then an honorable compounding of their debt, on a basis of what can be paid without sacrificing all, may become necessary, and when that day comes, if it come, the bondholders will no doubt be as reasonable as the taxpayers themselves."

"But we should remember," he declared, "that we have accepted some hundreds of thousands of dollars, given us in good faith, and have expended it. If mistakes were made in expending the money they were our mistakes and not the mistakes of the bondholders, and we, and not they, should suffer for those mistakes."

His conclusion he urged the people to send these lawyers kiting, to stand firm for the right, do their best and await a general recovery from the panic before concluding that their own plight was beyond redemption.

He was listened to in sullen silence. Scarcely one applauded him, and he was the only one of his own neighbors arose in his place and moved the adoption of a series of resolutions which he sent to the secretary to be read. They were as follows:

"Whereas, One Silas Singham was a prime mover in procuring the enactment of the obnoxious unconstitutional and unworkable irrigation district law that now bears heavily upon the commonwealth; and

"Whereas, By following his impractical, self-constituted and dominating leadership, this community is brought to the verge of bankruptcy; and

"Whereas, His sympathies are manifestly with the bondholders, eager for their pound of flesh cut from the heart of this community; therefore, be it resolved,

"Resolved, By the duly elected citizens, in mass meeting assembled, that any further assumption of leadership on his part is hereby repudiated and that his presence and participation in the proceedings of this meeting are undesirable and calculated to disturb the harmony and thwart the purposes of such meeting; be it therefore further

"Resolved, That the said Silas Singham be, and he is, respectfully requested to withdraw from this assemblage that the citizens may be free to address themselves to the task of extricating this community from the unfortunate predicament into which his unwise and unsought leadership has precipitated it."

Without discussion the question was put by the chairman and adopted with a thundering roar of voices. The speaker rose in utter confusion. A few cried "for shame" and, white with rage and humiliation, Silas Singham strode toward the door of the hall. On the threshold he turned and, shaking his finger at the audience, cried in a voice that amounted almost to a scream, "I can help you out of this difficulty. I shall help you. You can not prevent me!" then passed out of the hall, leaped into his wagon and drove furiously homeward.

For many months Silas Singham bent himself to his farm work as scarcely ever before. He rarely left the ranch, and, if he chanced to meet one of his neighbors on the road he passed on without giving a sign of recognition. He had been deeply wounded, and made no effort to conceal the fact.

But he went on thinking. His nightly vigils on the platform of the windmill were scarcely interrupted by wind or rain. His views changed as the status of the district's affairs changed. At first he wanted the bondholders to surrender such a percentage of the bonds as would suffice to construct a reservoir, provided for in the original plan, with the aid of which the people should undertake to pay the remainder, principal and interest, but, as the debt mounted higher and higher and the productive capacity of the district sank lower and lower, he demanded greater concessions from the bondholders in the interests of the people.

A defense association of the taxpayers had been formed at the meeting referred to above and lawyers employed to break the validity of the bonds. The cases went from lower court to higher and back again to be retried finally reaching the supreme court of the United States. At every step the cases had gone against the taxpayers, and when the court of last resort had validated both the district and the bonds the spirit of combat gave way to the spirit of despair.

This had taken five straight years, during which Silas Singham and John Middleton had stood staunchly for an honorable compounding of the debt on a basis of what the people could pay without confiscation of their homes. The bondholders looked upon them as radicals, and the people, with here and there an exception, had looked upon them as having been bought up by the bondholders.

During these years scarcely a tree or vine had been planted in the district, a gap in a fence nailed up or a new building erected in the community. Hundreds of houses had been moved out of Tulare to farms beyond the district borders or to other towns, and no new houses had been built. Many had sold out for a song and gotten out of the district in the belief that all was lost. Young heads grew gray and gray heads grew white under the burden of care. Crops were made where water was wisely used, and business went on as elsewhere, save that there was nothing for hope to build on and the people did not know if they or the bondholders would own their homes.

Meantime Silas Singham had located, and placed himself in communication with, the holder of every bond that had been issued by the "Sandlapper" district. When the spirit of panic seized any one of them, and made him anxious to sell his holding at a sacrifice, Silas quickly found a purchaser, or his bonds among the holders of property in the district, to be retained as an offset to the tax obligation. By this process a considerable portion of the bonded debt came to be held by the debtors themselves, and their influence, as bondholders, upon other bondholders became great.

He had become a voluminous letter writer. He kept the absentee bondholders in touch with the local situation and finally gained their confidence. His frankness and his courageous defense of a policy of justice toward them, as well as of mercy toward the people, made him the only intermediary with whom many of the bondholders would deal, and his refusal to touch a farthing of profit for any service rendered gave him a leverage that few could resist.

With great labor and care he valued every farm and unoccupied piece of land in the district and estimated its rental value, after deducting the kind of living that the cultivator of the tract would submit to rather than go elsewhere. He divided the remaining rental value into two parts, one for the owner and one for the bondholders, and thereby estimated with approximate accuracy what the district could afford to pay the bondholder without forfeiting the existing ownership in the land, and insisted that so much, and no less, should be offered the bondholders in compensation of their claim.

When at last the highest court in the land had spoken authoritatively, and the attorneys for the people could offer them nothing more than a policy of filibustering against the collection of the debt, Silas Singham was ready to meet the emergency. He sprung his proposal for an honorable compounding of the debt, and, with his old time enthusiasm, he made his appeal to reason, man to man, and he soon won the taxpayers over to his view. His taxpayer-bondholders were now inspired to do their best to the satisfaction of their bondholder associates and the bid.

Perhaps it was the fear of a never ending policy of filibustering against paying the debt, perhaps it was the innate reasonableness of Silas Singham's well worked out plan; but whatever the cause, the bondholders, even to the last man of them, were won over one by one, their bonds placed in escrow in San Francisco, the taxes levied and collected, and the money paid. The "Sandlapper" district was made free, and it was Silas Singham, more than all others, who had freed it.

("English Justice,"—Concluded.)

of years of labor on the part of lawyers and courts, looking to a logical and correct system for ascertaining the true point in dispute between the persons, rather than the point of justice, were then in full vogue. The difficulty of stating a cause of action under its proper head or division and of putting in the defense properly had become so great that there was a distinct branch of the legal profession and the lawyers belonging to it known as special pleaders. They were men of acute and logical minds and great technical learning, whose business it was to prepare pleadings for brother lawyers. A mistake in the form of action, and those forms were very numerous, applied to the case, or a fault in the pleading of the plaintiff losing his case, though clearly entitled to relief for injury done to him by the defendant.

Reform of English Procedure.

Less than one hundred years ago the bench and bar of England became dissatisfied with the extremely technical proceedings in vogue, and after much discussion the courts of Westminster Hall, by general rules adopted about 1834, amended what we would call the Code of Civil Procedure so as greatly to simplify the pleadings and practice of the courts, thereby sweeping away a great mass of technicalities and aiding the courts to dispose of causes between litigants as right and justice demanded. About 1883 the judges adopted new rules which correspond to and much resemble our Code of Civil Procedure, and which seem to be the ultimate expression of the law looking to simplicity of proceedings in the methods of attaining justice. At the present time, therefore, the pleadings and the procedure of the English courts are of the simplest, and the character of the proceedings is undoubted justice in all cases is impossible of attainment by any human tribunal, but the English courts strive to dispose of every case not by any technical rules, but by what right and justice and the settled law of England demand.

One hundred years ago in this country, while the legal profession was not a guild, as it is in Europe, it was still beyond question a learned profession, with high ideals and with the brightest intellects in the community taking the lead. The judges were not as a rule selected by popular vote, but were appointed by the governors of the respective states, and generally were men whom the legal profession and the community at large respected for their learning and esteemed for their character and ability. In those states where judges were elected by popular vote the character of the bench was still maintained because of the traditions attending the office and the further fact that suffrage in those days in all the states of the Union was limited to property-holders and generally to freemen. A man did not have the temerity to present himself as a candidate for a judgeship unless there was a general feeling among the bar and the community of his fitness for office. It seemed to be understood that if a judge filled his office satisfactorily he was to be elected and re-elected whenever the occasion occurred. For that reason, in New York, and the New England states, in the rural districts, and even for the Supreme bench, Democrats who had no sympathy with the general trend of public sentiment during the war for the Union were still kept in office. Again, too, the rules of practice were not so technical here as in England.

Politics a Bar to Good Judges.

Therefore, on the whole, one hundred years ago the administration of justice in this country was probably better than it was in England. But since then universal suffrage has come to be adopted and that was followed immediately by the selection of judges by political

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

I quote from page 160, October number of U. S. Monthly Consular and Trade Reports:

"The South German Iron and Steel Association, which comprises 12,493 persons employing 210,000 workmen, reports the average yearly earnings of a fully employed journeyman workman during the year 1908 at $283.94, as compared with $280.00 in 1907 and $281.00 for the year. Not counting Sundays and deducting twenty days for holidays, it will be seen that the average daily wages of a journeyman workman in the South German Iron and Steel industries was less than ninety-seven cents."

"In manufacturing how can we compete with such wages? We who pay $3.00 a day to street sweepers, $18.00 a week, $20.00 per annum. Sympathetic women explain 'how can the poor men support families on $18.00 a week?' Who is to set the pace and style of living?"

In the good old state of Pennsylvania sixty years ago, ere railroads and telegraphy had made such advances, thrifty farmers' daughters often owned horses, perhaps, from father or uncle. In many cases it was boasted of these young women that they could irritate and saddle their horses. They would do so and ride off to visit a friend, finding keen enjoyment.

A scene of the kind near Burnside the other day: Two horses, tandem, to a sort of sulky, perched high in front in liver-colored coat, brass buttons, silk hat, the driver sat, behind on the single seat sat a female in gorgeous attire, ostrich feathers enough about the head to conceal any but the most beautiful and pitiful sight. Who shall set the pace and style?"

ONE WHO REMEMBERS.

ical conventions and in ward meetings, with the necessary result that the best fellow, in the opinion of the crowd, got the nomination. Then the legislatures of the respective states took upon themselves the matter of regulating the practice of the courts of justice. In my opinion, this was a usurpation, but the bench and the bar acquiesced therein, with the result that we have a mass of legislation usually proposed by young and inexperienced lawyers who are members of the legislature, or by men who have some self-interest in the matter. The only systematic, intelligent and efficient improvement of procedure in this country has been brought about by the lawyers and judges who have been able to induce legislatures to adopt their views. The time of the courts has been largely consumed in determining the application of legislative acts to procedure, and about thirty-three per cent. of the decisions of our courts relate, not to the merits of controversies between individuals but to matters of practice. There is also a large percentage of cases decided by our highest state courts in both civil and criminal matters on some question of practice and not upon the right as between the parties to civil cases and between the community and an accused person in criminal cases.

Law Now Unattractive Profession.

Another cause of deterioration in the administration of justice has been that formerly the brightest and most ambitious and able young men adopted the legal profession, while in these modern days the rewards of business have become so great that the profession does not present the same inducements to young men of ability and character that it once did. It does not present the same inducements here as in England.

Therefore, taking the profession of the law and the practice of the courts by and large, we have not in this country kept pace with the advance of civilization. The administration of justice should be as far superior in this day to what it was one hundred years ago as education, morals, business methods and general knowledge are superior to what they were one hundred years ago. We have made some improvements in the matters of evidence and in the manner relating to the gathering of evidence, and theoretically we have made improvements in the matter of pleadings, but on the whole our state legislatures and the little men who have been elected by popular vote as judges have befuddled matters until the attainment of justice in a civil case is a matter of mere luck. To prosecute an offender who has money enough to secure the best legal talent for his defense is extremely difficult, and to convict him is almost an impossibility.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Odds and Ends of the New Constitution.

The eight or ten lessons we have had upon the New Constitution of California have been to little effect if they have not shown that document not to be the dangerous, revolutionary and socialistic production that many supposed it to be when it was adopted by the people. It has been much patched since then and is not now the best instrument of its kind that is or could be, but at least it was not destructive of human rights or rights to property. There was and is too much of legislation in the constitution. An organic law should be simple and should deal with elemental principles rather than with particulars, but the irresponsibility of legislatures and uncertainty of judicial interpretation go far toward excusing the people at large for legislating directly, even when not well equipped for that function.

With reference to the rights of women both the old and the new constitutions were liberal, the new one especially so in providing that, "No person shall on account of sex be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business, vocation or profession." Except for the right to vote womanhood in California enjoys about all the rights and privileges which fall to the lot of manhood and there are few gainful pursuits in which men are found where women are not also. Woman's influence in public affairs is ever increasing and it does not seem likely that she can long be denied the suffrage, the more especially if, without the suffrage, she makes herself indispensable to the moral well-being of the commonwealth. Her influence counts at the ballot box if her vote does not.

Section 3 of article 1 provides that, "The State of California is an inseparable part of the American Union and the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land." When the old constitution was adopted California was not yet in the Union, but only expected to be. By the time the New Constitution was adopted secession had been made odious and the desire was to recognize the bond to the union as being inseparable, now and forever. There are times when the passions run high, or demagoguery is especially rampant, that certain of our citizens overlook the force of this provision in our constitution. Points of conflict between state and national authority there always will be and each of these will have to be determined upon its own state of facts, but it is worth while for every youth to remember that the Constitution of the United States, and not the constitution of the State of California, is the supreme law in California in all particulars in which the national government has jurisdiction. This is as immutable as the Union is inseparable.

There is some justification for wishing that Section 24 of Article 1, had been left out of the New Constitution. It provides that, "No property qualification shall ever be required for any person to vote or hold office." When we reflect that the bane of our political life is the political "push," and that the raw material of that push is the propertyless man without family or home, whose earthly belongings are carried in his valise, whose domicile can be changed at a day's notice for colonizing any ward or district, and that his place of "hanging-out" is some saloon attached to some political boss, we are led to believe that some small property qualification, or being a householder if not a house owner, might reasonably be required as a condition precedent to voting. No city in Europe that undertakes municipal ownership would think of making such a venture without first barring from the suffrage this irresponsible, ambitious, misguided and debauched element in the citizenry.

Section 30 of Article IV, prohibiting the giving of public moneys in any form in aid of sectarian institutions of any kind, except orphanages, is very sweeping in its provisions, but none too much so to fit the needs of the case. There are certain sectarian bodies that feel that they should be entitled to receive in hand their pro rata of all public school moneys in order that they may be devoted to sectarian education, but it is easy to see that if one denomination were permitted to do this other denominations would claim the same privilege and that the public school system would crumble to pieces. Besides, the public schools are the best assimilators of cosmopolitanism into a homogeneous Americanism that human ingenuity can devise. This provision is reinforced by Section 8 of Article IX which prohibits sectarian instruction of all kinds in any of the public schools, another point upon which denominationalism is touchy. The new constitution finished this subject before it left it.

Our new constitution has been a good deal patched and amended since it was adopted thirty years ago, but nothing to what it would have been if all the amendments submitted to the people from time to time had been adopted by them. There is a feeling abroad that it would be better to revise the constitution by another convention than to do much more patching, but there are so many elements fearful of what a new constitutional convention might bring forth that it may be some years before another constitutional convention will be called. The courts are particularly opposed to constitution-making, for it imposes upon them the duty of going over pretty much all the judicial work they have gone over to reinterpret it in accordance with the new organic law. The likelihood is that we shall not have a new constitution until the demand of the people for a more direct legislative power sweeps all before it.

Nevertheless, whenever two-thirds of the members of both houses of the legislature join in submitting a call for a new constitutional convention to the people for adoption, and the people adopt it, the next legislature will have to enact a law providing for such a convention. That convention will convene and make a new constitution and then that constitution will have to go to the people again to be accepted or rejected. So we see that nothing can be done to the organic law, except through judicial interpretation (which sometimes does a good deal to it) without abundant action on the part of the people themselves.

A FRESNO PLAN.

The New York Sun says that Mrs. F. E. Cook of Fresno, Cal., has evolved an original plan for helping the improvement of her home city. She has a large and very beautiful garden in which she employs several gardeners to raise plants and shrubs, which she gives to all who apply for them to plant in their gardens or on the grass plots in front of their homes. During the past year she is reported to have given away several thousand plants. She is the president of several women's clubs in Fresno.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: OCTOBER 22: 09 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. I Published by California Weekly, Incorporated 26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

WHAT "COLLIER'S WEEKLY" SAYS.
[From Collier's Weekly, Oct. 16, 1909.]
"TWO WEEKLIES.

"Anybody who wishes to see Pacific Coast matters ably presented, through the eyes of the San Francisco traction interests, Southern Pacific Railroad, and land and power grabbing activity, may attain his ideal by subscribing to the 'Argonaut.' One, on the other hand, who desires to see the same situation reviewed, also with ability but with much courage, from the point of view of general honesty and welfare, could not do better than to choose the 'California Weekly.'"

To Our Readers In The Interior.

Some apology may appear to be necessary for giving so large a proportion of space to a consideration of San Francisco affairs. San Francisco is now fighting the battle of the state. Next year the state may have to fight the battles of San Francisco. Never were issues more vital to the well-being of the commonwealth.

The genius who presides over the Southern Pacific's political bureau has, ever since his advent, made shift to put himself in control of the party organizations of San Francisco. He cares not who recruits the soldiers so that he has the naming of the officers under whom they are to serve. With this strategic advantage he has been able to control the state.

Already the control of the Republican organization in San Francisco has been reduced to possession. The next thing is to elect as mayor the candidate who can be made most servicable to the political bureau aforesaid and to the allied iniquities that seek shelter under its protection. That candidate is P. H. McCarthy and to him there is every reason to believe the Southern Pacific's political cohorts will throw all their strength.

Another purpose of this political bureau is to defeat Francis J. Heney for district attorney. His defeat will mean that justice is not to be established in San Francisco, that criminal wealth is to maintain itself beyond and above the law. If this is to be so in San Francisco it will be so elsewhere. Hence the cause of San Francisco is the cause of the state and The California Weekly is helping. That's why.

Harris Weinstock Speaks Out.

Well meaning persons, lacking a discriminating discernment, have been inclined to attribute the lax moral sentiment in San Francisco commercial circles to the fact that a large factor in those circles is made up of Hebrew people. And it must be admitted that there are some Jewish old-clothes men whose policy it is to let others fight the battles of morality while they get the peezness." It matters not that some of this ilk have so prospered in "peezness," as to become heads of banks and trust companies, they are essentially old-clothes men still with an old-clothes man's attitude of mind toward the great concerns of political and commercial life.

(FIFTH ARTICLE.)

By G. W. Dickie

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

But no man who has been near to the heart of things need be told that the line that divides those who want justice done from those who do not, those who want equality before the law from those who want special privileges and exemptions in favor of wealth and station, cuts right down through Jews and Gentiles, Catholics and Protestants, bankers, merchant princes, street cleaners and bootblacks, Republicans and Democrats, lawyers and physicians. It is all an issue of the manhood that is in the man with no regard to race or condition.

Therefore it surprised no one that Harris Weinstock came out flat-footed, unequipped and strong for the contention, first, that the prosecutions for graft are not hurting business and, second, that if they are hurting we must stand the hurt like men, lest a worse thing come upon us—the degradation of the moral fibre of our civilization, and the classification of the United States with such countries of peridious business and politics as Russia, China, Persia and Turkey.

We repeat that while the declarations of Harris Weinstock occasioned no surprise, yet as much satisfaction was taken in them as the men who heard them knew how to express. If many Jewish hearts have warmed with pride in that men like Harris Weinstock and Rabbi Wise are peculiarly their own people, so also countless others have felt their hearts warm with thankfulness that such men are brothers to them in civic righteousness and as defenders of a common democratic faith.

More Stately Mansions.

It is with no apologies, and with no sense of shame, that San Francisco has this week welcomed the people from the rest of the state to come and view the new that has taken the place of the old. What human energy and enterprise could do to rehabilitate a destroyed city has been done and San Franciscans frankly ask their visitors to be glad with them, that where, three and a half years ago, were ruins and only ruins, now are such edifices as would do credit to any city on the continent. So far as material achievements are concerned San Francisco is proud, and claims the right to be proud.

But deep down in her heart of hearts San Francisco has the desire and the will to build more stately mansions while the swift seasons roll, mansions not visible to the eye and yet the consciousness of whose existence gives courage to the heart and peace to the mind. San Francisco is striving now, as few cities or peoples have striven, to build a temple in honor of justice, justice stern but without hate, as impartial as God's providences but as gently retributive as will meet the needs of the common good.

As a pledge of good faith against the election of November 2nd (the true anniversary of the day that Fortinla discovered the bay), San Francisco points to the fact that whenever, since the fire, it has been put to the test of manhood it has not failed to measure up to the highest requirement. It is building a more stately mansion than any it has to show today, and when it is finished it will be a glory to the state and to the nation.

Had It Known One Thing More.

Had it known one thing more, our able, but off-wrong contemporary, the Argonaut, would not have experienced so bad a half column over its discovery that the last congress enacted a law which makes it a penal offense to "make, issue or circulate any note, check, memorandum, token or other obligation for a sum less than one dollar," for the purpose, as the Argonaut alleges, of stopping "that system of retail trading done by correspondence." The one thing more the Argonaut should have known is that the statute particularly specifies, "to be used as money." This measure protects fractional silver currency in circulation and preserves the money-printing power where it should be retained, in the custody of the nation. But this legislation, had it anticipated instead of followed the era of labor exchange shipplasters, would have worked a greater good.

All Heney's Fault.

The cases of a group of convicted Oregon land-grabbers have been heard this week by the United States Court of Appeals and the contention, in effect, was that defendants ought not to be punished for their offenses because Heney, who secured their conviction, was not a resident of Oregon at that time.

We, of California, are quite used to squaring the offenses of others by charging them to Francis J. Heney. Pat Calhoun should go free because he does not like Heney, and Ruef should go free because Heney does not like him, but somehow, however the courts may view such pleas in defense of criminals, to the lay mind they convey an implication of immateriality.

Our Lady of the Snows wishes to join with her neighbor, Uncle Sam, in celebrating a century of peace between the two, peace merely meaning the absence of war. Our Lady has been meaner than pizen about fish bait and fur seals and Uncle Sam has been brutally selfish toward her in his tariff schedules. If that sort of peace is worth celebrating by all means let the jig be danced.

THE BOLT OF THE INDEPENDENTS.

The California Weekly has been unhappy for want of the right sort of man to be voted for mayor of San Francisco, a man who, as a running mate with Mr. Francis J. Heney, could challenge the confidence and the enthusiasm of the better element in the civic life of this city.

This paper has looked upon the candidacy of P. H. McCarthy as promising a restoration of the Schmitz sort of municipal government, the sport of schemers and promoters greedy for franchises and for inside opportunities to mulct the public. Whether or not these fears are warranted it looks upon the McCarthy movement as malign in that it proposes the government of the whole by a class, the one tendency, next to plutocracy, most dangerous to a democracy. The election of McCarthy would prove a disaster.

This paper has looked upon the candidacy of Mr. Crocker as proceeding from the most objectionable non-class element in our civic life. We do not believe that the instigators of his candidacy had any other purpose in view than to retain control of the organization of the Republican party in this city and to divide the vote that would naturally be held out to all that McCarthy and his class-government idea might stand for.

As to Doctor Leland and the Democratic ticket The California Weekly found that less objectionable than the other two candidates only in that it promised to be money-honest, a low political ideal for any moral movement, but better than either of the other candidates could convincingly promise, their origin and animus being considered. We felt from the first, and still feel, that the moral forces in this community stand convicted of political inefficiency in that a fourth candidate was not found to take the field against an immoral constituency, for once divided into three parts.

Conditions have somewhat changed. The moral forces of this community have focused upon the candidacy of Doctor Leland and the Democratic ticket and compelled the candidate, and the men responsible for his candidacy, to rise above themselves and respond to the demands of the hour. Pressure of public sentiment has forced Democratic control to accept its own platform in good faith. It has now given such pledges to moral and civic righteousness as it dare not forfeit on pain of forfeiting its life. Gavin McNab will be as good as he dare be and hold power and he is now in a position where he has got to be good or be damned. This is equally true of his associates in the "regular" democracy. For practical purposes this is almost as good as original righteousness.

Independent Republicans felt that they must preserve their party regularity. They swallowed the Crocker ticket, notwithstanding the fact that it was openly known to have been placed in nomination by the votes of thousands of irregular Democrats and McCarthy men galvanized into Republicans for primary election purposes only. It is one of the rules of the political game that whoever is euchered must stay euchered, no matter how euchered, and the independent Republicans started out to abide by the rules.

But uneasy rests the head that uses a fraud for a pillow. Before the tremendous issue of equality before the law that of party regularity in a municipal election, where party has no right to exist anyway, becomes insignificant. Manhood was bound to assert itself if it had opportunity and opportunity came when the regular Democracy made common cause with the Heney movement for the establishment of justice in San Francisco. We could wish that Doctor Leland's shoes were filled by a Hiram Johnson, a Marshal Hale, a Rolph, a Bentley or a Rolla V. Watt, but what either of those would have stood for Doctor Leland now has got to stand for, however, he may personally feel about it, by virtue of his political predicament.

Therefore there is one thing for independent Republicans (by which we mean independent of a party machinery usurped through fraud) to do and that is to vote for Leland for mayor. Whoever loves equality before the law more than party regularity, warfare for honor more than peace without it, will vote for Leland for mayor and for Heney for district attorney, let the ultimate consequences be what they may.

A QUESTION OF DIAGNOSIS.

All thoughtful persons are concerned for the establishment of justice in this country. Whoever is not so concerned is not patriotic. From President to hotel porter there are few who are not demanding to know where the trouble is.

No one will question that justice is more speedily, cheaply, certainly established in Great Britain than in the United States. That much is conclusive.

This paper hastened to the conclusion that England's better criminal procedures might account for the difference. Mr. Warren Olney, Sr., a man of many years' experience in litigation of the highest types, says, "no," the procedures in England and America are much the same, certainly not differing enough to account for the difference in the quality or expedition of justice administered.

Mr. Olney locates the difficulty mainly in the intellectual deterioration of the American bench and moral degradation of the bar of America. It is to be hoped that these ailments are functional and not organic. If they are they may be remedied by a mental and moral uplift and surgery need not be called in to cut out the difficulty.

It is to be hoped, too, that these deteriorations and degradations of mental and moral fibre are not inevitable under a democratic form of government, for, if they are, then that form of government will have to give place to something better. Justice is the universal human quest and if it is not to be found in a democracy then a democracy will not satisfy the aspirations of men.

In Great Britain judges are paid great salaries and accorded great honors and benches are filled with great men. In our country judges are paid grudging stipends, are accorded small honor and our benches are filled with relatively small men, many of them pothouse politicians. This difference alone may be sufficient to account for the difference between English and American justice. Who among our judges did not better his financial condition by going upon the bench? And what one of them could step down from the bench and go into the practice of a profession that would pay him as well?

In last week's California Weekly Mr. Olney pointed out that, in England and in continental Europe, the bar is in control of the bar, is what we would call a close corporation or guild; that it is hard to break into and easy to be kicked out of for conduct unprofessional or even ungentlemanly. Admission to the bar in those countries is a certificate of character, an assurance of gentility, a bond for faithfulness, integrity and candor. With us many villains seek admission to the bar that they may practice rascality with greater safety, that they may levy blackmail in the guise of attorney fees and be retained to do lobbying or, as member of congress or legislature, to enact laws for the advantage of special interests. In our country the bar is easy to enter and hard to be kicked out of. This difference alone may be sufficient to account for the difference between English and American administration of justice.

Every medical practitioner knows that half his battle lies in being able to diagnose to diagnose and certainly to locate the malady that afflicts his patient. His next concern is to determine whether the disease be organic or functional, whether it be attended with lesion of the tissue or only by a deranged operation of the organs involved. If our good Doctor Olney has diagnosed the case aright then the malady that afflicts the blind goddess in this land is functional and remediable. A deteriorated bench may be toned up and a degraded bar can be regenerated. And it can all be done by a species of mind cure and is not much dependent upon legislation. Whatever an enlightened public conscience will have cannot long be kept from the public.

It is worth while to reflect upon where and how the malady of maladministration that afflicts our American judicial system, and made it a disgrace to our civilization, was contracted. A little investigation will show that the deterioration of our bench and the degradation of our bar have been coincident with the assumption of the functions of government on the part of an alliance of predatory corporations under the guidance of men of big business. Before the advent of Big Business the bench was honored and the bar cherished wholesome ideals, but when corporate bureaus put judicial positions on the political bargain counter they emptied the bench of honor as completely as if they had turned it upside down. And when great corporations employed the smartest attorneys to defeat justice instead of to uphold it they threw the ideals of the profession into the ash barrel. The reform of our judicial system must begin with the emancipation of our political life from corporate control.

GO AFTER ORIENTAL TRADE.

It is one hundred and forty years since Captain Portola discovered San Francisco bay and, judging from the languid interest which those who followed him have taken in what lies beyond, it bids fair to be another hundred and forty years before it is discovered that, next to the bay, hundreds of millions of people who make things that we want and want things that we make.

The Pacific Coast states are 2,000 miles, over mountain and desert, from the threshold of their market and all that they fetch or carry is trundled thence on wheels with great friction, at high cost, whereas, on the western boundaries of all these states throbs a world's highway, where whole trainloads may be carried in a single bottom and at a cost per ton per mile with which no railroad that ever was can hope to compete where time is not the essence of the contract.

One out of a considerable group of great men that the pioneering experiences of California produced still survives. If Gaspar de Portola had lived to be as old as this man now is they might have touched hands across the fourteen decades that have intervened between the discovery of the bay of San Francisco and the showery celebration of the event. Out of the abundance of this man's wisdom, his financial genius, his love for the state that gave him his start, he sends this message to the men of commerce and industry, finance and enterprise, "Go after Oriental trade."

But, with all deference to Mr. Darius Ogden Mills, how are the merchants of San Francisco to go after Oriental trade when they have nothing in which to fetch and carry it and no flag to protect them? If foreign owned, manned, controlled ships carry the trade we shall get only so much of it as the proprietary nations do not care for, and it is not the refuse Oriental trade that will make the Pacific Coast states populous and prosperous. It will take the cream of the trade to do that.

So we come back to the question of the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine without which little is to be hoped for in the nature of commercial development on the world's highway. Little interest has been taken in this subject even here in San Francisco, a city whose future depends upon it. Hardly one San Francisco business man in ten has clearly defined convictions as to whether free ships, ship subsidy or differential tariffs, one or all three, must be had to restore the American flag to the high seas. How, then, can they hope to convince the rest of the nation of this great national need?

We have been told that the discussion of this subject of a restored American merchant marine makes dry reading and that The California Weekly is hurting itself by giving space to it. Are commercial men little concerned for trade? How comes it, then, that they are so commonly accused of putting the dollar above all other concerns? There is need for a discussion of the issue whether there be profit in its discussion or not. Mr. George W. Dickie is doing a splendid and needful work in a great cause and The California Weekly is more than glad to be an instrument through which a part of that work is being done. In this issue he shows, in part, what other nations do to stimulate their deep sea carrying trade. The presumption is that our nation may have to do as other nations do, but if discussion can develop a better way, well and good. The first consideration must be the evolving of a consistent, practical, convincing policy upon which to go to the country. This cannot be done without discussion.

However they may divide on other issues the Atlantic, the Pacific and the Gulf coast states should be at one on the issue of a rehabilitated American merchant marine. The Mississippi valley states will be the battle ground, but they can be convinced if a convincing policy be submitted to them. Therefore, first let there be evolved a convincing national policy toward merchant marine whose ships shall be owned by Americans and manned by Americans and, if the thing be possible, built by Americans. In this California may take the initiative if it will. It ought to.

Our national fault has been, and is, that, under the protection of tariff walls, further fortified by combinations in restraint of production and trade within those walls, it has been more profitable to practice extortion upon our own people than to develop trade with peoples across the seas. The Mississippi valley is in revolt against this policy and that should help toward a freer and a fairer trade with the rest of the world, to be carried on in good part, at least, in American ships, manned by American seamen and under the protection of the American flag.

McCarthy as Man and Candidate.

Agreeable to the challenge of the San Francisco Star, we have, elsewhere in this paper, set out more fully than our editorial space would permit, some of the reasons why H. H. McCarthy is an unfit man to be elected mayor of San Francisco. Out of his own mouth has McCarthy condemned himself. We might have gone farther and proven more, but what we have there set forth should suffice for any person not indifferent to the welfare of his city.

It is not needful in order to prove a candidate unfit for an office to prove also that he is unfit to remain outside of prison walls and, in politics, it is not possible always to base conclusions upon evidence as demonstrable as the scientific method demands. The judgment frequently has to be made up from associations, indications, the company a man keeps, the forces that are behind him and the reasonable probabilities in his case. Politics is not an exact science.

Viewing the candidacy of P. H. McCarthy thus freely we find that every untoward interest in the city life is for him, the tenderloin, the gambling fraternity and the baser sort of liquor interests.

From the very outset it was bruited about, and commonly believed to be true, that the associated villainies, bent on crushing the graft prosecution and restoring a regime similar to that of Ruef and Schmitz, would throw the weight of their influence to P. H. McCarthy and his misnamed Union Labor party ticket. We have seen no reason to doubt the sagacity of that surmise.

As further evidence of this purpose it should be noted that, of the eighteen candidates for supervisory position on the alleged Union Labor party ticket, not above four are worthy of serious consideration by any honest voter. All the rest should be rejected as palpably unworthy of the trust which it is proposed to repose in them.

To clinch the issue it is found that such sterling champions and leaders of organized labor as Walter Macarthur, John W. Sweeney and Andrew Furuseth are in open hostility to McCarthy and his purposes. They are standing for Leland and Francis J. Heney, while McCarthy has openly espoused the candidacy of Fickert, notoriously the candidate of those opposed to any effective prosecution of grafters of high degree.

Why seek further?

For Supervisors.

Little can be done for good government without a good board of supervisors, a board made up of able men as well as honest. The California Weekly's ticket was not made up without making investigations independent of the Good Government League or any other organization, and we have much confidence in the list presented elsewhere in this paper. It may safely be voted for without a scratch. Our ideal of government is that the representatives of all the people, as people and not as classes, shall sit together around the council table as equals, bankers opposite mechanics and professional men elbow to elbow with merchants and men engaged in industrial pursuits. There should no more be a Union Labor party than there should be a clerical party or Citizens' Alliance party and, in municipal affairs, there is no need for national party organizations to interfere. In our supervisory ticket not one man is commended because he is a Republican, or a Democrat, and not one was rejected because he was nominated by the Union Labor party, although we look upon that party as without justification for existing. In each case it has been the manhood of the man that has counted for giving him a place in our ticket.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

John Churchill, first Duke of Marlborough, made a striking figure in the history of England and on the adjacent continent. He possessed great powers, was ambitious, diplomatic, cunning, and he got on; but the most cunning thing he ever did was to adopt the settled policy of trying always to please, and to be personally courteous, obliging, friendly.

No man can hope to get on in politics upon any other policy. The senior Senator from California maintains relations of amity and comity with the other members of the California delegation at Washington, notwithstanding his elusive characteristics, by making it his study to require some disappointment he has inflicted by seizing the first opportunity to confer some signal and unlooked-for favor, even at the cost of going farther out of his way to do it than he went to "throw down" his victim in the first instance.

But Marlborough did not love his enemies. He hated them, and smilingly sent as many of them as possible to the Tower of London. He sought to please because it paid. Once, when he was fighting France with a coalition of Germanic peoples, he held unwilling Prussia to the very brunt of battle through the subtle power of his own irresistible address, and when William of Orange finally sent him to the Tower because caught holding traitorous communications with fugitive James II, the urbanity of the man saved himself from decapitation.

The writer of this once knew a merchant who prided himself on his ability to sell a customer something that he did not want instead of upon his ability to lead the thing that his customer did want, but he sent every customer away with a sense of dissatisfaction, if not of injury, and his own financial success was never marked. He had not made the power to please the corner stone of his mercantile edifice.

Personal advantage is a low plane upon which to base so important a life policy as a settled intent to please, but if it were upon a higher shelf it would be out of the reach of many. There are many who have ever upon their lips the query, "Will it pay?"

Trying to please, returning good for evil, even with hate instead of love in the heart, pays better interest on the investment than any other financial operation that even a Rockefeller has ventured. It will even pay better than a good laying hen, a better investment in proportion to its value than a diamond mine. For the investment is nothing but a little care, a little self-control and a fixed determination to please maintained until the habit is formed, and the habit can be formed in less time than one can learn to smoke tobacco or use profanity with a California celerity and elat.

But the best way to learn to please is to wish from the heart to please, to feel good toward people, to wish them well, to be glad to be able to lend a hand, to love one's neighbor as oneself; that is, to wish him all the good that we ourselves enjoy, to forget self in the service of others, to lose our own lives that we may find them grown so large in the sympathy of interests, to hope that not even the visible universe can hold us within bounds and we must have recourse to telescopes a yard across their refractors, that our benevolent interests may have new worlds to conquer.

It pays to please, to give pleasure instead of pain, to rule the right way of the fair instead of the wrong. It pays better to love than to hate, to forgive than to cherish malice, to do good than evil. Even if one have no regard other than for the main chance for himself alone, with a spirit as selfish as that of Satan, there is no other investment that any person will ever make that will yield so great a profit on so small an expenditure as to please, just plain please.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

No Room for American Pride.

Before we, as Americans, shrug our shoulders in contempt for the parsimony Italians display toward their teachers, it will be well for us to examine our own record. The federal bureau of education in its latest report has given the average wages, throughout the United States, which we pay to our teachers, both masculine and feminine. We pay men $56.10 a month; to the women we pay $43.10. But the average number of months in a year for which they are paid is nine, so that the monthly average of the men throughout the year is but $42.08, while that of the women is $32.33. Not a pretty record. The average common laborer in this country receives a little more pay, if he has his health and a job, than the average teacher. As of the West pay much better than the average salaries, and the odium of stinginess is less on us than on the East and South, but all of us are American citizens and must bear some share of the reproach of the situation.

Repaying St. Peter's in Rome.

The work of repaving the church of St. Peter's, in Rome, has just been begun. The simple statement in itself conveys no idea of the immensity of this undertaking. The surface to be repaved includes only that which has been most trodden by the feet of the multitudes of many generations, and covers scarcely more than one-half of the entire flooring of the gigantic edifice, but it amounts to 14,350 square yards, or, say, one average city block and half of another. So far as is possible, precisely the same varieties of stone are to be used in the new pavement as in the old, and the former design is to be followed exactly. It is estimated that it will take ten years to complete the work, and the cost will be $400,000. Some of the original stones came from ancient Roman temples, and these can not well be replaced, but Carrara marble will be substituted for them.

The Czar Pinches the Finns.

The Czar of all the Russias has been "getting even" with the Finlanders in a manner which does not do much credit to him. Not long ago he asked the Finns to pay $8,000,000 annually toward the maintenance of the Russian imperial defenses. The Finland legislature considered the matter carefully, and then replied that the Finnish people were poor and could not afford to pay that amount into the imperial treasury. So the matter rested—the consent of the legislature being necessary under the constitution—until the legislature passed a bill appropriating $150,000 annually for the support of the schools. As the Czar is Grand Duke of Finland, the bill, in order to be effective, requires his ratification, and he has refused to give it on the ground that if Finland cannot afford to pay $8,000,000 for Russian defenses it cannot afford to pay $150,000 for Finnish education. There has been a great slump in Czars since Peter the Great.

When Uncle Sam Is Generous.

The main purpose of the Forest Service, of course, is the conservation of the country's timber, but, in the course of this necessary service, it finds time, as Uncle Sam's agent, for some deeds of generosity. Such a deed is recorded in a statement just compiled by District Forester F. E. Olmsted, which shows that last year in the district which is composed of California and a very little of Nevada, timber amounting to 6,885,287 board feet, and estimated to be worth $14,262.20, was given away for domestic use by the people. The service grants free timber to the value of twenty dollars (estimated at a valuation of a little more than two dollars per thousand feet while standing) to people for domestic use, and the same amount to school and road districts. It is, however, not given away for any commercial purpose. A permit must be obtained from the nearest forest ranger.

Mortality in the Italian Earthquake.

Nearly ten months after the great Italian earthquake the Italian statistical bureau has published an estimate of the mortality due to it which serves to give a clear conception of the horror of the event. According to this estimate the total number of people killed in the provinces of Messina, in Sicily, and Reggio and Catanzaro, in Calabria, was 76,563. Of this total, about 60,000, or nearly one-half the population of Messina, were killed in that city. The bureau does not attempt to make an estimate of the number of persons injured, but sets it approximately at 150,000, making a total of more than 225,000 either killed or injured. No close estimate of damage to property was made, but, in all, 231 cities, towns and villages were injured. It is a curious fact that the excess of births over deaths in Italy in 1908 was 76,369, which is very close to an offset to the loss of life by the earthquake. As an aftermath of the disaster which is of interest in this country, it may be noted that since the earthquake 12,000 persons have emigrated to America from Messina and 10,000 from Calabria.

Italian Teachers to Strike.

Teachers in the elementary schools of Italy recently held a congress in Venice, and one of its outcomes is likely to be a general strike for higher salaries among the members of the profession in Italy. Nor can anybody justly blame them if they do proceed to this extreme, for the pay of these elementary teachers is of such starvation measure that they well might ask, in a paraphrase of the words of him of old: Is thy servant a dog, that he should accept such compensation for his services? The salaries to which they object vary from a minimum of $150 to a maximum of $204 a year, a monthly average running from $12.50 to $22, and on these salaries they must pay an income tax. Under these circumstances it is not surprising to learn that there now are 31,200 schools in Italy for which it has been found impossible to find teachers. The wonder rather would seem to be that any of the schools are supplied. It is to the credit of the Italian labor unions that they are understood to be ready to assist the teachers in such a strike.

Saving the Children's Pennies.

The wisdom in the old saying, "Take care of the pence, for the pounds will take care of themselves," has been demonstrated in Long Island City. There the Long Island City Savings bank is custodian of the fund of the pence the children in the public schools have saved. Recently the bank issued a report which showed that the children had saved $30,385.55. This means, to state the case in a more striking way, that the children had saved $3,038,555 pennies, a pretty good showing for a community which is as poor as almost any in Greater New York. One boy, whose parents are poor, had determined to take a college course, and he already has saved enough—in pennies, mark you—to pay the expenses of the first two years of such a course, and still is saving. He sells papers and garners his pennies in whatever way he can. Just as an indication that the children are not being taught penuriousness with the saving habit, it may be mentioned that $5,082.08 was drawn from the fund for holiday purposes last summer.

Ancient Bibles Discovered.

In Totnes parish church, Somersetshire, England, a copy of the first edition of the authorized version of the Bible, which was published in 1611, recently was discovered. It was in bad condition, but has been restored. In the same church, and at the same time, a copy of the "Vinegar" Bible also was found.

Next Is the Aeroautomobile.

Time was when the name of Santos-Dumont was on everybody's lips, as the best-known exponent of the art of aviation. He was succeeded in popular consideration by the Wrights, Curtis, Latham, Berliot and others, and it was but incidentally that we heard of the Brazilian who first set us to wondering if we yet would ride in an airship. But in the meantime Santos-Dumont has not been asleep, and it now is reported that he has invented a machine which is a sort of happy combination of the automobile and the aeroplane. In using it, the occupant runs it along a highway, as he would run an automobile, until he comes, for instance, to a piece of rough road on which it would be unpleasant to travel; then he applies the aeroplane adjustment, and flies until he reaches another bit of smooth road, on which he judges that automobilism would be preferable, then he descends and wheels until he again strikes bad road. The convenience of such a machine in evading ardent constables who are lying in wait for too speedy automobilists will at once be appreciated by joy-riders, if none others. Such is the invention that Santos-Dumont is said to have perfected. All that now is needed is a contrivance for safely sailing the machine on water, and man may congratulate himself that his locomotion has attained its perfection.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

"Culture and Anarchy."

This book is the championing of one idea: "It is better to know what one ought to do than busily to be doing things that one merely thinks ought to be done." It seems a reasonable enough idea, but, as the author points out, it divides most of humanity, past and present, into ancient Greek, who really preferred to know, and into pretty much everybody else, who is desperately bent upon being strenuous, even if he has not passed to be very sure that he knows what all his bustle is about. Matthew Arnold admits that it is much pleasanter to be busily flying about making a loud noise and changing things around to suit our ideas of the way they should be, than it is to sit up in a stuffy room and give ourselves a headache thinking out the question whether our ideas are sound; but he naively suggests, that if we really want to make things better instead of wanting to make a noise, we may discover that twice as much thinking will save more than half of the bustle—in other words, if once you settle a thing right you will never have to settle it again.

Whether he is right or wrong, his book pleases the bookish, mightily, for its graceful English style, its easy yet piercing satire, and its implication that perhaps the bookish are a worthier part of the population than they are usually allowed to be by their more strenuous and noisy neighbors. Incidentally, it is a powerful stimulant to the desire for deeper learning, that has started many brilliant minds anew upon the road to knowledge.

THE COUNTRY EDITOR.

Not long ago the late Governor Johnson of Minnesota had an article in the Youth's Companion on the country editor, and in it appeared the following passage:

"It has often been said that Minnesota is governed by the country editor. This may not be strictly true, but certainly the 'fourth estate' is more numerously represented there in public place than in any other commonwealth. The governor, his private secretary and executive clerk are country newspaper men; so are the labor commissioner, the executive agent of the game and fish commission, the state oil inspector, the state librarian, the secretary and assistant secretary of state, the assistant labor commissioner, the state fire warden, the assistant fire marshal, the deputy public examiner, the secretary of the dairy and food commission, the assistant clerk of the supreme court, and the secretary of the board of control."

SINGERS' UPS AND DOWNS.

The New York Sun says that importunate relatives and injudicious speculation are the two great foes of operatic singers who try to save part of their earnings. Edouard de Reszke and Emilio di Marchi are examples of extravagant financial faith, and it is rumored that Madame Melba has joined their class, though she is more fortunate in having a rich father to fall back on.

Jean de Reszke and Victor Marnet have recouped the losses of good fortune and lost voices by becoming teachers of voice culture. Emma Calvé bought a large annuity while she had the money, and lives well. Sembrich, Eames, Homer, Schumann-Heink, Dippel, Nordica and Lehmann have all been prudent, and are rich. The richest of all singers is Adeline Patti, but she had the wise business counsel of Alfred Rothchild, who invested her money for her.

J. M. Barrie has presented Ethel Barrymore with a new one-act play and all the rights thereunder. Through Miss Barrymore this is Mr. Barrie's tribute to the actors' fund of America, for whose benefit he hopes that Miss Barrymore will some day act the playlet.

AN EXILE'S WISH.

By Edwin Chase.

(For The California Weekly.)
So long I wish, the wish is almost hope,
That I, a hunter from the hill turned home,
May find thee waiting on the Southern slope,
As star for star high in the evening dome.
Outheld thine arms, fair portals to thy breast,
Thy fond eyes guiding to that place of rest—
The while I hear thy sweet voice crooning
this:
Day time's for striving. Night time is for bliss.

"SYMMES' HOLE."

It matters not whether Dr. Cook or Commander Peary discovered the north pole and nailed the American flag to it, or both got it, the feat effectually demonstrates that the theory of concentric spheres was all an illusion, and "Symmes' Hole" a myth.

In the early part of the nineteenth century John Cleves Symmes, the nephew of a man of the same name who had made one of the first colonizations on the wild Ohio frontier, announced his "Theory of Concentric Spheres, demonstrating that the earth is hollow, habitable within and without at the poles." He lectured extensively throughout Ohio, Kentucky and the Eastern states, and made many converts. In 1822 Capt. Symmes petitioned congress, setting forth his belief in the existence of a habitable and accessible concave of this globe; his desire to embark on a voyage of discovery to one or the other of the polar regions; his belief in the great profit and honor the country would derive from such a discovery, and asking that congress fit out two vessels of 250 to 300 tons burthen, and grant such other aid as the government might deem necessary to promote the object. The request was "laid on the table." In the years 1823 and 1824 he sent similar petitions, which were "indefinitely postponed." Subsequently, through the influence and co-operation of Messrs. Rush and Southland, members of John Quincy Adams' cabinet, with the large fund acquired through his lectures, Mr. Symmes fitted out a national ship to explore the ocean towards the south pole, to test the truth of his theory; but before he could set sail the hard-headed Andrew Jackson came to the presidency, and stopped the project.

Californian Poets' Corner

TO A WAVE.

By Col. E. D. Baker.

Dost thou seek a star with thy swelling crest,
O wave that leavest thy mother's breast?
Dost thou leap from the prisoned depths below
To roam of yore calm and constant flow?
Or art thou seeking some distant land
To die in murmurs upon the strand?

Hast thou tales to tell of the pearl-lit deep,
Where the wave-wheeled mariners rook in sleep?

Canst thou speak of navies that sunk in pride
Ere the roll of their thunder in echo died?
What trophies, what banners are floating free
In the shadowy depths of that silent sea?

It were vain to ask, as thou rollest afar,
Of banner, or mariner, ship or star;
It were vain to seek in thy stormy face
Some tale of the sorrowful past to trace.
Thou art swelling high, thou art flashing
Free—

How vain are questions we ask of thee!

I, too, am a wave on a stormy sea;
I, too, am a wanderer driven like thee;
I, too, am seeking a distant land,
To be lost and forgot ere I reach the strand.
For the land I seek is a waveless shore,
And they who once reach it shall wander no more.

C. W. STODDARD BURNED POEMS.

Miss Ina Coolbrith, literary executor, and A. M. Robertson, publisher, have discovered that the late Charles Warren Stoddard, author of "South Sea Idyls," destroyed on his deathbed a number of unpublished poems written a short time before his death.

Robertson expected to publish the collected poems of Stoddard, who died recently in Monterey, but when he sent for the manuscripts none could be found. Then the poet's housekeeper was questioned, and she said that on the day before he died Stoddard had her make a fire in the fireplace and then he cast into it many manuscripts. Among these were unpublished poems and the originals of many which were printed.

Stoddard had read several poems to Miss Coolbrith and others during his last illness, but these were evidently destroyed by him.

FRENCH AUTHORS' REWARDS.

While the serial story is at anything more popular than ever as a newspaper feature in France, Robert Sherard writes in "My Friends the French" that the remuneration of the writers of this kind of fiction is not as good as it used to be.

That is because the editors find they can get very good fiction from foreign publishers. The payment for the translation rights of a good English, Russian, Italian or German novel would not amount to the twentieth part of the fee which would be demanded by one of the popular masters of the feuilleton.

Formerly these fees were very large. According to the Bookman, Jules Mary used to receive 30,000 francs for first serial use of one of his thrillers. That would represent about half of what the manuscript would produce, but after the tale had appeared in the paper the publishers who issue tales in ten centime parts would pay him another 25,000 francs for this use.

D'Ennery, the author of "The Two Orphans," received a franc and a half a line for his novels. "An Angel's Remorse" brought him 70,000 francs. But free trade in fiction, says Mr. Sherard, has injured the home manufacturers. The French publishers can get good translations for low sums. Hachette whenever a large price is asked for an English novel produces a receipt signed by Charles Dickens. It is for a sum of twenty pounds and refers to a novel called "David Copperfield."

ACTING NOW BETTER.

It is refreshing to hear one old-time player speak of present stage conditions without a wail of regret for "the good old days." Minna Gale, formerly leading woman with Edwin Booth, has the following optimistic idea of the modern theater, according to the Chicago Record-Herald:

"Coming back to the theater after a long absence I have been surprised at the improvement I have found there. It seems to me the artistic level has been greatly raised. I think it is true that some great figures have passed away, the general average is, to my mind, far higher. I believe that modern methods are responsible for this; I believe that they are far more desirable than the ancient ones. Formerly, except for our positions on the stage, we were left to our own devices. Now we have the 'producer'—a careful, helpful critic, who has studied the play, ponders over the characters, and is always ready with helpful suggestions or acute comment. The result is one no longer is compelled to feel one's way. From the first rehearsal one grasps what effects one can accomplish. In the old days rehearsing was like dressing in the dark; nowadays one has daylight—and a mirror. Then, too, barrenness of the stage has gone. Lights and scenery have so improved that the actor really feels in the surrounding scenery what the playwright has conceived. Consequently one no longer is required to call on the imagination to create what the script is or broaden the effects. The result is inevitable. The modern performance is far more natural than the old."

McCARTHY'S UNSATISFACTORY RECORD

THE WORDS AND ACTS FOR WHICH HE SHOULD BE OPPOSED.

The California Weekly has been asked by The Star and others to name the specific acts of P. H. McCarthy which, in its judgment, are sufficient grounds for opposing his candidacy for mayor of San Francisco. The Star says, "What have you against McCarthy, where is his record bad?" We have heard the same question in the streets in the form of the assertion, "Nobody has got anything on him."

The California Weekly proposes to let P. H. McCarthy's political record and his own words as issued over his own signature, or as quoted verbatim by a newspaper that was his ardent partisan at the time of their publication, convict him of acting against the public interest of San Francisco.

In the municipal campaign of 1903, Schmitz was the candidate of the Union Labor party for mayor. He was opposed by Henry J. Crocker, Republican. Schmitz's administration for the two years preceding had been, so far as the general public specifically knew, a fairly good one. The stench of corruption had begun to rise, but only to the nostrils of the most "inside" of "insiders." McCarthy, the "friend of labor," issued "An Open Letter from P. H. McCarthy, Mayor of San Francisco, to the Government and in behalf of Henry J. Crocker," to quote the full title of the large sheet that was distributed around town.

In the previous campaign, in 1901, when Schmitz first ran and before there was any suspicion of him anywhere, in Langdon's absence, preferred technical charges against Langdon, had Langdon suspended, had himself, Ruef, named as his successor, notified Henry that Henry was removed from office as deputy district attorney. Ruef notified Henry that he (Ruef) would take charge of the grand jury and would call, as first witness, Henry himself, to disclose the information upon which Henry proposed to base charges against Ruef. This performance dazzled a gawping world as the apotheosis of sublime effrontery.

Now, where do we find McCarthy, friend of labor, enemy of Schmitz and of graft? We shall see. Ruef proposed to test the success of his coup by appearing in Judge Graham's court on Friday afternoon, October 26, 1906, when the last grand juror was to be chosen, and demanding of Judge Graham recognition as district attorney of San Francisco, with authority to direct the examination of evidence upon which to base an indictment against himself. A movement was instantly set on foot, hurried into effect, to have a demonstration of decent citizens in Judge Graham's court room to counteract the effects upon the judge's jury of the Ruef supporters who, it was known, would mass there in Ruef's behalf.

This demonstration appealed to many people as savoring of mob intimidation, simply making two mobs in court instead of one. Representatives of this sentiment appeared at this meeting the following Friday afternoon and delivered temperate addresses, urging that this demonstration was wrong in principle—urged this and nothing else.

Now, we shall see where P. H. McCarthy stood. He addressed this meeting and, while doubtfully appearing to the subject, in reality he launched into a vicious attack upon the prosecution and the prosecutors of Ruef and Schmitz.

This address McCarthy made in Walton's hall, at Golden Gate avenue and Buchanan street, on Sunday afternoon, October 28, 1906. The following quotations from this address are taken verbatim from the Evening Post on Monday, October 29, 1906 (the following day), on the fourth page. The Post was then and later McCarthy's staunch supporter.

McCarthy said:

"Graft, graft, graft! It is the same as the cry of 'wolf, wolf, wolf!' I take this opportunity to say to you men that there is no greater grafter in this glorious land than that creature—grafting corporations who promise so much and does so little—Francis J. Heney!"

Further on in this address, McCarthy said: "Francis J. Heney says that he is honest and patriotic, and lays claim to being clever and public-spirited. I say that if it takes a clever or an honest fellow to shoot a man in the back—I say if it takes a clever or an honest fellow to get away with $105,000, sent here for the purpose of buying flour for poor people, then I am done—I want to be either a clever or an honest man!"

And again, McCarthy said, in this address: "I say to you now, why don't they arrest some one? Why don't Heney arrest some one? Why don't they give their evidence to the public, if evincence they have, and make short work of the scandal that is tarnishing the fair name of San Francisco in all parts of the world? It is not so difficult to understand; it might be shown by their own intended victims and by themselves are guilty of it. It may be that they are making a grandstand political play, as they did one year ago. I do not believe, and I here publicly proclaim that in my opinion Heney and his accomplices have no honest evidence of graft in their possession."

Further along in McCarthy's political career, when he was candidate for mayor in 1907, he gave voice to the following expression of opinion of the prosecution of the grafter— "What is now known to the derision and scorn of the world at large as the prosecution," (Evening Post, Monday, October 7, 1907, page 7. Verbatim interview with McCarthy. Same issue of paper devotes four full pages to an editorial advocacy of his candidacy.)

Just before the bond election of May 11, 1908, when the public was asked to vote $18,200,000 of rehabilitation bonds, P. H. McCarthy caused to be printed and circulated a handbill, signed by the Building Trades Council, which McCarthy controls, two paragraphs read, "Vote Against the Bonds! Working Men and Business Men, Go to the Polls and Rebuke the Bunko Steerers and Shylocks who are Trying to Hand You a Gold Brick," and ending with this paragraph of bathos and buncombe:

"Fine prosperity, indeed, for the banker, but increased poverty for the producer. Hence, if you have the best interest of the city at heart—if you love your home and your children—if you do not wish to mortgage this city and its working people for generations to an unscrupulous band of Shylocks and political money sharks, then go to the polls next Monday and vote down the entire bond issue."

The bonds, that P. H. McCarthy demanded should be voted down, were the bonds for schools, hospitals, hall of justice, sewers, garbage system and system of fire protection that have provided the municipal rehabilitation work that has been done in San Francisco since the fire. These bonds carried by a vote of 15 to 1, notwithstanding McCarthy's implacable hostility to them.

P. H. McCarthy has made a great deal of his slogan of "A business administration," which he promises San Francisco, and of a well-regulated government. "A well-regulated government cannot come from a man possessed of any other than a well-regulated mind. P. H. McCarthy, in a verbatim interview reported on page 5 of the Evening Post of October 7, 1907, when he was running for mayor, gave an example of the balance and judgment and regulated processes of his mind in the following comparison which he drew between San Francisco as it would be if he were elected mayor and San Francisco as it would be if Taylor were elected mayor:

"... the plain citizen gazes upon two pictures and his conclusion is speedily reached. He first reflects upon more than five years of astounding and unparalleled prosperity, in which period his own services have been rewarded with the highest of wages; when commodities have sold at a good figure—when money was plentiful and when peace reigned. Then he turns to that other picture—the picture of the aristocracy in the saddle, with the police department swinging batons over the bleeding heads of working men and working women, and with the hatred raging fiercely. He sees strikes and suffering, commercial stagnation, general depression and a widespread lack of confidence. He sees happiness and plenty on the one hand—woe upon the other."

"To which vision will this man turn? Since he is a human being, he will turn to the image of peace and prosperity, of advancement, good feeling and contentment. He will turn toward the wall that other picture of the wage-slasher, the slave-driver in the saddle with the blood of the American toiler dripping from the lash of his backside."

This is worse than mere buncombe and pyrotechnic bombast (which it is); it is the display of a mind as disordered and irrational and ill-regulated as one could imagine short of complete hypocrisy or sheer madness. A man who could say such things, even in the heat of a campaign, is not fit to be the executive head of the business of a great city, and the pathetic infelicity of his prophecy is witnessed by two years of the profoundest "industrial peace," of which he prates so much, that San Francisco has ever seen.

To conclude:

P. H. McCarthy was against Schmitz when Schmitz was not known to be corrupt.

P. H. McCarthy espoused the cause of and fought his prosecution, when it was known to the whole world as a corrupt, debauched, and treacherous public servant.

P. H. McCarthy has persistently opposed the graft prosecution in San Francisco.

P. H. McCarthy fought the vital issue of municipal bonds.

The space allotted this article is too brief to permit the exposition of the fact that McCarthy was against a municipal water-supply until about four months ago, that McCarthy is carrying the campaign of independence element that he denounced in the campaign of 1905, that McCarthy's labor record has earned the enmity of every union laborer in San Francisco who values his craft above political advancement led by a political adventurer. Yet these are facts and could be proved if time and space permitted.

The Star declares that P. H. McCarthy has been before the public for fifteen years and, in substance, that "nobody has anything on him." His record, given above, mainly out of his own mouth, proves to the contrary.

But a man who has been before the public for fifteen years has small claim to honor or office if such claim be merely upon the negative proposition of "nothing on him." He should have a positive record to recommend. What of that part of P. H. McCarthy's record? What great public good has P. H. McCarthy, during the last fifteen years, openly and courageously espoused and stayed with until it was realized? The Star's answer to that query will be waited for with interest.

As a curtain raiser to her performance of "The Chaperone" this season Miss Maxine Elliott will present a little play called "Soyona." Miss Elliott has accepted "Deborah of Tods," by Mrs. Henry De La Pasture, for production about the first of the year.

Miss Florence Roberts will appear shortly in a drama by Kate Jordan Vermilye, "Mrs. Dakan" is the name of which. Thurlow Bergen will be Miss Roberts' leading man.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Ere the Gringo Came.

I saw it all, as in a dream, today on the crowded street, Where the banners, waved their yellow and red a vision from old to greet,
Where Portola gray rode proudly on, his cavaliers by his side,
Each tricked in such garb of the ancient days as a modern art supplied.
'Twas the phantom march,
Or I deemed it so,
Of the people's arch
In the long ago;
And I knew, in my dream, it was not the same
As it was in the days ere the gringo came.

Oh, league on league, like a sea of gold, our fair California lay,
'Neath the shine of suns or the gleam of stars,
in that dreamy elden day.
And the padres taught, 'mid the vine-clad fields, in the missions now grown old,
To their red disciples the story sweet that Bethlehem first heard told.
Ah, the peaceful days
On the poppyed slope
As they sung the praise
Of the one dear God,
Teacher and pupil, in one great Name
They served and loved ere the gringo came.

'Twas a world asleep, but a world of peace.
Then "Gold" was the cry that ran
O'er our bastioned hills and the wind-swept plains, to the uttermost haunts of man,
And westward, westward, westward still, o'er wastes that were yet untrod,
The maddened tide of humanity ran, with gold as its one red god.
And our high walls rise,
And our engines beat,
While laughter and sighs
Forever meet.
And I sometimes lone, in the world's sad game,
For the peace of the days ere the gringo came.

A Talk With Elnathan.

You are just starting out in the world, my boy, and you calculate that you will fly high. When it comes to high flying, you are pretty well assured that there is nothing in the aviation line that will be able to get where it can cast a shadow upon you. Moreover, you have examined the hand you hold in the great game of life, and are pleased to notice that it includes several fine trumps. Trump No. 1, health. Good! Trump No. 2, ability. Excellent! No. 3, ambition. Fine! No. 4, honesty (enough for business purposes). Better take another look at that last trump, my boy. I am afraid it came out of the wrong deck. Yes, on the whole, it is a good hand, and it ought to win; probably it will win, but—I will tell you what that "but" means, Elnathan. It means that the world has many—oh, very many—just such hands as you hold. On almost any corner, or hanging to almost any strap in a car, you may find men who have health, ability, ambition and honesty. They get along well enough, but they don't fly very high. They started out with the intention of outlying everything on the field, but soon they learned that there is considerable competition there, and that they must be remarkable men who soar farthest toward the zenith. To keep right on mixing my metaphor, son, they find that there are in the pack several larger trumps than those they hold. They observe, too, that it requires considerable patient application to maintain even a fair mediocrity.
I do not wish to discourage you, my boy; I am merely wishing to remark that on the beach of time there are several fine pebbles, and it is possible that you are not the largest and brightest of them all. What then? Why, then, accepting such size as the Almighty gave you, it but remains for you to see to it that none of the brighter "silver lining" of course you will do that? Yes?

The Opinions of Rufus.

It's the hen's cackling my talkative friend, that notifies them that's interested that the time has come to rob her of one more egg.
Lots of times I haven't realized that a man wasn't real bright till after I've heered him talk awhile.
The aeroplane's some like our good intentions—looks mighty pretty way up high, but it started from the earth, an' it's dead certain to git back there again.
Lots of us in this town say, "Dern the Southern Pacific machine!" in private talk when we wouldn't say it in print fer considerable. Course we ain't cowards, Eph'rim, but we're muddin' keurful.

The more I watch the kind of fellers that smoke cigarettes the more I'm convinced that the habit ain't es likely to injure brains es some folks claims.

The original condition of the earth, according to scripcher, makes me think of some fashionable women I've seen. It was "without form an' void," you know.

I knew a man that claimed he was sanctified. He had two farms, an' his family lived on the other one.

Dynamite bombs an' hold-ups are considerable alike. If they ain't handled with care they're likely to blow up the wrong person. Still, es Mr. Calhoun says, if you must make a choice, take the bomb.
I'll bet Mr. Portola would be surprised if he could git away from his other engagements an' be in San Francisco this week. Like 'es not he never realized what an important thing he did.

Just by way of a word fer the automobilists, hev you noticed that they ain't parshal? They're es likely to kill themselves es anybody else.

The Same Old Thing.

It is breakfast in the morning, and it's dinner toward night,
And it's lunch some time between them, if you've time to take a bite;
It is seize your pen or mattock for your little daily thing,
And, no matter what you're doing, it's the same old thing.

It's eat to keep the strength to work; it's work for food to eat.
First work to eat, then eat to work; the circle is complete.

It's toil for clothes to clothe for toil—oh, here's a merry swing.
Or haply it's a treadmill, of the same old thing.

We go to bed, get up again, then go to bed once more,
And it's button and unbutton, till the fact we must deplore.

Oh, perhaps you like the circle, but I'm weary
Of the ceaseless repetition of the same old thing.

He Was Used to Roars.

"The tame lion got loose, and, after it was on the street, it roared terribly."
"Yes."
"Yes, everybody except Nupoppe was scared nearly to death by the roars."
"And wasn't he scared at all?"
"No. You know his baby is only seven months old."

Written in the Fog.

Somewhere the sun is shining;
Somewhere the day is fair;
Somewhere's the "silver lining"—
But, then, I am not there.

Mr. Calhoun Again Donates.

Patrick Calhoun again has donated, this time the sum of $5,000 to the Portola fund, and, as one of his papers indirectly suggests, the public should feel grateful to him.

It should. In the first place, such a donation undoubtedly was most acceptable, and the public, which shares in the Portola festivities, should justly recognize that Mr. Calhoun has helped to make them possible. It should hold up (unfortunate words, but unintentional) a high standard of appreciation of generosity. It should thus hold—unless, of course, the straps all are occupied.

In the second place, popular gratitude to Mr. Calhoun should be particularly acute because his donation this time did not take the same form it did the last time, for one of that kind is enough. Of course his donation at that time was much the larger of the two, but, then, just consider how many people it had to be divided among. You see, there was Abe Ruef and his Schmitz and his eighteen supervisors, and it would be a paltry soul that would consider $200,000 too much to be divided among so many.

Mr. Calhoun's former donation was divided about as follows: Ordinary supervisors, $5,000 apiece; one or two superior supervisors, useful as winged Mercuries—between $10,000 each; one Schmitz, perhaps, $40,000; one Ruef, $60,000. At the present time, one Portola festival, $5,000. From this list it becomes possible to prepare a table of comparative values, as recognized by Mr. Calhoun, the public benefactor, and here it is:

One ordinary supervisor equals one Portola festival.

One superior supervisor equals two Portola festivals.

One Schmitz equals eight Portola festivals.

One Ruef equals twelve Portola festivals.
And on top of this large and unavoidable expense Mr. Calhoun has donated to the Portola fund! We should be ashamed of ourselves if we are not grateful.

If Teddy Came to Town.

The most genial of our Presidents, William Howard Taft, has come and gone, but the memory of his smile yet lingers with us. We liked that smile, and, as it shone upon us, we realized why so many carried it had been a success on diplomatic missions. Diplomats are but men, after all, and how could they help responding to a smile which fairly beamed with good-fellowship and fraternal feeling? Of course, they could not.

Yes, it is a winning smile and it would seem that it should have evoked popular enthusiasm—but it did not. You know it did not, and so do I. It ought to have been a winner; as compared with our Teddy's graven-ness chasm of amusement it was as Hyperion to a satyr, and yet our people looked upon it and didn't enthuse. On the contrary, they seemed to say to themselves, "It's genial, but I wonder what virile, helpful strength there is behind it!" It wouldn't have been so with Teddy. He would have turned that double ivory row upon us, and we would have gone mad, with enthusiasm born of belief in him. We were very gentlemanly and modestly non-effervescent in our reception of President Taft and his smile, but—

How every hat would seek the sky.

If Teddy came to town!
How gongs would boom and banners fly.

If Teddy came to town!
And men and women, children, too,

Their canned emotions would unscrow,
And yell, "We all have faith in you."

If Teddy came to town.

We would not stand on form, my friend, you know,
If Teddy came to town!

We'd touch 'er off and let 'er go,

If Teddy came to town!

We'd rend the air to make it known,

Since faith in him is fully grown,

That Frisco's heart is all his own,

If Teddy came to town.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Great Tribulation For McLachlan James McLachlan is now serving his sixth term in congress and he feels sort of wotted in Washington and would like to remain there. As, in his younger days, he taught school "just one term more" several times, it is now his duty to serve in congress one term more if not more terms more, but the outlook is not all that he could wish it to be. In an evil moment (for his standing with the political powers that be), he introduced in the lower house, and even went to the bat with a bill providing for the establishment of a line of government steamships between Pacific Coast ports and Panama, in order that the unlawful combination between trans-continental railroad and steamship lines might be broken up. The Southern Pacific's political bureau likes a joke as well as anyone, provided that the joke is on somebody else, and that one wasn't. That bureau has plainly intimated to McLachlan that he must not fool with matches if he wants its support, as, of course, he does. Besides, McLachlan has long enjoyed the implacable hatred of the Los Angeles Times. With the friendship of the Southern Pacific's political machine, and the hatred of the Times, he has made shift to become the senior member of the California delegation in the lower house of Washington, but the tables have turned. Not that he has become the victim of the hatred of the Southern Pacific's political bureau and the love of the Times. His situation is not as bad as that, for the Times still hates him, but he is under discipline by the Herrin machine and it is not certain that he may not have to fight both the Times and the "organization" for a re-nomination, and McLachlan has no real love for a fight.

Evidences of Displeasure Little else sometimes speaks so loudly as a man's silence. All through the state, gentlemen representing the Southern Pacific's political bureau made themselves a bodyguard to protect the President from contact with progressive Republicans. They honored whom they would not excluding men under indictment for grafting, and set down at the foot of the tables men whom they wished to make feel the point of their displeasure. At Los Angeles men whom the "organization" wished to have back in the smiles of the President were given seats at the President's table, some on the right of him and some on the left, but McLachlan they ignored. Not that he was not there, for he was. Almost any one who could put up the price of a plate at table could grace the occasion with his presence, but McLachlan was not permitted to occupy one of the seats of the mighty. He ate in glum silence in his own little corner, catch-as-catch-can with the common herd. There is this to be said of Representative McLachlan, he is harmless and wants to be right if he can find out how to get right. In 1896, when silver was an issue, he went to the trouble to come to San Francisco to hold conference with other former free silver shouters to find out whether he ought to shout on, notwithstanding the Republican platform, or shut up. What he finally determined to do The Watchman has forgotten, but the people of his district left him at home for two terms under the implacable hatred of the Times boosted him into office again. Such is political life under a corporation-ridden commonwealth.

Let the Discussion Be Pull and Free One good result, at least, will follow Senator Frank P. Flint's early announcement of his probable retirement from office. It will set people to talking and thinking about the choice of his successor, and that, after all, is the most important question to be decided next year. Mr. Flint is Mr. Herrin's senator, and to get rid of him will be as great a gain as California can make, provided he is not succeeded by some one else chosen and elected by the same influences. If such a result as that should follow the Republican voters would have themselves principally to blame, because it is now possible, under the direct primary law, for the majority to give such expression to its wishes that the legislature will not be likely to disregard them. Next year, for the first time, every voter in the state will find printed on his ballot the names of all declared candidates of his party for the high office of United States senator, and by a wise use of the opportunity thus presented the voters can effectually checkmate Mr. Herrin's best laid plans with regard to the senatorship. But, on the other hand, it is just as easily possible—in fact, it will be a good deal easier—for the people to vote as to deprive the popular vote for senator of any serious influence and to leave Mr. Herrin as much master of the situation as he has been hitherto. That will be the condition if there is no concentration of the vote upon a suitable candidate, and no such concentration will stand about unless there is a full, free and prolonged discussion of the subject. For that there is time, but not too much time, between now and the general election of 1910.

Anti-Bard Sentiment Was Made to Order But in the meantime it is worth while to go back five or six years and to study for a few minutes the tactics by which Mr. Herrin eliminated a people's senator and substituted a Southern Pacific senator. By the way, Mr. Herrin's tactics are nearly always worth studying, for he is a consummate master of political arts. Thomas R. Bard was elected to the senate in the year 1900 as an eleventh-hour candidate, after the legislature, in a struggle which lasted through both a regular and a special session, had finally exhausted itself, and a dark horse candidate was the only kind of candidate who had a chance. By good fortune, choice was made of a candidate who in respect to integrity and elevated standards of political conduct had no superior. Senator Bard had never posed as a distinctly anti-railroad man; indeed, he never posed in any way; straightforward sincerity is the keynote of his character; but it required only a very short time to make it clear to railroad politicians that they could in no way influence his course in the senate. He was equally insensible to flattery and to intimidation. So soon as this was established the campaign of detraction commenced, and it was carried on steadily in every artful way, until the object aimed at was accomplished and Senator Bard's reelection was defeated. The newspapers were made the conscious or unconscious agents for disseminating the belief that Mr. Bard was a misfit in the senate—that he was unable to acquire influence sufficient to accomplish anything that he was obstinate and stupid, that he frequently stood in opposition to the interests of California and the west, that he had needlessly embroiled himself with the administration, and that, in short, he was politically incompetent. Every newspaper in California which was under Southern Pacific influence spread these reports, and every hireling who went to Washington on a Southern Pacific pass returned to tell the same tale.

Bard Left His Cause in The Hands of the People Of course this campaign of systematic detraction was carried on under cover, for with characteristic disingenuousness the Southern Pacific politicians always represented to Senator Bard that they were friendly to him and would do nothing to oppose his return to the senate. They were most diligent in keeping up that pretense when they were busiest with preparations to undo him. There is a public sentiment, latent rather than expressed, which favors the selection of any senator who has proved worthy of public confidence, and will undermine and destroy this in the case of Senator Bard was the task of the railroad politicians. To a considerable extent they succeeded, and so made possible his defeat. They would not have succeeded, however, had he been more active and aggressive in his own behalf. In the ordinary sense of the term, Bard is "no politician." He refused, despite constant urgings by his friends, to enter upon anything which could be called a campaign in his own behalf. He insisted upon leaving it all to the people, assuming that they, through their representatives, would determine the issue and that manipulation on his part was as unnecessary as it would be undignified. Such an attitude would not have been fatal in a state in which the traditions with respect to the senatorship are different, but in California public sentiment, blinded as it had been by the state so long thrown into its eyes, was unable to assert itself sufficiently to prevent the success of the railroad program. Senator Bard left his cause in the hands of the people and the people left it in the hands of the Southern Pacific's political bureau and so Flint got in.

The People's Loss Was Greater Than Bard's It is perhaps doubtful whether the public eye will come to a clear understanding of Senator Bard and the part he played during the time he represented California in the senate; but the facts were very different from the current impressions. He is not in any sense a pliant man, and there was no reason why he should at once take a front rank in the senate; nor did he do so. But there was every reason why he should command confidence by his probity, by his independence, by the soundness of his convictions, and by the breadth of his views. He was continually growing in influence and usefulness; he was coming to the front by that same process of selection by which some of the most influential members of our bodies have been chosen, though naturally no more gifted men than Mr. Bard, have come to occupy foremost positions through long continuance in service and by consistent devotion to principle. The feeling which Eastern senators entertained toward Mr. Bard was that he was not a mere errand boy for his state; that he did not stand for local interests exclusively, but that his views of public policy were national ones and therefore entitled to a respect higher than those of a representative whose chief object is to secure river and harbor and postoffice appropriations. In short, Mr. Bard, before his retirement at the hands of Mr. Herrin, had reached that position where he was frequently, if not regularly, called into council by the Republican leaders in the senate when deciding the largest questions of national policy, and that is a degree of influence seldom obtained by any California senator.

Change of Masters Not Impossible Mr. Herrin has not gotten clear home yet and John C. Lynch has gone East, presumably to report to his superior and, if rumor be true, to make his own political nest more secure than it has been. Tim Sullivan has been shaking the limb that Lynch has been making his nest on and it has grown as wobbly as that of the wobbly bird. Rumor has it also that William G. Henshaw is to succeed Lynch as chief political lieutenant under Mr. Herrin, and, being as big a man as the two of them, he is to succeed both Johnny Lynch and Jere Burke. These gentlemen have developed so many raw spots as to be no longer slightly and a newer reputation would look better for a time. Be it remembered that if this reported change is made it will be only a change of masters and not a change of policy. The Southern Pacific's political bureau will govern California just the same unless the people rise in revolt and cast the whole caboodle. Henshaw, Lynch and Burke, into outer political darkness.

Our Judgment as The California Weekly To Supervisors recommends to its readers the following candidates for supervisors, after a careful study and independent investigation of all the candidates. This list is the same as that of the Good Government League, with one exception: Fred L. Hilmer appears on that list and is removed from this one. Every report received by this paper on Mr. Hilmer was adverse. We have substituted for his name the name of John O. Walsh, of the Union Labor ticket, after a careful process of elimination:

Senatorship The plaint of Senator Flint is For a Career that, in justice to his family, he ought to get busy and make some more money. He is reputed to be worth $150,000. Unless he desires to have his family move in swifter circles, and his children to toil not, neither spin, that is fortune enough for any American public man. The late George F. Hoar regarded $10,000, and some life insurance as enough, exclusive of his library and home, to see him through, and it was. What California needs in the United States senate is a youngish man, on the edge of the forties, who has a little some-

Hichborn's History

So many applications have come to The California Weekly for copies of Franklin Hichborn's

"STORY OF THE CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE OF 1909."

that we have arranged to take orders for this valuable book and fill them directly from our office, either in person or by mail.

The regular trade edition is $1.25, post paid.

Mr. Hichborn's book should be in the hands of every person who desires to gain an interior view of the government of California AS IT IS, and the function of legislation AS IT IS PERFORMED session after session under our very eyes.

Having resided at the state capital and attended upon legislative sessions for a number of years, Mr. Hichborn has had unusual opportunities for getting close up to the true inwardness of things legislative and he deals with his subject in entire frankness.

No better volume could be put into the hands of a young man preparing himself for citizenship and for doing his part in making political conditions better than they are.

thing laid by and who does not regard money as the only good either for himself or his family, to go to Washington with the hope, prospect and expectation of devoting the next thirty years to becoming and being an American statesman. By preference this office should be filled from the House of Representatives, if any member of that body from California had proven himself of senatorial size, but unhappily, of the eight men there not one can scratch his claws high enough up on the bole of the tree to make it appear that he is a big-enough bear to sit in the seats of the mighty. They are good men, some of them, and would not be dwarfed by the overshadowing statesmanship of the state senator, but the state should be able to do better. It would be necessary to go outside the ranks of "organization" politics, but that should be done anyhow. Better a free man, even though of mediocre ability, than one bound foot and hand to the allied industries, even though nature may have endowed him liberally. The idea of a senatorial career for some young man fit for it is worthy of the public's pondering over. The Watchman has such a man in mind.

What Belshaw Said This is what Senator Down at Riverside Belshaw said when he was in Riverside recently.

The Watchman quotes from the interview with him that appeared in the Press: "If I enter the race for governor, it will be as the candidate of no faction in the party; and my platform will be a square deal for all. I recognize that the railroads and other corporations have rights just as much as the humblest individual, and those rights should be respected. But I am opposed to the domination of the politics of the state by the Southern Pacific and allied corporations. The railroads should attend to the transportation business and not undertake to select political candidates and dictate to legislatures. If I should be elected governor of California, no man and no corporation could hand me any set of appointments or dictate to me regarding the state patronage. I should propose to be governor myself, and the recommendation of the humblest individual would be given the same consideration as one coming from W. F. Herrin."

To which the editor of the Press adds: "How does that strike Editor Pillsbury? Does he want anything better than that?"

Quite Good Enough No one who knows the As Far as It Goes legislative history of Charles M. Belshaw will accuse him of taking anybody's program but his own, but this paper is inclined to the opinion that the corporation grip on the politics of this state is not to be broken by any species of negative righteousness. The Southern Pacific's political bureau must be whipped to a frazzle right out in the open. This issue is not between factions within the Republican party. It is between the Republican party on the one hand and the enemies of Herrinism on the other. The Republican party must say to Herrinism: "Take your grip off my throat or feel my poniard in your vitals," and then go to it, neither asking nor giving quarter. An attitude of impartiality between these warring elements will not suffice. If this paper is right in its concept of tendencies at work then free government in this state and this nation is being subverted by an association of corporations inspired by a community of interests to secure for themselves special privileges of great value, shirk as much as possible of the common burdens of government and make the judiciary as much the spoils of partisanship as purely political positions. If this be true then the occasion calls for warfare and not for a passive resistance to a tremendous evil. Mr. Belshaw has not yet put his war paint on.

Sufficient Provocation.

"He was arrested for striking his wife, but the judge, after hearing the evidence, discharged him."

"Didn't he strike her?"
"Oh, yes, but the evidence showed that she was in the habit of singing, 'Oh, you kid!' after he got home from a day of hard labor."

AMERICAN SHIPPING IN AMERICAN SHIPS

V. WHAT OTHER NATIONS DO TO HELP THEIR SHIPPING.

By G. W. DICKIE.

For the sake of comparison I shall give the amounts paid by the United States Post Office Department to American ships under the law of 1891. For this comparison I shall take the best year (1906), which includes the payments made in that year to the Oceanic Company for their Australian mail service.

The American Line to Europe operates 20-knot steamers of the first class and receives a compensation of $4 per statute mile for each outward voyage; the amount given above is the best this line has done under the law; in 1908 the amount earned by this line was $737,332, while we paid to foreign ships $817,718 for service rendered on the Atlantic in carrying our mails.

American Line to Australia Abandoned.

Immediately after the defeat of the shipping bill which failed to pass in the congress which adjourned in March, 1907, the Oceanic Steamship Company of San Francisco notified the postoffice department that the line to Australia would be withdrawn. This line had been operating under the Ocean Mail law of 1891 and after five years of trial had found that the rate of compensation provided by that law was utterly inadequate for running 16-knot steamers on the long and costly voyage of 8,329 miles from the Golden Gate via Honolulu to the South Pacific to Samoa, New Zealand and Australia. The requirements of the mail contract were such that the Oceanic steamers were forced to attempt a speed beyond their capacity over such a vast distance; for this arduous service this American company employed highly paid American officers and crews, was given by the United States a compensation of only $16,659 per voyage, as compared with the $41,604 per voyage given by the German government to the Australian liners of the North German Lloyd, $47,814 per voyage given by the French government to the French-Australian liners, $21,917 per voyage given by Japan to her Yokohama-Australian line, and $23,077 per voyage given by Great Britain to the Orient line for Australian service; this latter amount has lately been increased to $36,250 per voyage on account of an increased speed—that is the speed was increased from 15 knots to 16 knots. All these ships are manned at a cost at least 30 per cent less than the American ships and with the exception of the new contract with the Orient Line are allowed to proceed at a slower speed. The three ships of the American Line were taken off the route, their officers and crews dismissed, and the ships dismantled and laid up in Mission Bay, where they now are.

Thus the American flag has disappeared from one of the most important commercial routes of the Pacific, the only communication with the naval station and garrison at Samoa cut off, and the good passenger, mail and freight ships are eliminated from the traffic between our island territory of Hawaii and the main land, forcing the Hawaiian people to ask congress to permit foreign ships to fill the blank.

Our business men communicating by mail with the merchants and business men of Australia and New Zealand have now to send their letters in a roundabout way by some British or Canadian steamer subsidized with an agreement that her owner will do all that he can to advance the trade interests of Britain and Canada. Under these circumstances what are we to hope to hold of the export commerce that we have built up with Australia which has grown from an annual amount of $12,000,000 to $29,000,000, largely through the service given by the Oceanic Line? This company disbursed over $1,000,000 annually on our water front, over 2,500 travelers carried on these vessels passed every year through our city, and they left not only no impression upon us but money with us. San Francisco's exports to Australia have fallen off $1,250,000 per year with the stoppage of the Oceanic steamship Line; that means something to our producers.

A recent event that must be deplored by all Americans who desire the upbuilding of our merchant shipping is the transfer of the two largest American-built steamers in the Atlantic trade, the "Finland" and the "Kronland," of the Red Star Line, from American to Belgian registry. This lamentable event has a certain bearing on the free-ship question, for the change of nationality is accompanied by the frank explanation that its purpose is to secure the advantage of lower wages and cheaper equipment which operating under foreign colors offers. If the last American-built ships that we now have in the foreign trade are being transferred to foreign flags it is manifest that the free ship cure so urgently prescribed for the upbuilding of the merchant marine, is as many of us have steadily maintained, "a delusion unworthy the attention and serious consideration of practical men."

What Great Britain Does.

The following is a summary of the mail subventions in force in the United Kingdom:
For direct mail service, per annum...$4,297,940
For admiralty subvention, per annum...1,139,065
For Jamaica fruit trade, per annum...200,000
For Canada and West Indies, year...260,000
For other mail services, per annum...618,720

Total$6,515,725

The above is exclusive of the agreement with the Cunard Line. As the terms of this agreement illustrate what the British government is ready to do to preserve her commercial supremacy on the Atlantic, I shall give them here in as condensed form as possible.

Under the agreement with the British government the Cunard company is furnished with $13,000,000 wherewith to build two new vessels, the much-talked-of "Lusitania" and "Mauretania"; this loan is secured on debentures bearing interest at 2 3/4 per cent per annum, the principal to be repaid in annual installments, each of which will be one-twentieth of the total indebtedness, twenty years being the term of the contract. Besides this the government will pay an annual war service subsidy of $750,000 on condition that the company build in the United Kingdom (note where they must be built) two steamships of large size, capable of maintaining a minimum average ocean speed of 24 1/2 knots in moderate weather. In the event of this speed not being maintained, if the actual speed does not fall below 23 1/2 knots, a deduction is to be made from the annual payment by agreement, such agreement to be determined by arbitration, the arbitrators to be appointed by the Lord Chief Justice for the time being.

It is further stipulated that the government is to have the right of hiring the boats at a rate of $6.25 per gross register ton per month plus $1.25 per ton per month if the company provides the crew. As the gross register tonnage of these vessels is 32,500 tons, the British government would pay for these ships, in time of war or at any other time that they were wanted, $200,000 per month, and for the officers and crew, $40,000 per month. In addition to the above war service subsidy the government will pay an annual subvention for mail service of $340,000. Under this agreement the Cunard company will receive for mail service an annual subsidy a total for the twenty years during which the contract runs of $21,800,000. They will pay a total of $16,575,000 for interest and annual installments on the loan so that they will have their two great steamships for nothing and a profit of $5,225,000. The Cunard company must find the protecting influence of the British government much more comforting than the rival companies find the shelter of a Wall Street holding company. Indeed the agreement will always be a precedent to the British when it becomes necessary to do for other companies what has just been done for the Cunard company.

What France Is Doing.

France is engaged in working out a very complicated problem in her efforts to build up a merchant marine. At the present time she is paying, per annum:

For mail service	$ 5,336,355
Bounties on ship construction, about.....	2,000,000
Bounties on navigation, about.....	3,500,000

Total$10,836,355

The French have tried various methods, mostly of a kind to be avoided. The first reformed effort that occurs here is the law of 1866, providing for a reduction of the duty charged on foreign-built ships and the admission of all foreign materials to be used in shipbuilding free of duty. One part of this law worked against the other; shipbuilding in France was encouraged, but the number of ships built abroad increased. In 1893 the clause relating to foreign-built ships was cancelled at the request of the French shipbuilders who were, I have no doubt, gainers under the new arrangement.

The law of 1902, which replaced that of 1893, provided three kinds of subsidies. Compensation was paid to steamships of foreign construction at the rate of 10 cents per ton, gross register tonnage, per day, of foreign trading under the French flag for a minimum of 2,000 tons and at less rates for each 1,000 tons additional down to 4 cents per ton between 6,000 and 7,000 tons. Navigation premiums were to be paid to all French-built sailing ships at various rates per 1,000 miles sailed per day of gross register tonnage. For navigation premiums the maximum carrying capacity was put at 1,000 tons for sailing ships and 7,000 tons for steamers. No encouragement was given for building ships of greater dimensions. The total sum provided by the law of 1902 amounted to $30,000,000 and it was figured by the framers of the law that this sum would be sufficient to last for twelve years. Within one year subsidies had been paid or claimed for the total amount and foreign built ships got the most of it.

The third form of subsidy was a premium on construction to be granted over a period of twelve years to 300,000 tons of French steamers and 100,000 tons of French sailing vessels all to be built in France. The total sum paid as building subsidy was not to exceed $10,000,000. At the end of the first year one-half the total amount for the twelve-year term had been used and French shipbuilding slackened considerably. In four years after the law of 1902 came into force the funds provided for twelve years were exhausted and a new law was demanded.

This new law went into effect on the 19th of April, 1906, and first provides building subsidies for iron and steel ships at the rate of $20 per gross register ton for steamers and $19 for sailing vessels. The grants are to decrease annually during the first ten years by ninety cents for steamers and seventy cents for sailing vessels per gross registered ton. At the end of this ten-year period the subsidy will remain at $20 for steamers and $12 for sailing vessels. When a ship is lengthened or enlarged with a view to increasing its carrying capacity it will be paid a subsidy on the number of tons by which it has been increased and at the rate paid for new ships. Under this law the engines and all auxiliary machinery including the boilers will be subsidised at the rate of $55 per ton weight, this subsidy to decrease annually during the first ten years and to remain at the end of that period a fixed rate of $40 per ton, the same rate to be used as a basis for a subsidy on all new machinery and mechanical parts used in improving or repairing a ship.

The second part of this law provides a shipping subsidy to be paid to all sea-going ships flying the French flag and engaged in distant trading; a subsidy is also provided for French ships engaged in the international coasting trade. The rate per day of service is eight cents per ton gross for steamers up to 3,000 tons, six cents in excess for steamers from 3,000 to 6,000 tons, and four cents per ton in excess for ships over 6,000 tons. Sailing ships receive six cents per ton up to 500 tons, four cents per ton in excess from 500 to 1,000 tons, and two cents per ton in excess for vessels over 1,000 tons. This subsidy will cease to be applied to any vessel which has completed her twelfth year. It is increased 10 per cent in the case of steamers that made fourteen knots on trial half loaded, 20 per cent for those that made fifteen knots, and 30 per cent for those that made sixteen knots or over. There are many other provisions in this French shipping law as to the average distance that must be made per day and the average loads carried, but these averages are so low that a French ship may lie for a considerable time in idleness or move about in ballast and still earn her full subsidy.

The French subsidy law is a hard thing not only for the American shipowner to struggle against but also for the British, as the present appearance of the harbor here will show, for the trade formerly monopolized by the British barques and ships is now largely in the hands of the French.

Germany and Her Shipping.

Germany is not as yet paying subsidies to her shipping, trusting rather to the efficiency and skill of her seagoing people. The Germans are firm believers in home-built ships and every encouragement is given to shipbuilding at the great German ports. When a steamship line is to be established for the purpose of extending the German trade or sphere of influence Germany pays what is necessary to accomplish her object. She is paying at present to the various German steamship companies operating under the government requirements about $3,000,000 per year.

The German method of encouraging shipping has been to spare no expense in providing splendid harbor facilities practically free to her own shipping and at reasonable rates to foreign ships.

The Hansa towns have shown a determination to exceed their ancient reputation for spirited enterprise; the sums they have expended and are still expending are enormous. In 1898 the expenditures under the head of harbor works, etc., for the ten years that had elapsed since the amalgamation in the matter of customs with the German Empire, was estimated to be $75,000,000 for Hamburg, and $28,500,000 for Bremen and Bremerhaven, in addition to $100,000 expended on improving the Weser waterway. Since then and up to the year 1906 these figures have been increased by $22,500,000 for Hamburg and by $10,000,000 for Bremen, making a total for these two towns of over $146,000,000. The shipping of Hamburg has increased enormously during the period in question; in 1888 the entries at Hamburg were 7,524 vessels, aggregating 4,355,500 tons; in 1905 the entries were 15,118 vessels, aggregating 10,400,000 tons. Next year Hamburg's shipping will approach 14,000,000 tons; this is now being provided for. The present extensions at Hamburg are expected to cost $35,000,000, the new harbor works at Bremen are to cost $25,000,000. The state of Prussia decided to Bremen for her new harbor works 1,490 acres and the North German Lloyd guaranteed the interest on the outlay. That is the way to get and to hold shipping and commerce and wealth.

In the next article we will continue our inquiry into what other nations are doing to maintain their merchant marine.

CONSERVATION AT HOME.

COMMENCEMENT week at the State University is a jealous festivity. It brooks no rivalry. No matter what else may occupy the public mind this event holds the center of interest in and about the bay cities. It is a good news, bad, and unsurprising dailies vie with each other in featuring its events. The morning after the final function one of the San Francisco dailies achieved a notable "scoop." It paired off and announced the engagements of half a dozen senior couples that were known to be at least on terms of great friendliness during their college courses. Among these were Clayton Brayton, the noted athlete, and Helen Singham, the honor student of the graduating class. Their photographs had been surreptitiously procured and saved up for that occasion. Although these engagements were wholly unauthorized the announcement did not far miss the mark. In the case of these two there had been no engagement. They had confessed to each other their love for each other and the matter had rested. With the remnants of Peacock's winning Clayton bought an engagement ring and slipped it upon Helen's finger. "That the prophecy might be fulfilled," he explained. Helen accepted it radiantly and both received congratulations unabashedly.

When the San Francisco morning daily was read in Tulare county it was different. All had not gone well between the two families. The truce patched up at Hell's Half Acre had been only for that season. If Brayton and Singham hated each other less cordially after the battle than before, they loved each other little the more and their points of antagonism were not fewer than before.

In the formation of the "Sandlapper" district a square mile of Brayton's plains land had been included against his protest. It was good land, but had no source of water supply for irrigation, save such as the district might afford, and so the county board of supervisors kept it in the district. Brayton regarded it as lost to him, and so allowed it to go delinquent for state and county taxes for irrigation district taxes. It cornered on Silas Singham's section. Every time Brayton passed that way he hated Singham the more. The announcement of the engagement of Singham's daughter to his only son angered him beyond expression. He had been proud of Gabriel's athletic achievements and had offered to wager money on coming events, but otherwise his son's college course had interested him little. It was out of deference to the mother's wish that the lad had been encouraged to go to college, and not that Brayton had any appreciation of the value of a college education, particularly on the agricultural side. If his son had wanted to be a lawyer his wanting a college education would have had more to commend it to the father's eyes than the prospect of riches. As he had turned Peacock out to grass the day after he had allowed himself to be beaten by the "sandlapper horse" at Porterville, so he now seemed inclined to turn his only child out of his heart because he had allied himself with the "sandlapper" race. He did not strive to break up the match. It was sufficient for him to have washed his hands of both of them.

In the Singham household the event was equally disappointing. Silas blamed himself for having suffered those two children to be so friendly during all these years of bitterness between himself and Brayton. It looked like disloyalty in Helen to take up with the son of the arch riparianist, but, evidently enough, there was nothing to be done about it. Mother Singham kept a tight rein and her loss of grief in redoubting her watchful care of the younger children. As for Mrs. Brayton, whatever her son found to love she would love, for it was upon him that this lonely woman poured all the power for loving of a deep and fervent nature. She meant to take Helen to her heart whatever her husband might say, and she could see plainly enough that the best that was to be expected of him was a sullen tolerance.

Affairs had not gone well with Brayton since the advent of the "Sandlappers." Settlements had closed in about him, confining his herds to his own land, and upon his own land feed had become increasingly short. His herds had dwindled, cattle were low in price and the supply of water for flooding grass lands had been cut short. He had gambled more than in former years, and had been less successful. For the first time in his business life his bank account had its balance on the wrong side of the ledger.

The young people came home from college. They came together, and on Peacock's tired dusty trail traveled a beautifully sunburned. They drew rein at the Brayton ranch, it being on the direct road for Helen's home. It was mid-afternoon, and Brayton sat, as was his wont, on the front piazza with chair tipped back against the side of the house, smoking a pipe and reading a newspaper. He looked up as the pair dismounted, but neither arose nor greeted them. On the contrary he took his pipe from his mouth, expectorated over the veranda rail and resumed his reading.

Not so Mrs. Brayton. Hearing the clatter of hoofs she had hourly expected, she hastily cast her apron aside and ran out to clasp her son in her motherly arms and kiss him on each cheek. Then she turned to Helen and held out her hands toward her: "Daughter," she said, "if my son says yes, I shall love you and you look enough like the Helen I loved and lost for me to love you, anyhow. But do you come in and rest a bit before riding on. Papa, don't you see that the children have come?"

Brayton laid aside his paper, arose from his chair and stepped down into the yard. He scarcely more than looked toward his son, but fastened his eyes upon Helen, who looked him fully and frankly in the face. As she looked she saw his color heighten and the second pair of beady black eyes behind the first, whose existence had almost come to be a superstition among old settlers, come plainly into view and then recede again as quickly as they came. Then a strange thing happened. The hard look went out of his face, which perceptibly relaxed, and in its place came a look of tenderness that had not been seen there for many a year. He, too, advanced and held out his hand toward Helen.

"Daughter," he said, "what mother says goes around this place. If she takes you in I shan't keep you out. You are welcome." Helen gave him her hand and he escorted her to a chair upon the veranda, but presently excused himself and went for a walk under the oaks out in the pasture. That, as his wife and son knew full well, meant that he was having something out with himself. Ever since he as a young vaquero, had wooed and won Lemmo Farish and, through her, had inherited this stock ranch, he had fought out his battles with himself under this irregular, double and treble row of sturdy oaks that formed branches and stretched for half a mile across the pasture. The better part of his nature had not always come off first best in these struggles, that often lasted for hours and sometimes for days, but sometimes it had. He had over been a turbulent man, resentful, cunning and fairly criminal in some of his instincts, and yet he meant to be an honest and honorable citizen, to deal justly and to play fair. He coveted nothing that belonged to another, but for his own rights, as he saw them, he stood ready to jeopardize his own life or take the life of another. He was looked upon as a man with a history, if only that history were known.

"It will be all right between you and Dad," Gabriel had whispered to Helen when he had an opportunity, and his mother, hearing it, nodded her assent. "Your resemblance to the Helen we all loved and lost broke down all barriers betwixt you. I'm the fellow who will catch it."

"Well, son," the mother observed with much feeling, "we must all be patient and careful with papa. If you had wanted to be a lawyer, or go into politics, he would have turned us all out of house and home to help you, but when you decided to be a farmer, and an educated farmer at that—a farmer with 'frills and fads,' as he considers the educated farmer to be—he was ready to wash his hands of you. Nevertheless, if you make a success of your educated farming he will come around all right. Don't cross him more than you can help. Let him have his way, and you take yours. I don't know what plans he has for you, but don't expect too much. I have some plans for you, too, and will see that you get a chance to carry out your own. I'm not for nothing that I have devoted myself to chickens and turkeys all the years since Helen was taken from us. I had to have something to occupy my mind."

After tea, in which the elder Brayton did not participate, Gabriel and Helen entered on toward Helen's home, but she would not let him come all the way, preferring to "have it out" with her family alone. It was arranged that he should come over the following evening to be formally presented, and, as Helen believed, adopted into the "Sandlappers' family."

Chapter XXI.

A FARMER WITH FRILLS AND FADS.

That evening, when Gabriel had returned from his part-wash ride home with Helen, he found his father sitting alone on the piazza smoking, as was his custom, it being too dark to read the newspapers and too warm to sit inside the house. Gabriel stepped up in front of his father and held out his hand. "Shake hands, Dad," he said, and his father took his hand mechanically, after which Gabriel drew a chair to him and sat down opposite, tipping his chair back against the veranda rail. For a few moments neither spoke.

"I suppose you want to get busy," the father said, by way of observing.

"Got to, Dad; money all gone," was the reply.

"What are your plans?" the father asked. "Have not made any yet except that I want to get hold of a chunk of land to make an up-to-date farm out of."

"How would section ten do you out there, cornering on your prospective sandlapper father-in-law's?"

"It is good land, and I think I could make good on it if I had a clear title."

"That's the rub," the father replied. "It is in that sandlapper irrigation district, and the district is in limbo. I don't believe it will ever get out, so I've let the land be sold for state and county, as well as for irrigation district. Guess, and I have, you got more to land after, but in redeeming it. But if you want to get into that boat with the rest of the sandlappers, as you seem inclined to, I'll quit-claim my interest in that section to you and you can rustle out the best you can. There are those four bay mares that graze in the pasture and the two duns if you need them, doing nothing to speak of, and I reckon you'll find wagons and plows and scrapers enough about the place to fit you out for a team. Mother will board you for a while, anyhow until you get set on foot, so of a slack up and things started; but that is all I can do for you. When I am done with what we've got it'll be yours and mother's, but not till I am."

"All right, Dad, and many thanks. I'll look things up tomorrow and let you know," Gabriel replied, and then went to find his mother, out in the garden as usual at that hour in the evening watering her flowers and shrubbery.

He went over with her what his father had told him. It was much as she had divined it would be. As for her, she believed that the "sandlapper" district would pull out of its trouble, that a compromise would be somehow effected with the bondholders and that the value of the section of land was worth the risk. She had upwards of $3,000 in bank at Visalia, the profits of her poultry for ten years or more, and against that her son could draw for the redemption of the ranch from taxation and for levelling and leveling the best go first and take the advice of John Middleton.

On the morning following he went to see John Middleton, and found him sanguine of the ultimate redemption of the district from confiscation and bankruptcy. That evening Gabriel went to Visalia with plans determined. He would take over that section of land from his father, redeem it from state and county taxes and buy up enough irrigation district bonds to make a probable sett-off to the bondholders' claim on that ranch when the day of settlement came. He had determined to have a minimum supply of water for irrigation, wet or dry, and to that end would bore a well, put in a turbine pump and buy a crude-oil engine. Then he would buy all the cows his mother's money and his own credit could command, start a dairy and ship cream to Los Angeles until he could have a butter factory of his own. As for their wedding day, it could wait until he got things to going and a house up fit to live in. Meantime she could tend him in town as she had done of old, and they could see each other every day. He talked so earnestly and enthusiastically of the task before him that the Singham household was quite won over.

Within a week after arriving home from college this young adduct of a farmer had purchased in town a small shell of a house and moved into upon Section Ten and there set up bachelor quarters. He had a well down, and he and the mules his father had left him use were hard at work leveling and checking forty acres to be seeded to alfalfa in the winter. In another fortnight a crude-oil engine and centrifugal pump had been installed and water was flowing in the ditches for the irrigation of land for a late crop of corn and sorghum. The feed was good that year and Section Ten was then untroubled—a nucleus of provender for his dairy herd.

He bought some old sheds in town and built something that would serve for a dairy barn until he could do better, and in one corner, he set a place for a cream separator and for handling his milk cans with cleanliness and ease. Then he took about all the money his mother had left and went over to San Luis Obispo county and bought half a hundred head of good young dairy cows. Feed was so cheap, in fact bought out a renter's outfit at a bargain, and leisurely drove homeward, bringing with him a young Swiss to help him herd the cows on his own land, and milk and take the cream to the station for shipment.

Then he remembered how his father's cattle had eaten with avidity, when the rains had crashed down and softened it, the prickly alkali weed that covered the waste places of the plains with sprangling, blossoming, tangled yellow beauty, a jackrabbits could see and find his way through. He took his mowing machine and mules and went out upon the waste places, cut, raked and cocked the prickly stuff as green as possible. After it had gone through a sweat in the cock and had come out green and fresh and soft as a kid glove, his cows took hold of it with avidity, and he knew that he had a winter's feed supply that would not fail him. He spent half the fall hauling this stuff in and stacking it in his barnyard while his knowing neighbors laughed at his feat. The idea that that prickly pest of the plains could be made into hay was preposterous!

What this young college athlete accomplished in half a year amounted the settlement. It was now a fact, as it was in the coming train, carried care of cream to Los Angeles, greedily for all that he could furnish, and more, too. With the proceeds he bought more cows, as they could be picked up, and he had shipped up from the south a young registered Holstein bull. With the coming rains that fall alfalfa went into the ground as fast as land could be ditched, checked or contoured for the distribution of water when it should come down the canal. Meantime, he found that, with a reservoir he had scraped up near his well, he could irrigate two acres a day with his pump and engine at a cost not to exceed one dollar per acre, so he stole a march on the season and had his alfalfa, barley being sowed with it for a first crop, well started early in the fall and winter. By Christmas a hundred acres were seeded down, and six mules with a hired man were plowing, seeding and harrowing seven acres of plains land a day for a grain hay crop to be fed to more cows for the skimming of more cream with the same cows that more cream might be skimmed.

All this while devoted Mother Brayton drove with her own horse and buggy over to Section Ten with sundry hampers filled with things that her boy liked to eat, and, every Saturday morning, certain other two hands and ten delicate fingers took possession of the "shack," as Gabriel called it, to make amends for bad bachelor housekeeping.

And so things went for the first year. Then there was a change. The alfalfa had come on admirably and the grain hay crop had bettered the average. The remittances from the cream had yielded fully $6 per month per cow, and this farmer with frills and fads was now milking a round hundred of them. Then some workmen came and the winter was a vacation system, and set up a butter-making machine. Thereafter no cream went to Los Angeles, but gilt edged "Section Ten" butter instead, and, instead of sending the cream to town each morning, neighboring farmers of Enterprise were invited to bring their milk to "Section Ten" to have it skimmed, be paid for the cream and haul their skim milk home again. The business grew. The ranch was fenced stanchly, calf pastures first, a hog lot next, then the half section of salt grass land, and, finally, the cultivated area. More ditches were "dredged out," more contour lines run and levees built, so that the second fall and winter a second hundred acres were seeded to alfalfa.

When the schools closed that season Helen Singham was not an applicant for her position in the Tulare high school, and people said, "Aha! the farmer with the frills and fads must be getting on." But she went to the coast for the summer, and nothing happened yet. Yes, there did, too; Gabriel stole away for a week, leaving them in the hands of a foreman, who was also an agricultural college graduate. There were plans of a house to go over, and he had to go over to the coast to go over them. That was all.

Then came the burning of the bonds that set the sandlapper district free.

Chapter XXII.

THE BURNING OF THE BONDS.

October 19, 1903, was the great day for Tulare and the "sandlapper" irrigation district. It was the day of deliverance out of bondage. It had been a hard struggle for the people to raise and place in bank $283,000 wherewith to redeem a debt which, with interest and interest on interest, had deluged the people already, now reached a round $700,000. But the thing was done, and bravely done. Now, at last, the cancelled bonds were in the hands of the district officers ready to be burned.

Invitations had been sent to the public generally to come and rejoice with the delivered people and be glad. And they came by train loads. A barbecue had been prepared for their feeding, flags waved, bands played and orators showered the people with praise for their fidelity and courage. The Governor of the state graced the occasion with his presence and himself applied the torch to the bonds, and while they burned the people stood, for a few moments, mute, watching the tongues of flame lick up the evidences of their bondage. It seemed too good to be true, but when the cent-up flood of feeling found expression, from a thousand throats there poured forth a song of praise for nearness to God, and, afterward, cheers upon cheers, handshakes, embraces, the wiping out of old scores, the healing of old wounds, the healing of life anew for the retrieving of impaired fortunes.

In all that multitude there was but one man who stood apparently unmoved. That man was Moses Brayton. In the far edge of the standing crowd stood Brayton narrowly watching all that took place, more ample of waistband than in former years, but still well set up, his close cropped beard grizzling and his keen black eyes glittering as of old. When Silas Singham was called to the speaker's stand and Brayton's jaws together with the flap, but, reaching to the ground, a twig to white into bits, he nevertheless listened attentively. He had an ordeal yet to go through for which he had little stomach, but he had made up his mind to see that through also, and so he stood, too, the ordeal of listening to Singham.

"I helped you people to get into this trouble," declared Singham, candidly, "and I have helped you to get out of it again; but as God is my judge I have done both with charity toward all and malice toward none. Once, in my younger days, I was lost on the desert, without water, and saw in the treacherous mirage visions of rivers of water in the distance, of lakes whose shining surfaces I saw through imaginary tree tops waving in cooling breezes. I staggered toward them with tongue protruding when it seemed that every step taken dragged a ball and chain at each ankle. Out of my misery inarticulate I called as Dives in Hades for water, and when at last I found it—stagnant, hot, alkaline—I quaffed it, as though it had been sweet nectar distilled from roses, fit for the gods.

"So it was that I heard these desert plains calling for the water that God poured out and stored upon the tops of yonder mountains, and I pitied these thirsty lands; and I pitied them, as I had suffered, and I pitied them. I saw the eddying whirlwinds making sport of their blistering misery. I saw the orchards, farms, meadows, homes filled with the voices of children, that were possible if only God's water could be brought to the God's land to give it life, and I swore that, cost me, cost you, what it might, I would see that water married to that land and the twain abiding fruitfully together. With this one purpose in my mind I strove for it as I had at another time striven to find my way to the promised land. I turned to God, the nuptials of that marriage are today celebrated in the burning of these bonds that held our spirits down and unmoved our right arms, as well as in the welding of the bonds that unite Enterprise Irrigation District to the waters of the river for forever, by an action sanctioned by law and reinforced by custom and usage.

"In this struggle for an idea I have looked into a gunbarrel that seemed to spell death. I have crossed arms with stout manhood and both given and taken measures. I have measured without accounting it ill fortune. I have seen my neighbors turn their backs upon me and my friends denounce me as a public enemy, but I have neither flinched from the ordeal nor cried to you for mercy. If I have been insistent, dictatorial, defiant, it was because I heard the plain lands calling, calling for the moisture whose abundance, in the form of snow, I could see glistening from those mountain summits morning and evening.

"Friends, I have served you for a service I have wounded you, any of you, forgive me as you hope to be forgiven by the Father who was author of us both. I meant you well, whether riparianist, adverse appropriator, plainman or what, but above and beyond you or any of you, I reckoned the need of thirty crops whose sufferings, agonies, dyings, I witnessed season after season.

"If to any of these lands I have carried the cup of cold water I have done it in His Name and with malice toward none. Asking for your forgiveness without apologizing for trying I have done (inasmuch as I should do it all over again if the need arose), I say to you one and all, Let us go home and put our several farms in order. We are free men; let us live in free manly and in amity, in beneficence, not slothful, but diligent in business, honoring the Lord."

With the conclusion of this address the crowd cheered, hands were stretched toward the platform to be shaken, and the herculean, towering form, with whitening beard covering a broad expanse of bosom, visage deeply etched, descended into the midst of the multitude to extend and receive the hand of fellowship from hundreds whose ill will toward Silas

Singham went out in admiration for his undoubted sincerity and undaunted courage.

Moses Brayton shut up his knife, thrust it into his pocket, and, turning upon his heel, walked out under the spreading umbrella trees on the far side of the plaza, where he paced back and forth alone. Anyone who knew him well would have known that he was having something out of his head, and needed less of all to be intruded upon by anyone.

There were other addresses, including a stirring one from the Governor of the state congratulating the people as much for their maintenance of good faith with their creditors as upon their deliverance from debt. But no one among them all struck so deep or affected the vast audience so profoundly as the simple, fervent unassuming of the heart of Silas Singham. It was his first appearance upon a platform since the day, five years before, when he had, by resolution of his assembled neighbors, been asked to withdraw himself from them and their affairs and had, in part at least, refused to abide their wishes.

As he had felt that insult cut through to the quick, so now he enjoyed to the full the prompt ovation tendered him. With him by-gones were to be by-gones. Passionate, quick to resent an affront with a blow if the occasion seemed to warrant it, he had found life too short and its concerns too important to justify the carrying of an enmity. In truth he had not hated Brayton, but only the things that Brayton did for the hurt, as Singham believed, of God's country, and he looked upon that as treason. He looked upon the traitor as worthy of death because of his treason and not because of a spirit of malignancy directed against the man.

This day Singham was virtually born again. He shed his partisanship as he might an overcoat, and if he could, in the hour of his triumph, have found Brayton he would have forgiven his forgiveness and proffered his love for in that hour, Silas Singham literally loved everybody and everything that God had made.

What do our readers think about it?

PERSONALIA.

John Mitchell, former head of the United Mine Workers, has assured Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont of the national woman's suffrage organization the support of the American Federation of Labor. When asked if he would cooperate in the work he said: "Well, I can hardly say that if you mean any systematic active work for suffrage. I am too busy to bind myself to any other cause than the one to which I am now devoting myself—the amelioration of the conditions of the working classes. I agree with Mrs. Belmont," he went on, "that if women voted the child labor problem would probably be solved very quickly."

Prof. Henry Morse Stephens, of the University of California, will for Spain on November 27 to investigate the history of early California and the lives of Portola and Junipero Serra.

Madam Gaski recently asked: "Why is it that your American girls must take their marvelous voices to Europe? There is more love of art in Chicago than in New York, and there is abroad. Singers with great names in Europe who can shout and can scream come to America and are nobody. It is because the Americans know the very best music and must have art. But you need grand opera in English in all your cities. Without that you will waste all this rich talent that is yours."

Typographical errors are often amusing. T. P.'s office prints an excellent one. The editor wrote: "When Mrs. Jones lectured on 'Dress' she wore nothing that was remarkable." How the compositor came to the conclusion that this should read "When Mrs. Jones lectured on 'Dress' she wore nothing. That was remarkable" is a mystery.

There was a backward student at Balliol who, for failure to pass an examination in Greek, was "sent down." His mother went to see the master, the late Dr. Jowett of Oxford, and explained to him what an excellent lad her son was. "It is a hard experience for him, your daughter," said the master, "but he will have the consolation of religion, and there is always one Book to which he can turn." Dr. Jowett eyed her a moment, and then answered: "Yes, madam; the Greek grammar. Good morning."

John Winslow spent his honeymoon at Niagara. He left the bridal apartment late one night to bathe, and on his return knocked, as he supposed, on his wife's door, calling softly: "Honey!" There was no answer. Winslow knocked again. "Honey!" Still no answer. Winslow thundered on the door. "Honey!" he cried, in a voice of agony. Then a reply came at last. "Sneek, you bloomin' idiot!" a male voice growled. "This is a bedroom, not a blooming beehive!"—Washington Star.

Count d'Orsay, on his first visit to England, chanced to be seated at dinner next to Lady Holland. That remarkable and many-sided woman was in one of her imperious humors. She dropped her napkin. The count picked it up gallantly. Then he forked, then he forked, then he forked, and, as often, her neighbor stooped and restored the lost article. At last, however, the patience of the youth gave way, and, on her dropping her napkin again, he turned and called one of the footmen behind him. "Put my plate on the floor," the count said. "I will finish my dinner there, it will be so much more convenient to Lady Holland."

When the United States fleet entered Asiatic waters during the famous round-the-world voyage, a small cruiser was sent ahead to a Chinese port on the official business of the fleet with the cruise. Upon arrival the ship's officers were invited to dine by a Chinese mandarin, and during the meal one of the officers wished a second helping of a certain savory dish which he supposed was duck. Not knowing a word of Chinese, he therefore extended his empty plate, remarking with smiling approval: "Quack! quack! quack!" But the officer's appetite failed him suddenly as his host, with a twinkle of slant celestial eyes, shook his head with simple but horrifying response: "Bow! Wow! Wow!"—Harper's Monthly.

THE COLLEGE SPIRIT.

The October Lippincott's is responsible for the following story:

In the course of a recent dinner of college men, at which the "college spirit" had been extolled, this story followed an unusually impassioned speech dealing with the manner in which the alumni stick together and help one another out:

Smith, a graduate of Yale, was middle-aged and hard up, so in his distress he determined to appeal to the generosity of Jones, his old-time classmate, now a prosperous business man. Going to Jones's office, he sent in his card to the great man, and was promptly admitted.

He found his old friend Jones seated at a fine, big mahogany desk. The furniture and rugs were of the most expensive sort, and the caller experienced a feeling somewhat akin to awe as he contemplated all these evidences of prosperity. The great man first pressed one of a long row of mother of pearl buttons that occupied one side of his desk, dismissed the clerk who responded, with a few whispered instructions, then turned to Smith:

"Hello, old man! I'm real glad to see you. Why, I haven't laid eyes on you since class day. How are you, anyway?"

"Prosperity hasn't spoiled my old classmate," said Smith to himself. Then he opened his heart, telling Jones all his troubles: how he had had a wife and three children, a happy home, and a good-paying business, but the children died, one after another, his wife became an invalid and also died; his partner swindled him; he first mortgaged his home, then lost it; now he was "down and out."

As Smith talked he was carried away by the recital of his woes, and the tears ran down his face. Jones was similarly affected, and when he pushed one of the mother of pearl buttons his caller was sure that help was at hand.

In answer to the ring a darkey of imposing size appeared and stood at attention. To him Jones said, "He's choked with emotion."

"George, put this out," said Jones. "He's breaking my heart."

INVENTOR OF "BILLIKENS" A WOMAN.

Miss Florence Pretz of Kansas City is said to have already made a small fortune by the sale of the good luck tokens known as Billikens. Miss Pretz is described as a young artist who before her creation of the saucy clay image had never been able to do any work with a marketable value. While all her little world acknowledged her artistic ability no one would buy the fantastic Oriental drawings that she turned out. Her first lot of Billikens were taken to Chicago by a friend who promised to try to sell them. They met with such ready sale that the friend wrote back advising that others be made and sent as quickly as possible. Within a month the little images were the talk of the town and orders were coming from almost every state in the union. With the proceeds of their sale Miss Pretz was able to carry out a long cherished plan of having a studio in Chicago and being able to work under the best teachers.

TO HELEN.

By Edgar Allan Poe.

Helen, thy beauty is to me

Like those Nemean barks of yore,

That gently, o'er a perfumed sea,

The waves, away, waver, grander bore

To his own native shore.

On desperate seas long wont to roam,

Thy hyacinth hair, thy classic face,

Thy Naiad airs, have brought me home

To the glory that was Greece

And the grandeur that was Rome.

Lo! in yon brilliant window-niche

How statue-like I see thee stand,

The agate lamp within thy hand!

Ah, Psyche, from the regions which Are Holy Land!

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

A Law and How It Is Made.

A law is a rule of conduct. That is all it is, but to be effective it needs to be prescribed by some power possessing sovereignty over the person for whose conduct the rule is prescribed. There is a difference of opinion among experts as to where and how law originated, but it is the old issue of which came first, the egg or the hen, only in a different form.

The most common assumption is that law had its origin in custom, that people in their associations with each other came to lay down certain rules for one another's guidance as well as their own. Their own preservation depended upon their so doing, and these customs were by and by recognized as having the force of law, and then they became law. That process is going on about us every day, and courts recognize and enforce such customs as grow up in new departments of life.

There is another theory that, first of all, a law must have been in the form of a judgment. That the head of the tribe or clan, having some disturber brought before him, pronounced judgment upon him and, in doing this, was guided by what other heads of clans or chiefs of tribes had done under similar circumstances, and so law had its origin in precedents, of the binding quality of which we hear so much popular complaint. In all of our human relations, few acts or customs have greater warrant than that it has been so ever since before anybody can remember to the contrary. Our lives are mainly ordered by customs and usages that have come to us few know whence or how.

After these customs, or original judgments, whichever doctrine of origin we accept, it is important enough to justify it, laws finally get crystallized into statutes, and the statutes into codes. Statutes are carefully worded statements of these rules of conduct. Sometimes they are made and promulgated through an autocrat, as in Russia; and sometimes through a parliament, congress or legislature, as in most of the civilized countries of the earth, but especially so in England and America, where statutes come in no other way.

Codes are logically arranged in abbreviated statutes. Statutes are generally arranged in the order of their enactment and are not easy to find. When one wants one of them, and does not know in what year it was enacted, and in what volume to look for it, he has a good hunt on his hands. The codes are arranged according to subject and as conveniently as possible for quick reference. When so arranged by a commission or expert, the code provisions are generally re-enacted into law and so given all the obligation of the statutes from which they were compiled.

There is another very prolific source of law-making that the native modesty of courts, and the legal fiction that courts do not make but only construe law, prompt them to disclaim, and that is the law of judicial decision. In construing law, that is, in explaining it and fitting it to the needs of each case that comes before them, the courts make as much law as the legislatures and, all things considered, much better laws, more reasonable and more just than legislatures can make, but they do not like to be accused of doing this and resent at all times the imputation. It is good that the courts do make law, for codes and statutes are inflexible things and difficult to make fit the innumerable forms in which human ingenuity contrives to inflict wrong. The courts bend and twist, tuck and let out, until the statutes are made to fit somehow if any how.

Not all statutes are reduced to the codified form, but only those that fall under four general heads. The rest of the law, and there are great volumes of it reaching back to the organization of the state government, is to be found in the statutes as enacted, amended, repealed and re-enacted again, it may be, a bulky volume following each legislature, and growing more bulky session after session. For instance, there were fifty changes made in the school laws of California, some of them far-reaching, by the last legislature, and yet this was only one-third of the number of changes proposed to be made by different bills introduced, but which failed of enactment. This shows the shifting character of our laws and statutes and emphasizes the need for a legal profession to help the ordinary citizens to straighten out the tangles they get themselves into.

The codes of California are, first, the Political Code, which has to do with the framework of government; the Penal Code, which commands what is right and forbids what is wrong and metes out penalties for transgressions of the law; the Civil Code, which deals with the relations of citizens toward one another; finally, the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides how, with what legal machinery and by what orderly processes, the business tangles which men get into with each other may be straightened out in courts of law. It may be profitable to devote a lesson to each of these codes by and by, but our next lesson will be on the legislature and how it does its work.

COUNTIES COMMITTEE MEETING.

The twelfth semi-annual meeting of the counties committee of the California Promotion Committee, which is to be held at Visalia Saturday, November 13, will have for its theme a subject that will deeply interest every one in California. The development of the fruit growing industry has meant much for the development of the state and at Visalia representatives from all parts of California will discuss "Horticulture in California."

There will be a wide range of topics, each having for its exponent a man especially fitted to talk on the special subject. These will include not only the industry of fruit raising, but also the allied industries of curing and preserving fruits. Arrangements are already being made to have this one of the most enthusiastic and successful meetings.

STATE NOTES.

Fred E. Unholz has sold the Ontario Record to S. W. Wall and P. W. Tournison, and it will henceforth be published by them.

In order that a mile and a half of the bed of the Trinity river, in Trinity county, may be mined for gold, a tunnel has been constructed at a cost of $125,000 and the river will be diverted from its course.

Up to October 12 of this year 12,053 carloads of fruit had been shipped from Sacramento. At the same date last year the number of carloads that had been shipped was 10,481.

The Issue Is Heney, Not McCarthy.

THE ELECTION OF P. H. MCCARTHY to the mayoralty would be unfortunate. The defeat of Francis J. Heney for district attorney would be a disaster. The Heney candidacy is the paramount issue. Therefore the slogan, "anything to beat McCarthy" is fraught with danger. San Francisco is engaged in a supreme effort to establish equality before the law for rich and poor alike. Unless that can be achieved we have no government worthy of the name and no civilization that has a right to endure. The Declaration of Independence is made a lie, the Constitution of the United States a fraud and the Constitution of California like unto it. The election of Heney being the supreme issue the acceptance or rejection of every other candidate should be determined by that issue. Those who are for Heney will wish so to vote as to uphold his hands if elected. They will vote for a board of supervisors that will furnish the sinews of the war for equality and for a candidate for mayor who will exert executive power to the same end. The voter will find such a list of supervisors on another page of this paper in our Political Table Talk. He will find such a candidate for mayor in Dr. T. B. W. Leland, and none other.

Crocker or Leland, Which?

P. H. MCCARTHY WILL BE ELECTED mayor of San Francisco if honest Republicans and Democrats stand stubbornly for the nominees of their respective parties until the votes are all in. The dishonest members of both parties will vote for McCarthy. Manifestly the weaker of the two, Crocker or Leland, should be sacrificed to the stronger to save San Francisco from the McCarthy disgrace. Which shall it be? Prima facie Leland should be sacrificed because there are more Republicans than Democrats in San Francisco, but the truth lies deeper than surface indications show. Party will count for little in this election. It should count for nothing. No party issue is involved and only the demagogic bellows for party loyalty in this crisis. Nor is the issue one of men. Both Crocker and Leland are unobjectionable as men and neither of them is preeminently fit above other men. Therefore it is a question of what the men stand for. Doctor Leland stands for the continuance of the graft prosecutions until the law has done its uttermost to establish equality before the law. Mr. Crocker may beat about the bush as much as he likes, but his whole support stands for confessing the prosecutions a failure and for the quashing of the indictments against our malefactors of great wealth. That is what the demand for "civic peace" means if it means anything. Hence every man who stands for Heney and his cause should vote for Doctor Leland and the same cause. Every man who wants the prosecutions to cease will vote either for McCarthy or Crocker. The path of duty is so plain that the blind should be able safely to walk therein.

Fighting For What It Already Has.

THE STAR SUPPORTS MCCARTHY for mayor because, "He stands for the democratic principles (Initiative, Referendum and Recall) that will, when adopted, insure government of the people, for the people and by the people." Bless the Star's luminous soul, that battle was fought and won for San Francisco with the adoption of the new charter ten years ago. Why fight for what you have already got? Has James H. Barry been asleep these ten years? Sections 20, 21 and 23 of Article II provide for that holy democratic trinity. The California Weekly favors initiative, referendum and recall in all those things in which they may profitably be employed, but of one hundred affairs of government scarcely one can be determined by either one of the three. In the ninety and nine cases government must be representative, and, to that end, this paper favors the election of few officers and the appointment of many. The few great questions of policy must be determined by the people. The many less important must be left to the few. Social order will break down under any other system.

The Basis of Our Faith.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY HAS FAITH TO BELIEVE that Heney and Leland and a good, strong board of supervisors will be elected on Tuesday next. The basis of that faith is this: That an aroused public sentiment anywhere in America can be depended upon to measure up to the highest requirements of manhood. Public sentiment in San Francisco is aroused. Whenever it has been aroused it has done the right thing and has done it bravely and well. The voter alone in his booth with his ticket and his God has, in a good majority of cases, honored his God in stamping his ticket. It is to the voter who obeys neither his party nor his boss that the honor of San Francisco is committed. The California Weekly believes it safe in his hands. Therefore the coming of next Tuesday is looked forward to with calmness and in confidence that a substantial victory for equality before the law will be achieved.

A Bay Cities Event.

WHILE FELICITATING OURSELVES upon the success of San Francisco's Portola celebration let it not be overlooked that all the bay cities took hold loyally and joyously in helping to make the event a success. Sometimes big men have small spots in them and the same is true of big cities. In a larger sense all these bay cities are one city and bickerings between them are like bickerings in a family, destructive of good breeding. Oakland did her part well and will do it again. San Francisco is duly thankful and will reciprocate when opportunity offers. The bay cities are one city in purpose and enthusiasm for all.

Are the People Incurable?

A SQUARE DEAL FOR THE RAILROADS was demanded by our Big Pacificator in an address to a waterways convention at Corpus Christi, Texas. He lamented that people who would go to any extent to induce a railroad to come to their country, once there, would deprive such railroad of reasonable profits through prejudice. That is a severe arraignment. Are we, then, a perverse generation? Do we, as a people, smite the hand that feeds us? Or did the President, with an unconscious simplicity, explain the situation better than he knew when he went on to say that, "Scarcely a friend to a railroad can be found anywhere except, perhaps, in the local (city) council." If friends to the railroads are to be looked for only in local city councils, boards of supervisors, legislatures and nowhere else may it not be because the railroads have sought to elect their friends to such positions to the detestation of everybody else? When and where was an usurper of governmental functions loved? When did usurpation of the prerogatives of government excite in the breasts of freemen any sentiments except those of scorn, resentment and, sometimes, also of revenge? In our judgment the American People are neither perverse nor incurable, nor would they knowingly deprive any railroad of a reasonable income upon an honestly stated investment. The President might, with greater propriety, have demanded a square deal for the people from the railroads, and with particular reference to their looking for friends elsewhere than in local councils, legislatures and courts.

OUR DOUBLE-BARRELED PRIMARY.

It is commonly understood that our new direct primary law does away with conventions. Such is not the fact. Conventions are still to play an important part in our political life.

There are two very distinct functions which the new direct primary law undertakes to perform. One is to nominate party candidates for offices to be voted for at general elections. The other is to elect delegates to party conventions to be held for controlling party management and declaring party principles. The second function is as important as the first. Whoever controls the party in power will control the government and whoever controls the party conventions will control the party in power.

Under the convention system that formerly obtained the platform of principles was made before the candidates were nominated and each candidate had an opportunity to know beforehand upon what platform he was expected to stand. If his principles were such that he could not approve then he could refuse to be a candidate for nomination. Under the new system the candidate will not know what his platform is to be like, or whether or not he can stand on it, until from two to four weeks after he has received his nomination.

Voting constituencies are going to know what their candidates stand for before they nominate them. Suppose, then, that the conventions are so manipulated as purposely to make platforms upon which certain candidates will find it impossible to stand because inconsistent with pledges already given to the constituencies that nominated them. What then? Will the candidate stultify himself before his nominating constituency or disregard the platform of his party? We may be sure that men who make politics a profession will not fail of making the most of this opportunity to confuse the campaign of a candidate whom they wish to have defeated, and there is nothing easier than to manipulate a resolutions committee. This, in part, serves to show how important it is going to be not to overlook the convention feature of the direct primary law or permit it to default into the hands of crafty politicians.

Besides, it is the first concern of special interests to secure control of party machinery no matter how small or inconsequential any party may seem to be. By virtue of possession of the executive machinery of the Republican party in California Mr. Herrin has been able to designate who shall fill positions on the federal bench and, during all the years of Mr. Roosevelt's presidency, Mr. Herrin was able, for the most part, to turn out of federal offices the friends of Mr. Roosevelt and to put in their places men covertly, if not openly, hostile to Roosevelt and his policies. We must look well to our conventions or the Southern Pacific's political bureau will continue to do exactly this under our direct primary system.

Finally, some form of public pre-primary caucus or convention is inevitable for naming candidates to be voted for at our primaries, else the whole system will become the sport of crafty manipulators. In short, we are far from having done with conventions and the sooner this truth is realized the safer will the public interests be.

AN IMPENDING CONFLICT.

For three score years there has been unbroken peace between this country and Mexico. When, by the treaty of Queretaro, we placed our southern boundary at the Rio Grande and west to not far north of the head of the Gulf of California, taking to ourselves California, Texas and the great southwest, we were sated. Since then we, as a people, have known little of Mexico or its people; what it and they were doing or becoming, and we have cared less. Our outer garment has not been pinching under the arms and we have been able to stretch our legs from ocean to ocean. We have been racked with growing pains only and have not been cramped for room in which to grow.

The profoundest fact in our 300 years of civilization has been free land. As long as that lasted radical differences in condition among the people rested only upon differences in mental and moral constitution. The common man could not be oppressed. If pressure was anywhere sought to be applied the free farms that Uncle Sam had to give relieved the tension. Men could go west and be free. Those free farms are all gone and Secretary Ballinger declares that lands made habitable through reclamation are not for poor men. Where, then, shall poor men go? They are pouring now into the southwest at the rate of 200,000 a year, and the stream is augmenting. Will it stop at the Rio Grande?

We are beginning to learn things about Mexico. Our financiers have invested hundreds of millions in the railroads and mines of that country. The government of Mexico exactly suits Big Business. It is autocratic. It recognizes gentlemen on sight and makes the proletariat keep its place. Strikes are little known and disturbers are pricked into quiescence with the bayonet. It is a strong government and property rules. Rich subsidies are passed out to favored adherents and those who give Diaz what he wants get what they want.

But the American people are learning things about Mexico. John Kenneth Turner, a little spectacularly, perhaps, but with essential truth, is turning the light upon more abominable practices than slavery in our own south ever inflicted upon a defenseless people. Conditions which obtain in Mexico are going to become more intolerable in our eyes than those which obtained in Cuba. The American appetite for information about Mexico has been whetted and not all the power of Diaz and his soldiers can prevent a searching showing up. Herman Whittaker's "The Planter" may prove to be the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of the Yaquis and the peons.

Meantime the old autocrat, Diaz, cruel as the Indian blood in his veins can make him, is growing older. He can not last always. In anticipation of his death or the weakening of his grip on affairs, all Mexico is in a ferment. The DeLara incident is only a forerunner. While we shall not permit Mexican anarchists, or even revolutionists, to make our land a base of operations against a neighbor with whom we are at peace, American sentiment will not tolerate the returning to Mexico of political refugees that they may be shot at the whim of an autocrat more unrestrained than the autocrat of the Russians.

Meantime a great human flood pours from the Middle West into the Southwest in search of new homes. Will it stop at the Rio Grande? If it crosses over will it become Mexican? Not much!

THE SALOON-KEEPERS' SALOON ORDINANCE.

The saloon-keepers of San Francisco are to be given full credit for knowing what they want and why they want it. Nor are they disposed to suffer the reformers to monopolize the initiative. They have asked the people of San Francisco to give them just the sort of saloon ordinance they want. What is it? It is to be voted up or down on Tuesday next and everybody should know.

It makes the $500 a year license permanent unless changed by a referendum vote. The license fee should be raised as the revenues of the city require it and upon no account should it be less than $1,000 per year for a saloon and $1,200 would come nearer to making whisky pay what whisky costs the community, a sound regulative doctrine, and as fair as sound.

If adopted this ordinance will take from the Board of Supervisors all power to amend the ordinance in any particular to prescribe regulative resources, determine hours of closing, or to have other control over an evil that needs, at all times, to be under a control of the most vigilant character.

If adopted it will take away from the police commission the chartered power to refuse to grant a permit for a license if for any reason the granting of a permit would be opposed to the public interest.

It injuriously restricts the power of the Police Commission to revoke a license where the public well-being requires such revocation, the most salutary remedial measure yet devised for making saloon-keepers obey the law.

The submission of this ordinance was procured through misrepresentation. Many of those signing the referendum petition were assured that it only sought to make stable the $500 a year license fee, but, alas, it was full of jokers only recently discovered. Its adoption would be a calamity. Vote it down.

Among the things for which San Franciscans are forced to apologize with humiliation is the backwoods, frontier, old foggy treatment of the saloon in this city. Not counting places where liquors are sold with meals, there are in San Francisco, in round numbers, 1,800 licensed retail drinking places, or approximately one for each 250 inhabitants. To have more than one for each 500 of population is a disgrace to any civilization and one to each thousand people would be life-saving stations enough for a section of the great American desert and an undreamed of godsend to the Sudan. It is a poor time, when only a single forward step has been taken, to vote the present status into the organic law of the city.

And notice may well be served upon the saloon interests that, if they crack this ordinance through, those who oppose their domination of San Francisco may also avail themselves of the initiative provision in the charter and go to the public with a rational, progressive, restrictive ordinance that will focus the moral sense of the nation upon the issue. There are many who are weary of having to apologize for saloon rule in the Queen City of the Pacific.

THE SPIRIT OF ITO.

With the assassination of Marquis Ito there perished one of the great men of our time. No truer patriot than he ever fought, thought, struggled, stood steadfast through evil report and through good, endured adversity and success, and finally died a martyr to country.

This world is to be governed by those fit to govern it. There is not a land under the sun which, if it abdicate the responsibilities of sane and safe government, will not pass into hands fitter to control. The needs of the race transcend all legalities. Inheritance, lines of descent and immemorial custom can not prevent the progress of the world.

Ito was one of the first of his compatriots to perceive this truth and he threw himself into the regeneration of his own country regardless of consequences to himself. He made himself at once the Washington and the Jefferson of Japan and, more than any other man, helped to make his country a nation and to give it an equal station with the other nations of the earth.

Korea, by its slothfulness, cowardice and imbecility, forfeited its right to be a separate nationality. Japan fought its battles for it, contended over its prostrate body with both China and Russia, and finally, in very self-defense, took it under Japan's own protection. Ito was sent to Korea to bring order out of chaos and he did it. He will prove to have been the regenerator of Korea as well as of Japan.

For this he was slain. The spirit of the reactionary is the spirit of the assassin. It hates implacably. Manchuria was perhaps to come next. Why not? Russia has shown its incapacity to govern wisely and humanely. China is still a hulking mass of superstition and incapacity with only a promise for better things. Japan gave China a whipping with no other purpose than to arouse her out of her sleep of twenty centuries to make her take her equal station with the nations of the earth, foreseeing that dismemberment must follow if China did not. Japan has never stood for the dismemberment of China proper.

And in what attitude are we of America viewing this splendid drama? Judging from the tone of our daily press we are viewing it from the standpoint of peanut politics. The predominance of Japanese influence in Korea and Manchuria is in line with the progress of the world and a human uplift where such an uplift is needed. Why may not Japan build railroads in Manchuria if she can obtain the capital for it? What possible objection can we have?

Are we afraid of the open door? Are we afraid that Japan will take to herself the supplying of all the wants of the Chinese and Korean millions? Japan could not do that if it wanted to. It isn't big enough and has not hands enough to supply half the wants of those countries. The more Japan opens up Manchuria with railroads the more opportunities will Americans have to push their commerce into that country, if ever American manufacturers think it worth their while to divert a part of their attention from cinching their own people to giving heed to foreign markets and the wants of foreign consumers.

Let not Americans be less broad, less generous, less alive to the paramount human interests of the world, than the Japanese. If we had more of the spirit of Ito in our own national politics we should be the better for it. Let us not worry about that open door. It was opened to stay open. To stand for its being kept open we shall be able to count on British influence as certainly as upon American, and upon Japanese influence as certainly as upon British. These three nations have from the first stood shoulder to shoulder for the open door, and not one of the three will attempt to close it.

THE BLOOD OF MORRIS HAAS.

Whose hands are stained with the blood of Morris Haas? That is an issue which those arrayed against the graft prosecution have again forced upon the attention of the voters of San Francisco and, this time, they have done it under cover of sympathetic women.

Suppose that Mr. Heney did blunder. Suppose that he was less considerate of the reputation of a man without reputation than he might have been. Does that convict him of unfitness to continue the great struggle he has so long maintained for the equal vindication of the law? If he blundered he paid the price of it and came near to paying it with his life. Let it be remembered, however, that the defense was seeking to pack the jury with men of bad character, men who would swear well and truly to try defendants when, in fact, they were going upon the panel forewarned to undo the prosecution and the state. Let it be remembered that an exposure of their purpose was essential to a public understanding of the truth, and that opportunity came to make that exposure in the person of a convict. Who shall say, that the demands of justice did not require that the truth be brought out at whatever cost?

But whose hands are stained with the blood of Morris Haas? If he was not hired to kill (because he had a grievance that might be made the excuse for killing), as Pandovaris and Claudius were hired to kill, and by the same malign influence—if he was not by that influence murdered to prevent his "squealing," then the blood of Haas is upon the hands of those careless officials who inadequately searched him and not upon the hands of Heney.

Morris Haas had been a thief and it was his own bad aim that prevented him being a murderer. The idyllic family life portrayed by the circulars being sent out did not exist. It was to another woman and not to his wife that he gave his confidences. He was morbid, unwholesome, drunken and criminal. To drag this miserable being from his grave to render service in this campaign against the power of the law to vindicate itself is not less cruel to the family of Haas than the act of which the circulars complain, taken at its worst. The blood of Haas is upon the hands of those who would have used him to advance their own ends and aims. Francis J. Heney was not of that ilk.

No Graft In San Francisco Now.

The Chronicle rejoices that there is no graft in San Francisco now, that "Since the unseating of Schmitz and Ruef and their satellites, nearly three years ago, San Francisco has been the most honestly governed city in America." By virtue of whose efforts has this great good come to San Francisco? By those of Spreckels, Heney and Burns. These are they who turned the rascals out, set up a clean government in their stead, procured the nomination and election of a new non-partisan city government and made it possible for San Francisco to be rebuilt without being preyed upon at every turn by a horde of official thieves aided, protected and shared by a police force in the same hands. It is only when these men propose to finish their work and send to state prison those men whose ill-gotten millions made grafting profitable alike to briber and bribed that the Chronicle wants to "stop knocking" and pull for "civic peace."

Ruef's Transcript on Appeal.

After being bid on by a number of printers the contract has been let for the printing of the transcript on appeal of the case of The People vs. Abraham Ruef. It will contain about 1500 pages, the equivalent of about forty volumes of 400 pages each, and the printing will be upward of $12,000. The document will contain, in round numbers, 5,000,000 words, and the volumes, set on end in front of the First District Court of Appeal, will fully occupy Dr. Eliot's five-foot shelf designed to contain the cream of the literature of all time. Is it a wonder that the wheels of justice are clogged and the courts overburdened when such monstrosities are permitted to be inflicted upon the judge?

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"It is an insult to a young man whose soul is stirring in him, and to whom great aims are calling from the ends of the earth," declares an editorial in the New York Outlook, "to offer him a fortune and tell him to go off and be happy."

And yet how many young men would like to be insulted in just that way of all ways!

But would they be young men whose souls were stirring within them? Would they be young men who hear great aims calling from the ends of the earth? There are young men who would accept the fortune gladly, but not that they might go off with it to be happy. Unless they were the merest novices in philosophy they would know that the way not to find happiness is to go in search of it. They would know that happiness is never an end within itself, but always an incident to an end. A young man who hears the ends of the earth calling to him may find happiness in finding gold away off in the snow and ice of Alaska, but he will never find gold in striving to find happiness.

Look and Fenny found happiness standing at Ultima Thule where, as they believed, man had not stood before, and because men had not stood there before. All about them were frost and ice and desolation and hardship. A great place, was it not, to look for happiness? But they had heard great aims calling from the ends of the earth.

Only be sure that the soul of a young man is stirring within him, and that he hears great aims calling, and it will be safe to trust him with the greatest fortune that human rapacity ever piled up. There will be no danger of his becoming a social butterfly, a "good thing" at the club, a debauchee and, finally, a misanthrope if not a suicide. Any young man who would accept a fortune, merely that he might be made happy in the self-indulgence which a fortune would afford him, must never have felt the stirring of the soul within or heard the call of a great aim. It is Luke who tells us that when Mary came to Elizabeth the babe in her womb leaped for joy and Elizabeth herself was filled with the Holy Ghost. So is it with all young persons, male or female, who feel the soul stirring within, who hear the call of a great aim. If lifts them above themselves. They walk with their heads in the skies. Their feet are winged like the feet of Mercury.

How dead a thing is that soul into which there comes no stirring of the enthusiasms! How deaf are those ears that hear the call of no aim above that of the gratification of physical appetites! There are such people. They go in troops down all our streets. Their highest concept would be to have a fortune put into their hands with which to gratify their bodily lusts and appetites. They worship at the shrine of chance. If there be lotteries they spend their all on tickets and then dream, if they can, of some lucky number that shall lift them above the need for toil, or they make their investments on the turn of cards, or, if nothing of dice, the pools at the racetrack, and, if nothing more promising comes their way, they content themselves with feeding nickels into slot machines; but at no time will they settle down to figure out the probabilities of a legitimate investment or build their hopes upon a prudent and industrious life.

We are told that there is a form of sin which, if the soul commit, it shall not be forgiven it here or hereafter. Perhaps the smothering of the stirring of some worthy enthusiasm within the soul may not be that sin, nor yet the turning of a deaf ear to the call of some great duty or aim, but this they do know: The soul that has never stirred, and the ear that has never heard the call to some purpose higher than being happy, was dead from the beginning. Hence the need for kindling dormant enthusiasms in the breasts of the young. Hence the freighting of every wind that blows with calls to noble aims that some listening ear may hear and answer, "Lord, here am I."

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Railroad Business Indicates Prosperity.

When, after a season of business stagnation, railroad affairs pick up, there are large shipments of commodities and many people are traveling. It is at best of indications that better times are at hand, for the commerce of any country is in the veins of its organized life. Recognizing the foregoing as the statement of a truism, the people of the United States are entitled to congratulate themselves that much-heralded prosperity is close upon them. Railroad men report that the vast volume of business that has been booked is necessitating tremendous outlays for new equipment for their lines. During the second week in this month the orders placed for cars and locomotives aggregated $8,650,000. Mark that this was in one week. These included orders for 310 new locomotives, approximately valued at $4,650,000, for the Baltimore and Ohio, the Erie and the Norfolk and Western railways, and the Baltimore and Ohio alone will place orders for 250 engines. The New York Central is having 4,000 steel cars of the gondola type manufactured at a cost of about $4,000,000. Orders for 100,000 steel cars and 110 locomotives had been placed recently, but prior to those above noted. All these orders, it should be remembered, are based on the necessities of the business and in response to its imperative demands. Bearing these things in mind, it requires neither a prophet nor a son of a prophet to foresee that prosperity even now is at our door.

Our Facilities for Wired Conversation.

More and more man is conversing over the wires, and it is a natural inference that his facilities for doing so must be enlarging rapidly. The inference is sound; they are. In 1880 the telephone companies of the United States operated 34,305 miles of wire. Twenty-seven years later, or in 1907, the mileage of their wires had increased to more than 13,000,000. They had multiplied by 400 their capacity for reaching the people. In addition to this 13,000,000 miles of wire, the telegraph companies operated about 2,000,000. Fifteen million miles in all; enough to put a belt of lightning 600 times around the earth at the equator—and all to give little great man an opportunity to converse with greater facility! Then, too, there is the wireless. Oh, our chance to talk is not very limited. Of the telephone companies' 13,000,000 miles in operation in 1907, which amount must have been largely increased before now, more than 8,000,000 miles began operation within five years prior to 1907. In that year the mileage of the telephone companies was eight times as great as that of the telegraph companies, while in capacity invested, business transacted and wages paid the telephone companies exceeded their competitors by three and one-half to one. Fifteen million miles for talking purposes! Is it no longer true that "silence is golden?"

To Set the Briton Talking.

W. T. Stead, one of the most spectacular of journalists, who looks with deprecation upon his countrymen's unsocial attitude toward the world in general, has evolved a plan for dissipating the Englishman's taciturnity and making him a social creature. With this object in view, he has established what he calls the "flag section" of the Roundabout Club, of which he is president. Every member of this section wears in his buttonhole two miniature flags, one English and one that of some foreign nation. These flags indicate that the wearer is willing to converse with anybody, civilly answering civil questions, for instance, without the prior formality of an introduction. If, at any time, the wearer is too occupied for conversation, all he need do is to turn the foreign flag. This flag indicates that an inquiring world of his preoccupation. In order that the palpable advantages of this plan—in England—may not be confined to the Roundabout Club, the great British public is invited to wear the flags at its pleasure. The scheme appears to be a good one; travelers in England say that it is much needed, and it remains to be seen only whether it will work. Perhaps it will, but British reserve is British reserve, don't you know.

The Difficult Japanese Language.

The study of the Japanese language as light intellectual employment for the spare hours of the winter season is not recommended. It would be found that the employment is all but enough, but the lightness would be lacking. Even a Japanese finds it difficult, but it is not far this side of impossible for a person of Anglo-Saxon lineage. For example, consider the nature of the alphabet, which a Japanese child is seven years in acquiring and then he by no means has learned it perfectly. First the student must familiarize himself with 214 signs, and each one of these bears about the same relation to the alphabet that the initial letters of an English dictionary do to its contents. In other words, it is necessary to know the 214 signs in order to be ready to acquire the alphabet. Again, the Japanese practically have two languages—the written and the spoken—so that in reading one virtually has to translate what one reads into the oral language in order to make oneself generally understood. The alphabet really is one of ideographs, and in order to read one of the better Japanese papers it is necessary to understand at least 2,500 to 3,000 ideographs, while a larger number would be decidedly useful. In short, the Japanese language, in its written expression, is the most conservative feature of Japanese life today, seeming far behind the needs of so progressive a people.

Are Gobelin Tapestries Passing?

The manufacture of Gobelin tapestries is a family affair. From generation to generation, through centuries, has been handed from father to son, and from son to grandson, the knowledge of how to weave this finest of tapestries, the pride of kings, long reserved as the decoration of royal palaces alone. So microscopically fine is the work that an average craftsman manufactures but a yard and a half of the tapestry in a year, while the best workmen can hardly more than double that amount. Now it is said that the art is likely to die entirely out, and at no distant day. Once there were 250 of these workmen; now there are but fifty-one. While fabulous prices are paid for the specimens of their art, the craftsmen themselves are being practically starved. On a recent visit to the factory Deputy Lehoucq, of Paris, who called the workmen martyrs to their art, found that after 10 years of labor the craftsman received $320 per annum for his services, after 20 years $480, and after 36 years $600. These are the men whose tapestries sometimes sell for $20,000 or $30,000 apiece! Every year the number of the workmen decreases, and the reason why is evident enough. If the manufacture of these tapestries becomes a lost art, as it promises, it will be because the workmen make too little, and somebody else too much, on the labor they represent.

Steps Looking to a Canadian Navy.

It begins to look very much as if it would not be a great while until there will be a Canadian navy. It is semi-officially announced that the Dominion government will ask of the next parliament an appropriation of not less than $25,000,000, to be used in beginning the construction of a navy. It is the intention of the government to build its war vessels in Canada, and also of Canadian materials. So runs the story, as it is told at Ottawa. Adding to the force of it is the fact that the greatest shipbuilding firm in the world, Harland & Wolff, of Belfast, Ireland, has decided to establish a branch plant in the Dominion, probably at Halifax, Nova Scotia, as that city is the most available for the desired purpose. It is said, also, that a number of other prominent British shipbuilding firms are negotiating with the Dominion government with the view of establishing plants in Canada. All these things lend significance to the Ottawa report that Canada soon is to have a navy of its own.

The Diamond Mines of Arkansas.

Experts of the United States geological survey report that in the state of Arkansas are diamond fields of considerable extent. How rich they may be is yet indefinite, but, as people are beginning to take an interest in them, it is likely that more will be known about them soon. It is claimed, however, that up to the first of last July more than 700 diamonds had been found. Most of these were small and "off" in color, averaging only about $10 a carat in value, but some have been found which, after they had been cut, were valued at $175 a carat. The extent of the territory in which they may be found is yet unknown, but it is known to be of considerable size.

London's Tradesmen Lord Mayors.

Sir John Knill, who has just been elected Lord Mayor of London, is a wharfer, and this calls attention to the curious fact that London elects almost none but tradesmen to the highest office in its keeping. Sir John's immediate predecessor was a stationer.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

Taine's English Literature.

Naturally the best part of Taine's classic work on English literature is that which describes the golden age, the Elizabethan era of intense and general intellectual curiosity, of bold frankness of speech, of grand passions, an era when the palpitating emotions of men thrilled robust constitutions instead of shattering sickly frames. Taine's interest is sympathetic, his heart beats high and glad with the splendid rhythm of the age he depicts, his spirit warms to these burning barbarians who clothed their visions of life with the most gorgeous paintings of fancy in the most brilliant colors of nature. A full range of feelings, throbbing animal energy, a superb dash and courage, the spirit of sensitive yet self-confident youth, he finds to be characteristics of the age that produced Marlowe and Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Bacon, Drake, Raleigh, and—most towering shaft of an imperial monument—Shakespeare, the poet, lover, dreamer, seer, prophet, searcher of hearts, most melodious and greatest of writers.

Taine's style cannot be described—vivid, laudatory, vigorous, eloquent, penetrating, ornate—all, and more than these. This Frenchman subdues his racial pride to bring to the altar of a foreigner the supreme tributes of a profound admiration. To the American reader he shows the height to which Anglo-Saxon genius once rose and may rise again, the summit achievement in the noblest of all arts, which is the reproduction of the fullest natural expression of abounding human life.

CONVENTION AND THE THEATRE.

The distinguished English actor, Forbes-Robertson, recently expressed the following pregnant ideas regarding one limitation of the modern stage and his theory of a proper remedy. He said:

"The modern tragedy is a new note in the theater. It compares sometimes favorably with the Greek play, which is the basic element of real drama, after all, but it has undergone a conventional vanishing that is a bit anæmic. One of the great modern plays revealed this to me, 'The Great Divide.' It was splendidly written, it had the broad sweep of Greek tragedy, and I felt the thrill of poetic drama in it, but I kept saying to myself, 'What is the matter with this? What is the matter with it?' Then I discovered that I wasn't interested in the woman. I wasn't sorry enough for her. Her resentment toward the man didn't seem justified, since he had married her. Of course, I learned afterward that the play had been changed to meet the conventions. Why? The conflict of her feeling, her sense of outrage against the man was reasonable, if he had not married her. Why alter the chief inspiration of the drama, since it was far more beautiful and sublime a conflict in human understanding as it was first conceived? That is an instance of the modern tragedy crippled by convention. Not that I want to see the theater used as a medium for crude actualities, but it must do what all art does, take us out of ourselves, not leave us depending upon ourselves to feel it.

"Once it was the theory, a theory very much tabooed in the theater, that the stage should accomplish what literature does. But the literary quality of the play should not be an objection to it. In fact if any effort in art deserves literary gift I think the theater does, but it should appear in the quality of literary reserve rather than literary expression. The stage is the rostrum of the spoken word, which is the most vivid of all artistic influence.

"But, after all, a play or a book should, and I believe does, depend for its value upon the beauty of its theme, the skill of its tragedy or comedy, or the spiritual sincerity of its symbolism.

"The theater is a reflection of the quality that is in the men and women who serve it; not in the selection of theme or idea."

A BOOK FOR THE CITIZEN.

"Government of American Cities" is the title of a valuable book by Horace E. Deming, of New York, chairman of the executive committee of the National Municipal League. Among other things, Mr. Deming has wisely set forth the pre-requisites of municipal self-government contained in the League's municipal program. As Mr. Deming has presented them they follow:

1. A city is not a province to be administered by some outside authority, but a government.

2. A city should have all the powers requisite to satisfy the local needs of the community within its corporate limits.

3. Within its corporate limits a city should be invested with all the powers of government not inconsistent with the State Constitution or general State laws.

4. The qualified voters of a city subject to the State Constitution and to general laws applicable to all the cities of the State—and, as a consequence, not liable to alteration or amendment at the caprice of the State Legislature—should be free to make and to amend their own form of local government.

5. The merit principle should be applied throughout the purely administrative public service of the city.

6. The structural plan of a city government should be simple, centering in a few officers responsible to the people.

7. The successful candidates for elective city office should represent the prevailing local sentiment upon the issues of city politics.

A NEW THOMAS PLAY.

Play-goers who saw Augustus Thomas' "The Witching Hour" will be interested in the New York Sun's synopsis of his latest play, "The Harvest Moon."

The action revolves around Dora Fullerton, who believes herself to be the daughter of a Harvard professor. Only he, his sister and one other know that the girl was born two years after he and his wife had separated, and under the domination of the aunt the girl has grown to womanhood, unhappy in the constantly invoked memory of her mother. This atmosphere of "negative suggestion" is noticed by a celebrated French playwright, M. Vavin, the girl's real father, who does not declare himself because of the affection between Dora and the professor. So Vavin sets about to counteract the aunt's influence, practically succeeds and the girl is about to marry when she learns of her doubtful parentage. Vavin's restoration of her self-confidence and ultimate disclosure of his identity finish the development of the play.

Californian Poets' Corner

SCIENCE.

By Ambrose Bierce.

The lines entitled "Science" were contributed by Ambrose Bierce to the Overland Monthly before he had become famous as a writer. When he printed a column of verse some years ago, he did not see fit to republish this poem.

The winds of heaven trample down the pines.
Or creep in lazy tides along the lea;
Leap the wild waters from the smitten rock,
Or crawl with childish babble to the sea;
But why the tempests out of heaven blow,
Or what the purpose of the seaward flow,
No man hath known, and none shall ever know.

Why seek to know? To follow Nature up Against the current, why, who cares?
Vain is the toil; he's wisest still who knows—
All science is but formulated prayer—
Prayer for the warm winds and the quickening rain,
Prayer for sharp sickle and for laboring wain,
To gather from the planted past the grain.

FROM THE LAWYER'S BAG.

The humors of legal coincidences are discussed by a writer in the Cincinnati Enquirer who found many odd titles of lawsuits:

There is sometimes much that is humorous or comical indicated by a fortuitous juxtaposition of names. Example, Call & Settle, a firm of tailors. A recent law journal has been getting together a number of titles of cases, reported in the law books and comments amusingly on the unexpected and unusual situations they suggest. In 62 S. E. Reports we have Boswell vs. Johnson, something impossible to imagine. Then we find as antagonists in the courts instead of the Senate, Calhoun vs. Webster (3 Ill. 221). It has a familiar sound, but the two great senators were too friendly ever to get into a lawsuit. Next comes along Lazarus vs. Caesar (137 Mo. 199), which, taken literally, won't do at all, for they were far apart in point of time, but in another sense it expresses an enduring situation. Lazarus and Caesar, always have been opposed, and probably always will be, for they are both, by the processes of evolution, eliminated from the scheme of things. Following is the unnatural opposition of Ice vs. Ice (83 S. W. 135). It must, as the journal says, have been a cold day for both parties. More natural relations appear when we find Faucett vs. Freshwater (31 Ohio 637), an opposition constantly existing. Rains vs. Rainey (11 Hump. 261), it would seem, should be Rains and Rainey, and Bridge vs. Ford (4 Mass. 641), raises the question of how to get across, and Knut vs. Nutt (35 S. W. 686), suggests the problem of which would be the hardest to crack.

HOW TO DEAL WITH AN OBSTACLE.

By Charlotte Perkins Gilman.

I was climbing up a mountain path
With many things to do,
Important business of my own,
And other people's, too,
When I ran against a Prejudice
That quit out on the view.

My work was such as could not wait,
My path quite sure and stout,
My strength and time were limited,
I carried quite a load,
And there that hulking Prejudice
Sat all across the road.

So I spoke to him politely,
For he was huge and high,
And begged that he would move a bit
And let me travel by—
He smiled, but as for moving!—
He didn't even try.

And then I reasoned quietly
With that colossal mist,
My time was short—no other path—
The mountain winds were cool—
I argued like a Solomon,
He sat there like a fool.

Then I flew into a passion,
I danced and howled and swore,
I pelted and belabored him.
Till I was stiff and sore;
He got as mad as I did—
But he sat there as before.

And then I begged him on my knees—
I might be kneeling still
If so I hoped to move that mass
Of obdurate ill-will—
As well invite the monument
To vacate Bunker Hill!

So I sat before him helpless,
In an ecstasy of woe—
The mountain mist was rising fast,
The sun was sinking slow—
When a sudden inspiration came,
As sudden winds do blow.

I took my hat, I took my stick,
My load I settled fair,
I approached that awful incubus
With an absent-minded air—
And I walked directly through him,
As if he wasn't there!

WITH THE LUMBER JACKS

THE STURDY BREED OF MEN WHO CLEAR THE FORESTS.

In all the din of controversy over the conservation of our forests, no word spurts out to remind one of the men who are the actual hewers of the woods, the obscure and nameless "lumber jacks."

But here is an admirable breed of men, to whom, while a tree is only a tree or a log of lumber, a man is a man—a forthright, upstanding, independent, stubborn and hardy race, that do a day's work in the honest sweat of their brows and fear no man.

The lumber jack carefully distinguishes himself from the "hay hopper," as he contemptuously dubs the casual plainsman who drifts to the mountains for a summer's work and who has no pride in the traditions of woodcraft. The lumbering season is short in the Sierra, from May to November, and the lumber jack may shift through the winter as farm-hand, bartender, man of all work, stationary engineer, miner, or what not, but when the first breath of spring sweetens winter's air he drops anything he may have in hand and answers the call of the woods.

Generally by that time he is broke. Never mind, the boss of the woods knows his skill of old, and will advance him money for carfare, outfit, and stage fare, and with the comrades of last season he hits the road at the steeper grades on the way to the camp and feels himself again on his natural ground.

A good woodsman must have the primitive virtues. Felling trees and logging are dangerous employments, calling for strength, courage, invention, and at times a nimbleness that leaves the fraction of an inch between safety and sudden death. It is a grim commentary, but the writer recalls an instance in which the lack of a ready wit to know how to dodge a falling tree made a raw hand literally "lose his head," for the remains of his body were indistinguishable from the wreckage that lay beneath the fallen trunk.

Such virtues the lumber jacks have. But it is rather of certain higher types of virtues they possess that one who knows them likes to think. They are, for one thing, the manliest men the writer ever saw. Take one type of incident that fell repeatedly under his observation as an example:

Most of the work of logging is done in "crews" of two to four men. Each man in a crew is, necessarily, judged by the work the whole crew does. It frequently happens that an old, silent woodsman, proud of his skill, is paired with a raw recruit who bungles the job or loses time in doing it. Maybe the crew gets a "cussing" from the woods boss, or perhaps only a silent view of an inadequate job. After the supper in the cook house is over, the old woodsman hangs around outside waiting for the boss. He waylays him and says:

"Want my time, Bill."

"What's the matter with you?"

"Nawthin'. Got 'em down the hill."

"Don't the grub suit you?"

"Good enough fer me."

"Well, what's your kick, then?"

"Nawthin'. Want my time."

"I know what's the matter with you, you old son of a gun. Your partner's falling down on you. I'll give you another."

"Nope. Want my time."

And his time he gets, rather than "peep" on his partner, and down the hill he goes, or to another camp, "cussing" to himself and "cussing" also the boss, to whom he applies next season for a job—and gets it.

The best of the lumber jacks take no "back talk" from anyone, not even from the awesome and terrifying woods boss, who scares the average hay hopper out of seven years' growth every time he appears on his big black horse. The true lumber jack accepts suggestions or help where it is needed, but he takes no orders, and the boss knows that one is enough either to start a fight or to lose him a man he needs and admires.

The boss, in turn, has his code. He is boss because, in his day, he "worked down" the strongest, fastest men who pitted themselves against him, thrashed every man that overstepped the primitive man's code by a hair's breadth, and so worked and fought his way to a natural leadership amongst strong men. His men work for him because they admire him, as a man and as a workman. And he still lends a hand; does the work the two men with the rest when occasion calls. And he proudly reserves to himself the brunt of the most dangerous work. He asks no man to attempt anything he does not risk himself, and permits no one but himself to do the very most dangerous thing; that have to be done. No wonder he is boss; no wonder they follow where he leads. He is a man.

And he and they have qualities that belong with the tenderest attributes of women. The writer has seen a lumber jack whose profanity would shame the invectives of Milton against the Cavaliers, who was dour and grim and rough in his ordinary work, treat a woman book agent as if she were a queen and he a knight, and buy from her a cheap, tawdry "Life of Christ" to send back East to a little niece whom he thought it might please. The writer has seen a half-dozen men who looked like tramps or highwaymen, and talked in tune with their looks, as gently solicitous over the illness of another lumber jack as if he were a child.

Not all these men are unlearned. One of them can repeat whole scenes from Shakespeare's plays from memory; another explained in detail the theory and practice of the railroad air-brake in a way that would have done credit to a teacher of physics; a third, a German carpenter, wrote out from memory the last chapter from Goethe to grace a piece of his handiwork.

They have a fine democratic instinct. They are familiar with one another, but do not allow familiarity to become impertinence. Father and son work side by side. To everybody the father is John, the son is Jack. The "water-buck," seventeen years old, calls the boss of his crew, who is sixty, "Jim," but without any trace of impudent assumption. Every man stands on his own feet; if he respects himself and does his work, everybody else respects him. Fights are rare, but they are clean-cut fist affairs when they come, and fair play is enforced by all hands.

They have, too, a genuine feeling of respect for women that is much more impressive than the surface gallantry of town clerks and society men. To these men politeness is merely a mellifluous mixture in ordinary conversation to even the flow of words, but they will drop it absolutely and instantly within the range of a woman's ears.

This little sketch does its purpose a great injustice if it does not convey the writer's intention to express an unfeigned tribute of admiration and regard for these men. They made one summer of his life more pleasant than most he has ever enjoyed. They surprised him, not that they equalled the townsmen with whom he was familiar in the "downward" virtue, but that they excelled the people to whom the amenities of life have been always preached, in the gentler and more likable attributes of character—manliness, independence, regard for the feelings of others, respect for women, fraternity and democracy. To become well acquainted with these men was to refresh and strengthen an abiding faith in the soundness of the foundation upon which the American republic is built, and to widen the sympathies with a class of men of whom nothing is heard in the public places, but who do the thing that comes to hand with all their might, with a man's courage and good will.

ROOSEVELT'S LIBRARY.

Mr Roosevelt gives as an appendix to his first African hunting articles a list of the books constituting the portable library of the expedition, says the Chicago Inter-Ocean.

There are fifty-eight in all, representing his own taste and Kermit's. He adds that these "represent in no way all the books we most care for, but merely those which, for one reason or another, we thought we should like to take on this particular trip."

The most striking feature of the list is the number of volumes of poetry. These make up about 40 per cent. of the total. Shakespeare, Spenser, Marlowe, Homer, Shelley, Lowell, Emerson, Tennyson, Longfellow, Poe, Keats, Milton, Dante, Bret Harte, Browning, Euripides and Percy's Reliques are all named.

In fiction Scott, Cooper, Thackeray, Dickens, Mark Twain, Bret Harte and Borrow alone have secured admission. Macaulay, Carlyle, Captain Mahan and Froissart stand for history. Emerson, Holmes, Macaulay, Lowell and Bacon and the authors of the "Federalist" are the essayists.

The Bible, the Apocrypha and "Pilgrim's Progress" minister to the needs of the spiritual man.

The list introduces us to a new side of Mr. Roosevelt's character—the love of poetry and of calm delights.

LOMBROSO AND HIS OPINIONS.

Cesare Lombroso, the Turin professor, who is chiefly noted for his reputed discovery that the genius is a sign of abnormality, and that geniuses insane—has died at his home in the Tuscan city, being nearly seventy-three years old, says the Springfield Republican. Lombroso was born at Verona in November, 1836; was graduated from the university of Turin as a physician and entered upon general practice in that city. But his reputation as a student of mind led to his appointment as lecturer on medico-psychology at the university of Pavia, and there he began those researches into the causes of crime which have made him famous. One of the by-products, so to speak, of these studies, was the discovery of that queer disease which has but recently arrived in this country—pellagra, or "black skin," which is an old scourge of Italy. It was he who traced the origin of the disease to a fungus which grows with a fungus growth, and ground into meal for the food of the people. He obtained from legislation and the action of societies measures which have checked pellagra. This was but one step in his studies of malnutrition and mental deficiency, from which he developed his theories of the close connection of genius, eccentricity and crime; and he then began his career as a physiological and psychological "criminologist"—a term which has no solid basis, since even with Lombroso's own contributions there is no such science as criminology—though from many points there are endeavors to produce such a science. Lombroso's books, "Uomo Delinquente" and "Umo di Genio," are now quite well known; they have been translated into English as well as into several European languages.

Extravagant as his opinions are—making Shakespeare, Keats, Tasso, Poe and indeed almost every one of extraordinary individual mentality, essentially insane—it is asserted that his writings have been of large value. A writer in the London Lancet, an authoritative journal, says:

The net result, however, of his teachings or, I should say, his propaganda, has not been without its salutary side in his native Italy, where the conditions, physical and moral, which antagonize healthy and normal development, particularly among the poor, have prevailed long enough to produce a population in which crime multiplies itself out of all proportion to its manifestations in other continental countries. It is the recognition of the good he has done directly by individual work, indirectly by example and influence continued over twenty years, that the testimonial has been accorded him to-day (in 1906) by the public to which the leading anthropologists interested in the phenomena of crime have appended their signatures, at this, the sixth international congress of the science which he is known to have fostered as well as founded.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

With the Poetry Left Out.

He was fond of readin' papers, and to me he often said
That he found a mental tonic in the things he daily read
And, as bein' strong on tonics, first the markets page he sought;
Then he read about the people who are sinful an' are caught,
'Bout the man that stole a million an' was laughin' at the Law,
While the chap that stole a dollar was digestin' in its maw.
Oh, he found a mental tonic I have never felt a doubt,
For he always read the papers—with the poetry left out.

He was yearnin' so for tonics that he scanned with eagle eye
Every item—they were plenty—'bout the folks who go awry,
'Bout the woman, heaven help her, who had left the narrow way Whence, of course, the men may wander, but the women should not stray,
'Bout the murder that the paper serves with several added thrills,
All about the things that mortals do to add unto their ills.
'Takin' of these mental tonics is our duty," he would shout,
So he always read the papers—with the poetry left out.

Had no time for readin' poems, so he said.
I don't condemn,
But I noticed that he also had no time for livin' them.
Had no time for seein' beauty on this planet grace-embossed,
For his eyes were on his pocket, lest a dollar should be lost.
Had no time for God-made music that the soul of man may heal,
For he only heard the roaring of great Traffic's mighty wheel.
Well, he's passed beyond the glamour of the tinsel-maddened rout,
And perhaps he's found a heaven—with the poetry left out.

A Talk With Both of Them.

She is just the sweetest and dearest and loveliest thing that ever came down the pike, isn't she, Leonard? And he is the noblest and bravest and finest creature that ever set a girl's heart to acting queerly, isn't he, Rebecca? To be sure, you both are, and you realized it that time when you said good night to each other on the front porch. So you are going to build a little nest, and the bird of love will fit to and fro about it, and oh, it will be perfectly heavenly to be there.

It is the old, old dream, children, and it is a poor specimen of a man or woman who remembers no time when such a dream glorified life and made it beautiful. Old and worn are we, but the memory of that dream lingers with us, and, remembering, we know that something divine has touched our sordid lives, making us but "a little lower than the angels" inasmuch as ours is the capacity to love and be loved.

So dream your dream, young people, and be glad for it, but remember, too, that the blessed nest to which you are looking forward will be feathered with human frailty. Rebecca is a dear girl, and Leonard is one of the best-meaning chaps in the world, but, dear, dear! the morning when we get out of the wrong side of the bed! And all of us will do it—even Rebecca and Leonard will. It is at such times that the little bird of love makes an excursion to some unseen place, and sometimes—ah, the sadness of it—it does not come back.

So when you go to the nest, children, do so ready and resolved to bear as much as the other one will have to bear, and even a little more. Do that and the bird will stay, for it likes right well to nest where the occupants cheerfully bear and forbear.

The Opinions of Rufus.

After sizin' it up quite a while I've 'bout made up my mind that the most unforfeited thing that can come to a feller in this world is to thoughtlessly s'lect the wrong pa' an' ma.

If I was a United Railroads employee, frinstance, I should feel mighty grateful that a man known by the company he keeps 'stead of by the company that keeps him.

Men 'bieved in an eternal hell till they found out that corporashuns have no souls. Since then they haven't taken much 'rest in it.

Don't be too certain that Ahmury's an angel, Jotham. If she was don't you reckon she could find some better business than marryin' you?

I 'pose the reason some women think their lovers are heroes is 'cause they can't imagine the dear men would marry them 'less they was.

It's a 's'prin' fact that the man that can drink or let it alone almost allers concludes to do the former.

I've heered say that a feller feelin' makes us wondrous kind, but I should think it must depend a good deal on what it is a feller's feelin'.

Praise is perfected out of the mouths of babes an' sucklins', but they's times, long 'bout 3 or 4 o'clock in the mornin', when the dear men would be willin' to git along with less sech praise.

Somebody said that patience an' perseverance 'll accomplish all things, but he wan't a married man.

If my Christian Scientific friends is right in claimin' that the inflammatory rheumatism that hit me last spring was only an evil thought, I hain't got nothin' to say 'cept that I never 'fore realized that I'm sech a hard thinker.

Thoughtful Man on the Situation.

"I represent the citizenry of San Francisco," the Thoughtful Man suddenly remarked. "I represent the noble laboring classes and other hoi polloi for whom the gallant Calhoun fought and bled, by proxy, when he choked the immortal life out of the street-car strike. I appeal to the splendid toilers and other rabble when I beg of them to vote for McCarthy and Fickert, or Crocker and Fickert, or Leland and—but when did I? Let them vote for them, and down the malignant Heney, that Business may survive. Let them swap horses while crossing the stream if Business is being drowned in the wagon."

"Sir, the divine form of Business here lies crushed in the dust and confetti. I say it with streaming tears, but it is none the less true that it is longer is safe here to be hid up for thousands in order to make millions. The underlying principle on which some of our great enterprises have prospered is threatened with eternal destruction. Ruf is in jail, except when they let him out, and Schmitz is paying the highest prices for lightning rods to place on the buildings in which the higher courts sit. The old, glad days when Business prospered and grafted with impunity are past. And it all is because of the odious Heney!"

"Rouse, ye Romans! Rouse, ye Slavs, and anybody else that has a vote! Have ye brave sons? Look in the next fierce hold-up to see them Heneyized. Have ye fair daughters? Let Fickert escort them home, for in some way Business must be rescued. Have ye unintelligent votes? Do them in for McCarthy, or Crocker will shove."

"Tis a time to get busy. The nefarious Heney must be downed, or, perhaps before we know it, the time will have arrived when Justice will interfere with Business and all will be lost."

With a business-like air the Thoughtful Man departed to find another person to unload himself upon.

The Strength to Bear.

Mine is the strength to do, my Lord,
Though scant its measure be;
To meet the needs my days record
The might exists in me.
'Tis not enough; e'er runs my prayer:
Not strength to do, but grace to bear.

I build a structure fair to see,
And in it I delight.
A wind blows from a mist-hid sea,
And lo, 'tis vanished quite.
All I had hoped lies buried there—
Lord, give me, then, the strength to bear.

I feel the pang of countless woes—
Ay, give me strength to bear—
The travail-cries and moans of those Who grapple with despair.
I may not aid; then be it so,
That I must feel and bear their woe

The patient One of Nazareth,
He served and bore for all—
"Ye, late hath triumphed over Death,"
God's high archangels call.
Ah, let me for my brothers care,
Forgetting self, their load to bear.

Fable of the Man Who Fell.

A certain man who had fallen into a great chasm was sadly bruised by his fall and cried piteously for assistance.

Thereupon another man came and lowered a rope to him, wherewith to draw him from the chasm.

But the chasm was deep, and the process of drawing the man from it was slow and laborious, and the sufferer wearied exceedingly.

"Hey!" he at length cried, "How long is this to continue? I am tired."

"So am I," his would-be rescuer responded, "but I am doing my best. I will get you out just as soon as I can."

"I don't like to dangle here," the sufferer replied. "It is tiresome, and it interferes with my business. I have a knife, and I have a great notion to cut the rope."

The would-be rescuer bowed his back to pull again, and then he responded:

"Well, of course you may cut it if you desire, but—"

Being occupied in pulling at the time, he did not continue the sentence.

Moral:—Of course San Franciscans could cut the rope that unites them to Francis J. Heney, but—Pessimist and Optimist.

A dreary, weary pessimist.

Of dreary, weary style.

Who sought disasters for his list

And ne'er was known to smile.

Where'er he went, where'er he did,

Would moan his cheerless lay.

Of exiled peace and joy forlorn,

Which ran about this way:

"Ods bodkins, oh! and heaps of woe!

All blessing has withstood me,

Forever here is grief and fear,

And nothing's as it should be."

Though birds might sing, the bright suns shine,

And flowers bloomed, he moaned his moan.

A merry, merry optimist

Of merry, merry mood,

Whose features wore a cheery twist,

As everybody's should.

Where'er he went took laughter, too,

Companion on his way.

And all the world the brighter grew

The while he sung his lay:

"Heighho, heighho! The world's aglow

With gladness all-caressing,

And though it needs our kindest deeds,

It gives them back in blessing."

One's world is wet, one's joy-impaired—

And yet it was the same old world.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Independent Republicans Hold Deciding Votes

The result of next Tuesday's election hinges upon the action of the independent Republicans, at least so far as the election of the mayor is concerned. The disposition of the other factions is this: The Democrats, and those who look to the Good Government League for advice are solid for Leland. Even the San Francisco Democratic Club, which first opposed Leland because of his friendship for McNab, have come into line for the party candidate. The more reputable "organization" Republicans will vote for Crocker. Perhaps half the union men will vote for McCarthy and the other half will probably divide naturally into Leland and Crocker followers from force of inherited Democratic or Republican tradition. McCarthy is sure of the tenderloin vote en masse. That, of itself, should drive every decent voter from him, but it won't.

McCarthy's Lavish Money Campaign

McCarthy is counting upon the ability of the Southern Pacific machine to keep its promises made on February 17th, and May 10th, to deliver the machine vote to him in return for his swinging the major vote to Charles Fickert for district attorney. He hopes also that the machine can swing to him the straight-line Republican vote, but this is a stubborn member, made up largely of bankers, professional men, and the like, to whom McCarthy's name is anathema. McCarthy is also relying largely upon the huge campaign fund which has made his candidacy twice as conspicuous as that of any other candidate on the city bill-boards, in costly silk banners in all the saloons, and by dozens of printed circulars mailed to every voter. He is spending not less than $50,000 on the campaign, and the commonest phrase in every group of men who discuss politics on the street is, "Where did he get it?" McCarthy's headquarters on Market street is the most elaborate in town, and a clerk in that office is authorized for the statement that "you don't have to ask if you can afford to do things; bills are OK'd for anything that looks as if it would help his campaign." McCarthy's statement that his entire fund was raised from the quarters and half-dollars of his union followers is unbelievable by anyone who has seen the evidence of prodigal expenditure from that fund.

Fickert's Unstable Creed of Faith

Charles M. Fickert, candidate against Francis J. Heney for district attorney, has been in a curious position throughout the campaign. From the day he asked for elocution lessons from a lady teacher in San Francisco and was rebuffed, and from the days just before he began his speech-making when he emulated Demosthenes by pitting his voice against the wind in the red rocks of the Santa Cruz mountains, Fickert has been balancing his oratory and his campaign on the two horns of a political dilemma, trying to seem loyal enough to Crocker, whom the machine that nominated Crocker and Fickert both has deserted, and trying also to elude his way into the Union Labor vote without becoming enthusiastic enough for McCarthy to queer himself with the more staid Republicans. The fact that he has at last been forced to throw his fortunes mainly with McCarthy, and the fact that he is a son-in-law of J. H. Wallace, of the department of maintenance and way of the Southern Pacific Company, lend more than a passing interest to the current belief that McCarthy made a deal with the Southern Pacific (which wants Fickert elected especially) and is now threatening to throw Fickert overboard if Fickert does not stand out plainly for McCarthy.

Heney's Candidacy The Biggest Issue

Heney's campaign has grown steadily in public interest and a strong interest in politics of optimism among his supporters is evindence that the reports of its effectiveness are encouraging. The comparison with his opponent is always in Heney's favor, and he makes friends at every public appearance. Below the surface even more powerful forces in his favor are at work. First is the silent moral purpose of the body of the people, who do not make campaign noise but who clearly see the moral issue involved in Heney's candidacy and are determined that he shall be continued in his task of regeneration. Second is the collapse of the "hurting business" buncombe, which has been punctured by its innate idiocy and buried forever by the enormous success of the Portola festival, indicating the rising wave of prosperity. Third is the growing consciousness amongst business men that a decent city is a more attractive place than one "corrupt and contented."

Leland's Growing Strength for Mayor

Of the candidates for mayor, Leland looms largest, for he is the only one of the three who has squarely faced the vital issues of the hour and placed himself irrefutably on record on the right side of those issues. Crocker and McCarthy have mouthed political catch-phrases while Leland has discarded lies and men. Leland's frankness has enlisted the hearty support of some of the best elements in the ranks of the Independent Republicans, and their public appearance on the platform in his behalf is having its effect upon the minds of the men whose votes it is unanimously conceded will decide the election. Mayor Taylor came out recently in a ringing speech in favor of Leland, and his influence is effective in a certain very desirable body of public opinion.

The Importance of Good Supervisors

In all the campaign a curious lack of interest has been shown in the candidates for supervisors. This is easily explained, but it is disquieting. The incumbent members who are candidates for re-election received the highest votes at the primary; and the public has been inclined to take for granted their success next Tuesday. This should not be. The success of the best candidates should be assured by earnest work, for upon the board will devolve the important financial problems of the prosecution of the municipal water supply, of the gas cases, and other vital public concerns. The California Weekly therefore reprints from last week its ticket of candidates for supervisors, and earnestly commends it to its readers:

Things That Lincoln Might Have Written

Andrew Farusest is an unlearned, unskempt and unpretentious as Abraham Lincoln ever was, and somehow, he has a Lincoln facility for putting things so plainly as to carry conviction to his every listener. Here are a few phrases of his that Lincoln might either have written or spoken, and there is little wonder that they hit the bull's eye every time:

"Whatever you believe when you are alone at night with the little imp of conscience seated on the bedpost, and whispering to you what to do, whatever you believe best for yourself and best for your city at that time, you do that thing and you won't be far wrong."

"Let us analyze this immunity business: When men commit bribery they won't do it where there are witnesses. If you want to catch them you have to get one to squeal, and in order to get one to squeal you have got to give that one immunity. That's common sense."

"Have you ever thought of the danger of putting a man like Fickert into office? If you put into office a man who will dismiss a case in which the evidence is so notorious as in the Calhoun case do you think that he will hesitate to prosecute an innocent poor man whom the men who put him there direct him to punish? On the one side in this fight is the prosecutor who will prosecute the rich man for his crimes—that's Heney. On the other side is the man who will dismiss—that's Fickert. Which do you want?"

Where in Lincoln's sayings will you find anything simpler, straighter, clearer than the foregoing sentences?

Senator Charles W. Bell There is talk in Southern California of running Senator Charles W. Bell, of Pasadena, for the Republican nomination for Secretary of State. He has not announced his candidacy and has not concluded to try for the nomination, but he has many friends who would like to see him shy his castor into the political arena for it. That he is a fit man for the place nobody who knows him questions, but he is not without a bit of political history and there is some question in some minds as to whether that history would militate against him. Four years ago he was a candidate before the thirty-sixth senatorial district convention for the nomination for state senator. Walter Parker controlled the convention and programmed it for another man and Bell was beaten. There was great dissatisfaction in Pasadena when the Parker candidate nominated and Bell was persuaded to run independently. He did so and the Democratic convention endorsed his candidacy. He was triumphantly elected over the regular, Parker, Republican state organization's nominee. The indication was to great to be forgiven when Senator Bell reached the state capital he found that he had been read out of the Republican party. He was not admitted to the Republican caucus and everything possible was done to make him feel that he had been cast into outer darkness. Of course Parker holds his own conventions and his own candidates and passes the word down the line to support Democratic nominees every now and again, but that is different. It is no sin for an "organization" man to bolt an "organization" nomination, but for a free man to do it is treason. Many are wondering if this event in Senator Bell's political life will hurt him much before the rank and file of his party. Why should it?

Be Careful About Signing Those Nomination Papers

The Special Verification of Candidates act is abroad in the land. He is a new creation in the political world and he owes his multitudinous existence to the new direct primary law. His office is to go about among the busy unwary and hook them fast to the political ambitions of men for whom the aforesaid busy unwary do not care a snap of their fingers. Many are falling into the trap head over heels, because of their habit of signing all petitions presented, rather than muster the resolution to say, "No, not on your life." These Special Verification deputies are hired by the candidates. Their strong suit is sagacity, which they employ in hooking the right men to their respective candidates, just as they would do in starting off a subscription paper, a campaign for selling books, life insurance, or any old thing. If the right men can be gotten to head the list the rest will follow. The law does not allow an elector to sign the nomination paper of more than one candidate for the same office and when one does sign such a paper he must swear, with his hand lifted to his heaven, that he intend to support for such nomination the candidate named herein." Therefore be careful not to sign any nomination paper unless the candidate named on it is clearly your man, a man whom you can afford to stand by through thick and thin until the primary ballots are counted. This is no perfunctory matter. It is at the heart of good citizenship.

Some Smart Politics In Nomination Papers

It comes to the Watchman as a rather straight tip that one H. S. Morrow, of San Diego, believed to be the Gillett candidate for Secretary of State (and known to be a protégé of Walter Parker), has already put into the field certain Special Verification deputies. These deputies are carefully selected and are doing good work for Mr. Morrow and his candidacy. They have had the assurance to make a special effort to obtain the signatures of Lincoln-Roosevelt Republicans to Mr. Morrow's nomination papers, and they have met with a distressing degree of success. They have booked a number of very, excellent names, names that will do to conjure with. Of course they are not taking all from this class, but "a right are smart sprinkling" of them, enough to make it appear that progressive Republicans are just as well satisfied with a Gillett man as with any other and that they are willing to take hold with Walter Parker to make up a ticket to be presented to Republican voters for their adoption. Now the primary election of 1910 is likely to be THE election of that year, unless the Republican ticket proves to be the rawest ever. So it behooves every Republican to have a care as to what candidates he helps to offer to the people, and progressive Republicans are very unlikely to find any candidate acceptable who is backed by either Governor Gillett or Walter Parker. Candidate nomination papers may easily be made into a trap which the busy unwary set for themselves, get into of themselves, and catch a fine assortment of political idiots. Therefore have a care.

Rattle-Dazzled At Palo Alto San Francisco is not the only place where original sin has sought to make illicit use of the initiative and referendum. Palo Alto also is sitting in consternation because of the use that may be made of these engines of reform. Palo Alto has a new charter with all the modern conveniences, including initiative, referendum and recall. It also has a new ordinance abolishing slot machines. A friend to the machines cautiously felt around to see if he might be able to have the issue submitted to a referendum vote and found that he might. Those who wanted the machines back jumped at it as a drowning man at a straw, as being the only possible hope in sight, although faint indeed. Others signed the petition in the belief that it is good to have the people legislate directly upon such issues, others in the belief that once the people of Palo Alto got a chance to vote on the issue the slot machines would be killed so dead that they would never know what hit them. Well, the petitions were signed and presented to the city board of trustees, received and favorable action taken. Then it was discovered that the charter provided that, in such cases, the ordinance on which appeal is taken to the people shall be suspended in the operation until the next general election. The children of darkness were wiser than the children of light and the slot machines are likely to click as lively at Palo Alto as elsewhere until the next general election comes around. This may not give them more than a year of life, but in common with other criminals, slot machines are duly thankful for a reprieve that will last even for a year.

FIRST OIL WELL IN 1859.

That the first oil well in the world was sunk only fifty years ago was brought forcibly to notice the latter part of August by the celebration of the event at Titusville, Pa., says Popular Mechanics. The qualities of petroleum had been known for centuries, but the first artesian well to be sunk in its search was the venture of Col. Edwin W. Drake near Titusville, August 28, 1859. On that date the drill tapped a vein of oil which lay seventy feet below the surface, and the result was forty barrels a day.

"What's the difference between a suffragist and a suffragette, as you understand it?"
"Ever see anybody handling hogs?"
"I have. What has that got to do with it?"
"Well, a suffragist would call the hogs to dinner; a suffragette would drive them. Know hogs?"
"Yes."
"Well!"

"Do you know what is the line of grace?"
"The curved line, of course."
"Well, hardly! I guess you haven't seen Grace lately."

Hichborn's History

So many applications have come to The California Weekly for copies of Franklin Hichborn's

"STORY OF THE CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE OF 1909,"

that we have arranged to take orders for this valuable book and fill them directly from our office, either in person or by mail. The regular trade edition is $125, post paid.

Mr. Hichborn's book should be in the hands of every person who desires to gain an interior view of the government of California AS IT IS, and the function of legislation AS IT IS PERFORMED session after session under our very eyes.

Having resided at the state capital and attended upon legislative sessions for a number of years, Mr. Hichborn has had unusual opportunities for getting close up to the true inwardness of things legislative and he deals with his subject in entire frankness.

No better volume could be put into the hands of a young man preparing himself for citizenship and for doing his part in making political conditions better than they are.

HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER IN CALIFORNIA

V. . HOW SHALL THE INDUSTRY BE REGULATED IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST?
By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

The preceding articles in this series have described the magnitude of the hydro-electric power industry in California, the tendencies toward monopoly through physical limitations and through the amalgamation of corporations, the relation of the Southern Pacific Company to the control of a large proportion of possible power sites, and the federal regulations as applied within the national forests.

The article, that follows is not descriptive. Its purpose is to open a discussion of the problem of government regulation, and to leave the subject for the reader's mind to work upon. This problem is not yet solved. It will soon be a matter of concern, as it is already a national issue in congress, and as it will soon become a state issue in the legislature.

Scope of Federal Regulation.

The scope of federal regulation was fairly well covered in the preceding article of this series. But certain questions have been asked in connection with that regulation, one of which should be repeated here: How does the federal government propose to protect the ultimate consumer of hydro-electric power from extortion?

In three ways. The forest service requires every power company operating in a national forest to apply for a permit, of which the following is Clause 19:

If any of the works for which permit is hereby applied for shall be owned, leased, trusted, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever so that they form part of, or in any way effect, any combination or are in any way connected with any combination in the form of any unlawful trust, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy or in restraint of trade with foreign nations or between two or more states or territories or within any one state or territory, by the generation, distribution of electric energy, the permit hereby applied for shall be forfeited to the United States by proceedings instituted by the attorney-general of the United States in the courts for that purpose."

It will be observed that the national government here goes to the extent of declaring that a power company operating under a permit from the national government shall abide by the regulations the government imposes or forfeit the permit; and that permit prohibits monopoly and the restraint of trade within any one state as well as between any two states, and this prohibition extends to the sale as well as to the generation and distribution of electric power. The language is certainly explicit, and it if means anything it means that the national government reserves the right to permit a power company to license its practice extortion upon its customers.

A Second Guarantee.

The second guarantee of protection to the consumer is Clause 19 of the same form of permit, which reads:

"The permittee shall, except when prevented by the act of God or the public enemy or by unavoidable accidents or contingencies, continuously operate for the generation of electric energy the works to be constructed under the permit hereby applied for, in such manner as to generate after such generation begins, not less than the following percentages of the full hydraulic capacity of the said works measured in Kilowatt-hours: (here naming the percentages required).

This clause prevents a common form of extortion practiced by public service corporations, viz: the reduction of expenses by the reduction of output together with increased charges upon those consumers who are still served. It also protects a consumer from discrimination in the receipt of power when necessary for his use.

The third guarantee of protection to the consumer is supplied by clause 20:

"The permit hereby applied for shall cease and be void upon the expiration of fifty years from the date of approval hereof, but it may then be renewed in the discretion of the duly authorized officer or agent of the United States upon such conditions as he may in his discretion fix. Provided, that such officer or agent, in fixing such conditions, shall consider the actual value at that time for power and all other purposes of the lands and rights of way within National Forests occupied and used under the permit hereby applied for and the actual value at that time of all improvements lawfully made by the permittee within national forests under the permit hereby applied for, but neither the property of the permittee, if any, outside of national forests, nor the permit, franchises, bonds, capital stock, or other securities of the permittee shall be considered in fixing such conditions."

This clause protects the consumer against the operation of a very much more common practice of public service corporations, viz: (ignoring the value of such assets as a franchise (which the public owns and lends to the company) as if it were a part of the company's own cash investment in the business, upon which it is entitled to earn interest by charging the public that much more for services.

This clause further protects the consumer by limiting the life of the company's franchise to fifty years, making impossible the perpetuation of abuses of corporate power if they should arise.

But a very large proportion of the power sites in California are not in the national forests, and the companies that develop these sites will do so under the sole authority of the state laws. It is, therefore, important to learn the status of power companies under state law, especially because a considerable number of people, led by Congressman Samuel H. Baker of Berkeley, are trying to oust the national government of all authority to regulate power companies and to throw the whole burden of this task on the state government.

No California Law.

California has no laws regulating hydro-electric power companies specifically. The Australian commonwealth of Victoria has such a law; Oregon, with one-third the population and one-tenth the wealth of California, has such a law; California, which was the pioneer of the world in the modern utilization of hydro-electric power, has none, because the political powers in control of California have wanted none. They have preferred to be a law unto themselves.

The appropriations of water by electric power companies in California have all been made under a water law passed in 1872, framed to suit the conditions existing in the days of hydraulic mining and the first application of water to irrigation. Even to provide against the contingencies that arose under the later development of irrigation this law was inadequate, as is proved by its history of the irrigation communities—a history of interminable and extravagant litigation. Such a law is certainly inadequate to meet the contingencies of the vaster development of water uses for electric generation. An echo of the old lawsuits and a premonition of the new kind of suit is impending is picked offhand from this morning's San Francisco Chronicle:

"Redding, Oct. 25.—The most important water suit ever coming to trial in Shasta county was begun this morning in the superior court. The suit is between the Northern California Power Company and twenty farmers and others claiming water in North Battle creek, in the neighborhood of Shingletown.

"The stream carries ordinarily 5,000 inches of water. The many claimants have had a great deal of trouble among themselves. Injunctions have been obtained from time to time, and in several instances dams have been blown out with dynamite.

"In the main the big suit begun today is a friendly one, its object being to have the court pass finally upon the priority of the various claims and determine judicially the exact amount of water each one is entitled to. Because of electric power development every inch of water in North Battle creek is worth $100. So the property interest represented in the suit over the 5,000 inches is $500,000."

State Water Law.

The substance of the water law of 1872 can be given in a paragraph: The right to the use of running water flowing in a river or stream or down a canyon or ravine may be acquired by appropriation, which appropriation must be for a beneficial use and is valid only to the extent to which its use is beneficial; as between appropriators, the first in time is the first in right; to appropriate water, the claimant must post a notice, at the point of intended diversion, stating how much water he claims and how and to what point he intends to carry it, and he must record a copy of the notice with the county recorder of the county in which the place of diversion lies; the appropriator must begin within sixty days either to construct his proposed works or to make the necessary preliminary surveys, and he must use due diligence in prosecuting the works to completion.

That is practically the whole law of California on water rights. Under it, the other day, one power company claimed practically all the water of a whole river in northern California. Under it practically all the best (not all, but all the best) power sites in California have long since been claimed by the Shasta claim, that have no idea of beginning bona fide construction work in sixty days, or sixty months, for that matter. The Pacific Light and Power Company, of Los Angeles, has twenty such sites in the Sierras; the Southern Pacific Company has claimed in the Sierras. These sites are held because they will be valuable some day and because somebody else will get them if they are not now filed on. But they are clearly not held legally, or, if legally, on the baldest kind of technical stretching of the clear intent of the law. They are so held successfully largely by virtue of the power of bluff; if anybody else tried to get them for immediate development, these companies would make a show of active development and "law" their adversary to death.

State Unprepared.

These facts suggest a doubt as to the immediate expediency of thrusting upon a state so poorly prepared to meet it all the responsibility of legislating for the regulation of tremendous businesses with complex rights and strange new problems. They suggest that a different turn of mind might incline to leave the national government alone in its task of regulating the minority of companies under its present jurisdiction, if only that the state may profit by the nation's errors as well as by the very large amount of study and preliminary work which the forest service has already applied to the solution of these problems.

There is another point that makes it worth considering how the state shall do its share of the regulating. This is the possibility that a mere act of congress may not be sufficient to oust the national government from the right to regulate some, at least, of the power companies; and, if it is not sufficient, many problems arising out of conflicts of state and national jurisdiction must be thought out.

That congress may run into the constitution of the United States in any effort to restrain the forest service is suggested by the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has held, in the case of the California Debris Commission, that the constitutional authority vested in the national government to control commerce extends beyond the control of navigable rivers to the control of the tributaries of those rivers wherever any interference with those tributaries affects the navigability of the rivers to which they flow. The storage of water in clearly such artificial interference with the water supply of the navigable San Joaquin and Sacramento rivers, and friends of conservation, even President Taft himself, have suggested the possibility of this fact being sufficient ground for the exercise of federal authority over electric power companies.

Possible Conflicts of Jurisdiction.

Supposing this possible extension of federal power should come about, certain power companies would still be outside its operation and solely under state law. But most of them would be under national jurisdiction. Suppose the national permit fixed maximum rates that might be charged to a consumer, say $5 a day in a certain case. Suppose the state law fixed $4 a day as the maximum rate for the same service? Could the company appeal from the state law to the nation for the right to collect the $1 difference?

Thousand variations, in rates and other features of service, would undoubtedly arise under such a conflict of jurisdiction, and a practicable state law must provide against them.

This fact, and two or three points raised above, indicate the necessity of thought upon this subject by the people of California. Their main interest is to prevent monopoly and extortion. The state law leaves them defenseless, and must be revised in the public interest. The national example only partially protects the public. State and nation must somehow come into agreement before the shadow of monopoly becomes a fact of vested right.

Laws of Other Commonwealths.

Two examples, cited above, are worth study: the examples of Victoria and Oregon. Regarding the first, I quote from an article by Charles Edward Wright, assistant attorney to the Secretary of the Interior, published in the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, for May, 1909, as follows:

"No one (in Victoria, Australia) may permanently divert water; a license is granted for a limited period. And no diversion is free. Every user pays for what he uses, the charges being apportioned to the amount diverted and the value of the diversion to the user. For the development of hydro-electric power, for instance, the annual charge is about five dollars per H. P. A large revenue is thus produced, relieving the general taxpayer. The justice of this plan is apparent; he who enjoys pays therefor, and he who has an equal right in the water but cannot use it, is indirectly the beneficiary of the rental paid by the user; for general taxation is reduced. Moreover, the user has an economic reason for avoiding waste; he must pay for what he diverts. Every user is a conservator. During the last decade there has not been a single lawsuit over water rights in Victoria. Furthermore, the commonwealth reserves the right at any time to apply the water to a paramount use whenever the necessity arises. Naturally there are no 'vested rights' to figure largely in the matter of compensation. There is no such thing as a riparian right in this progressive British colony. On substantially all streams a frontage from four to eight rods is reserved to the public. This solves the pollution problem and in other ways simplifies the conservation of the public's rights in the water."

The Oregon law limits the life of a franchise to forty years (ten years less than the forest service permits); it makes the annual charge for power developed 75 cents per 1,000 kilowatt hours as against the maximum 32½ cents of the forest service, and 9.3 cents per 1,000 kilowatt hours as against the minimum 2½ cents of the forest service. Or, for purposes of comparison with the Victoria law ($5 per kilowatt hour for horsepower), the Oregon law provides a sliding scale of charges from 25 cents minimum to $5 maximum per horsepower per year; but the Oregon law puts this charge on the theoretical capacity of the water "appropriated" and the head "available," no on the amount of water or head "utilized." This makes the charge proportionately larger, because the company loses whatever is lost through loss of head in canals and pipes and loss of energy in the process of generation.

New York has a law, which has been in operation for three or four years, and this example should be studied, but the reports of the Public Utilities Commission for the Second District of New York are not at this time accessible to the writer, so it is merely suggested to the interested reader that they contain matter that will throw light on the subject.

To conclude: Regulation of hydro-electric power companies in the public interest is an issue in this state today, and it behooves every citizen to acquaint himself with the facts so that he may use his influence intelligently for the common good. If this article has opened two or three lines of thought upon the subject its purpose is served. State, or national, regulation? Or both? And what sort of regulation? And in whose interest?

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

By a vote of 349 to 27, people in the vicinity of Oatland, last Saturday, decided to organize an irrigation district.

About one-third of the village of Moron, not far from Bakersfield, was destroyed by fire last week. The loss amounted to about $35,000, with small insurance.

Mrs. Mahala Oliver, of Orland, Glenn county, celebrated her one-hundred-and-first birthday recently.

Coalinga has a new daily paper, the Times, of which Jess D. Pritchard is editor and W. B. Perry manager.

The first shipment of oranges—a carload—from this state this season was made from Fair Oaks, near Sacramento, about a week ago. It was about six weeks in advance of Southern California shipments.

A plant for the manufacture of cream of tartar from grape pomace is to be erected in Victor, San Joaquin county.

Indications are that about 30,000 acres in the Imperial valley will be planted to cotton next year, experiments having demonstrated that the plant can be grown successfully there.

Chapter XXIII. OTHER BONDS.

THE Day of Deliverance for the "Sandlapper" district was now far spent, but there were some hours remaining before the "greatest display of fireworks ever witnessed in the Upper San Joaquin valley" was to be made, for the rejoicing people had poured into the treasury of the celebration committee whatever remained of their store of cash after the taxes had been paid. It was at the moment of this intervening rest period that certain carriages took the dusty road in a speeding procession toward the west.

Leading the way was a smart carriage pulled eagerly along by two horses that had earned honorable reputation under the saddle, for Roanoke and Peacock had been broken to trot in double harness in advance of their respective owners, yet not without a protest which required the best of Gabriel's horsemanship to overcome, for were they not running horses, and shall a running horse be put in harness and made to trot like another? They had less reason to protest than they knew, for other horses, raced off their feet, have spent their declining days as cart horses, while these had been cared for as tenderly, now that their racing days were over, as though they were in preparation for some supreme event on the track.

Following came Silas Singham and his carry-all filled with the brim with his family, save that the eldest daughter rode ahead with Gabriel. And then came Moses Brayton and his patient wife in their carriage drawn by a span of swift-footed mules that would go more miles in a day, and fewer in an hour, than any of them. The children carry-all was tired but happy, the children singing and Silas positively glowing with enthusiasm. In the Brayton carriage there was silence, scarcely a word being spoken between husband and wife during the ten-mile drive. The patient mother was thoughtful for her son, but scarcely did the father husband wonder she could "make out" with less divination this time than ordinarily. She knew, though, that he was "having it out" with himself and that it were best to leave him undisturbed.

Then followed two or three carriages filled with intimate friends, and, in one of them, rode a minister. The hauling of the grain crop to town, lately completed, had cut the roads up badly and, though they had been straved liberally from the stubble fields, the passengers were well peppered with dust by the time they reached the Singham homestead, for the rains of the fall had not yet begun. However, a shaking of skirts and coats and a liberal threshing with turkey-feather dusters restored the company to acceptable Tulare presentability and they were soon made at home on the garden lawn, for, although past the middle of October, it was still out-of-door weather.

"Mr. Brayton, how would you like to drive over with me to Section Ten?" asked Silas Singham as he extended to the river man and his wife the heartiest possible greeting. "The women folks will have their place in their possession for a while and there will be time enough to look about a bit. That son of yours is a wonder."

Brayton assented and the carry-all rattled along the half mile of roadway between the two houses at a general wobble. Moses Brayton had not set foot upon Section Ten in the two and a half years that had intervened since he had quitted it to his son. He had driven by often enough on his way to his lake ranch, and it was surmised that he had seen what was going on in a general way out of the corners of his eyes, but if he had he had not "let on" to his son, or to anyone else, what he thought of what the faddist was doing. To-day he was forced to see all or provoke a breach of the peace and he submitted.

Singham directed the irrigated lands, showing with pride he could not have betrayed had the possession been his own, how admirably the land had been prepared for irrigation and what a splendid stand of alfalfa had been obtained. Then came the grain field with its thick stubble, showing the results of intensive plowing, harrowing and rolling; the reservoir and pump irrigation system, the cow barn with its stanchions and cemented trenches, cleaned in half an hour every morning until as sweet as a spring morning; the compost heap under a roof and screened in to avoid the breeding of flies, the milk room and butter factory with refrigeration system, the pasture field with hay racks, the silo just filled for the first time, the herd of dairy cows, not as well bred as it was destined to become, and the calf pasture filled with promise for a year or two later. Then came the young orchard and vineyard, spick and span ready for the founding of a new family.

Throughout the excursion the enthusiasm of Singham for the accomplishments of the son of the other was so genuine and overflowing, and he himself was talking so incessantly, that he barely noticed that his companion barely grunted a word of appreciation now and again, and seemed much of the time lost in far-away thoughts, but, at all events, there had been no note of discord, no betrayal of ill-humor, nothing more disagreeable than an impenetrable reserve.

The shadows were lengthening and the women folks had all things nearly ready for the crowning event of the day when Silas and his companion returned from their tour of inspection of Section Ten, and, for the first time in his life, Moses Brayton passed through the swinging gate and to the lawn at the Singham homestead.

It was a simple ceremonial, this union of two schoolmates in bonds of wedlock under a floral marriage bell suspended from a limb which overspread a corner of the lawn. It was a sun-tanned but comely pair that plighted their marriage vows, the groom standing six feet, broad and deep of chest, with muscled shoulders making his coat fall clear of his body; bride nearly able to stand under his outstretched arm, clean limbed and lithe. Did their minds run back to that day in the road when the water wagon left a gurgling trail in the dust all the way to the corner of Brayton's river ranch?

Then followed the wedding feast on the long tables at the foot of the lawn under the umbrella trees. The day's doings had whetted the appetite beyond the satisfaction of a mid-day lunch, either from baskets fetched from home, or from the less tidy, if more ample, barbecue tables where the crowd ate out of hand and standing. Even Moses Brayton so far lost his reserve as to participate with unstinted relish.

Just how the culminating incident chanced is not clear. Somebody blundered. Down toward the middle of the table there had been a discussion of some event of the day and a woman's voice rang out clear with, "Why, that is as great a mystery as to who it was that rang the school house bell the last time the Brayton cattle came into the settlement!"

There was consternation on every countenance and Helen fairly whitened under her dark skin as she cast a furtive glance across the table to her father-in-law. He caught the glance and understood her trepidation, and he seemed to be the only person at the table at all at ease.

"Why, is that still a mystery over here?" he asked. "I gave that son of mine the only cowhiding he ever got from me on suspicion that he was the right one and I have never seen any reason to doubt that I caught the guilty party."

"You did that!" Helen exclaimed, turning to her embarrassed husband, "Why, you never told me!"

"You never told me that you rode all the way to the Half Acre at dead of night to pull the wire that set off the bomb that blew the dam out of the river, but I found it out next morning," was the reply.

"And saved me, just as likely as not," said Silas Singham, slowly and with a choke in the throat, "from being a murderer! It was well enough that I did not find out then who did it, for I might have rawnhided you, too, but how did you keep it to yourself all these years?"

"By saying nothing about it, Papa, that's how," was the reply. "It was a long and lonesome ride, no mistake. When I heard the cry of the lynx from the swamp I thought my blood had turned to ice water, but when, after scratching in the sand under the willow for the wire that connected with the trigger for my fingers bled, my courage almost failed me, and, when the thing did go off, I did not know for sure that I wasn't killed until Roanoke and I had struck the main road on our way home."

"I thought you must have left in a hurry," observed Gabriel.

"How did you make that out?" was the reply.

"Because you left the prettiest pair of shoe tracks that ever was on the bank of the river where you settled down to dig for the wire. I had to cover them up for you or you were dead away. It was not until I saw those that I understood how to account for Roanoke's swinging gallop along that road as Clay Babe and I went along it the next morning. By the way, I have kept that wire and a fragment of the pistol it was attached to over home to this day."

"You seem to be a precious pair," declared Moses Brayton, half jokingly, "and, while you are confessing, I'd like to have someone tell me who it was that threw the cartridges all out of my rifle and saved me, too, from being a murderer. I don't know just as much like being one as ever a man could."

"I could not well do less for her father than she had done for mine, could I, Dad?" was Gabriel's response.

"Well, you are indeed a precious pair, as my friend Brayton says," declared Silas Singham, betraying emotion that he made little effort to conceal. "A precious pair, indeed! God bless you, both of you. I don't know what the last ten years would have been like without you."

"I do," said Moses Brayton, rising to his feet. "I can tell you exactly what they would have been like, and Silas Singham, one or the other of you would have been a murderer and either dangled from a gallows until he was dead or, what would have been worse, lived in a cell in a prison clad in stripes while the other rotted in his grave. That is what the last ten years would have been like if these children of ours had not saved us from ourselves, and I want to add my 'God bless them!' to yours."

"I have been wrong, awfully wrong, all along," continued Brayton, "but I never understood it clearly until I heard what you said from the speaker's stand at Tulare to-day. I know that you must have done it the first time I, to-day, heard the call of the dry land for rivers of water, and, for the first time, I have felt the justness of that call. You have shown me to-day on my own son's ranch, a ranch my spirit of bitterness toward you has heretofore kept me from visiting, because I blamed you for its loss to me—you have shown me what the plain and the river married together can bring forth. For the first time I can see the possible orchards and farms, the homes with houses full of happy children, and I know that you have been right. Those waters must somehow be distributed over adjacent lands as far as they will go and, from this time on, I am willing to help. It has seemed to me till now that you were trying to take my property away from me in order to build up yours, and in defense of my property I have been willing enough, if need be, to kill or to be killed."

"It is not as easy for me to do right as it is for you, Silas Singham. Your hot head may carry you into wrong paths, but you can and will think better of it when your hot head has cooled. I can hate with deliberation, premeditation, malice. If I have not taken your life before now, as I have had a hundred chances to take it, it was neither for your sake nor for mine, but for my wife's. God knows I have given her enough to bear without that! Only my love for her, and for our Helen whom we buried, has prevented my becoming a criminal in fact as well as in heart. The fights I have had with myself out under those oaks in the back pasture! Many a time the weight of a feather would have turned the scale the other way."

"As for that boy of mine, the night he turned traitor to my interests, and forewarned you 'sandlappers' of the coming of my cattle, as I next morning made sure he had done, I washed my hands of him. I was proud enough of him at that time, but not until this day and this hour have I loved him as a father should. Now I do. Son, give me your hand. I want you to come over home sometimes and teach Dad how to make a farm out of that river ranch. Daughter, give me yours. You look as if you had with yourself, or might have looked if she had lived, and I could love you for that if for nothing more. Mr. Singham, give me yours. I accept the designation of 'friend.' Bear with me, all of you. I can't be other than I am except that I will cherish ill-will toward you, any of you no longer, and am ready to take hold and help try to make this a bit of God's country. I was wrong when I thought that a cattle range was best."

The strain upon the little company at dinner had been tense beyond expression, and when the handshaking at the head of the table had ended, and Helen had arisen from her place and thrown her arms about the neck of the father and then around the neck of the father of her husband, handclapping broke the stillness right heartily. When this had subsided the minister from town, at the psychological moment, rose in his place and offered prayer for the people in the "sandlapper" irrigation district, for the union of these two families in a mutuality of respect and confidence, for the blessings of the waters upon the soil and the fruition of the efforts to be made to establish a new Eden there in Enterprise district. Finally, that the souls of men might cease to wander in dry places but seek after God and the peace that passeth understanding, even as the hart panteth after the water brooks.

The shadows of night were now gathering and if the fireworks were to be seen in their splendor the horses must be thrown in harness again and driven to town. Half an hour later the procession of carriages started, a very happy bride and groom leading the way, and, as they reached the edge of town, the first rockets shot into the sky.

And from that day to this a new spirit has characterized the "Sandlapper" district. Having learned through tribulation how to pull together for a common cause the people have kept on pulling together. Their amity and enterprise have attracted new people to the country. Dairying has become a dominant industry and "Section Ten" butter still has the call of the Los Angeles market. There are small voices in the Bungalow and seldom a Sunday passes that Grandpapas Brayton and Singham do not sit out to vie with each other in spoiling the children. Farmers still come from far and near to learn how to meet problems from this "farmer of fads and fancies," whose bank account grows the fastest, and whose automobiles makes about the quickest time of any on the road.

Roanoke and Peacock, pensioned in rich pasture for good, they have done, much like young colts until they are then, with necks crossed, fight flies in fence corners, living over the while victories won in by-gone days.

The End.

HARRIMAN'S SUCCESSOR.

A new figure has come into the domain of American activities, to dominate in the great transportation field, the master of many thousands of men and whose word carries with it an authority more far reaching than that of the Czar, says an Eastern exchange. As the head of the colossal combination of railroads, known as the Harriman system, Judge Robert S. Lovett challenges world interest. He is the apotheosis of American opportunity.

A farmer's son, born in Texas, he has, at the age of 49 years, stepped into the very forefront of the world's affairs.

He is among those, the pride of American story, who have, step by step, made their way to position and power. A graduate from the plains of Texas he is the central factor in the nation's activities. His rise has not been phenomenal.

This Titan in a world's affairs grew into the conditions by which he was surrounded and mastered them. His rise finds its counterpart in the story of Lincoln, of Garfield, Grant, only with this difference, the political career offers easier advancement than the way along the lanes paved by capital. Eloquence and personality are the factors in politics. They do not figure where capital dominates.

The financial activities permit of no errors, mistakes of judgment or the failings of humanity. It is a school that is harsh and unsympathetic, yet the successor to Harriman in his face shows that his character has passed through the ordeal with its sympathies as deep as they were in boyhood when he toiled on his father's farm. His head is molded to the judicial form and his manners and executive ability are portrayed by his massive forehead and clear-cut features. His brown eyes are clear and penetrating and display interest in everything that comes within the focus of their glance.

He is physically a large man, standing fully six feet, with broad shoulders and of athletic form. He appears to be the personification of health and activity and though at the turn of fifty his hair is untouched by the frosting of time.

He is reserved in manner, though he possesses a personality that courts approach, and he displays keen interest in conversation and at times the lines at his mouth and a twinkle in his eye give evidence that he is inclined to appreciate the humorous side of life. He is deliberate in his answers. It is "yes," or "no" as soon as he has given the case momentary consideration. Judge Lovett is not affected by success. His habits are simple and he dresses in modest form. His voice is soft, though every word is littered with decision and bears the tone of authority.

The new railroad factor shuns personal publicity.

He is not unlike his predecessor, E. H. Harriman, in his earlier years. The railroad magnate then preceded the newspaper interviewers, but the latter made them his confidants and had among them many of his most ardent admirers and in some cases advisers as to the tendency of conditions. Judge Lovett realizes his responsibilities. He has the determination, coupled with the desire, to do what is right by the great interests he controls and the public whom he serves.

In his first interview after his promotion to wield the power of Harriman he declined to talk on the problems that confronted him, but remarked:

"The people will judge me by my acts."

He is intensely American and his thorough knowledge of and acquaintance with the national domain enables him to keep in touch with every feature of the great railroad system under his control. Coming out of the great mass of American people he is in complete harmony with their needs and ambitions.

He does not figure as a "Wall street man." He does not accord in early training or later experiences with the speculative feature of railroading. His early training on his father's farm in the then wilds of Texas gave him a wholesome view of life.

For a time he found employment at the town of Shepard, near his parents' home, as a clerk in a general merchandise store, for which service he was paid $2.50 a week. In that position he had to make frequent trips in the store wagon to the little depot to get the consignments of merchandise to his employer. That gave him his interest in railroading and he secured a position as station agent at the town for the Hudson East and West Texas Railway, which was afterward merged into the Harriman system.

Serving here for a time he removed to Houston, where he became a clerk in the general freight office under C. B. Urell. While a clerk in Houston young Lovett studied law in his spare hours and upon admission to the bar he resigned his position in the railroad freight office and became a member of the law firm of which then Congressman Charles Stewart was the head.

Shortly afterward he was appointed as one of the attorneys for the railroad on which he had commenced his career as a clerk and was remarkably successful in defending the cases which were brought against his client. The company having gone into insolvency he was chosen by the receivers to aid in straightening out its affairs and had his office at Nacogdoches.

His achievements in this direction earned for him promotion to the post of chief counsel, with headquarters at Houston. He then became assistant general counsel for the Texas Pacific Railroad and later was made general counsel for the road.

At this time he entered into a legal copartnership forming the firm of Baker, Botts, Baker & Lovett. His great achievement was the merging of the Houston and Texas Central roads into the Southern Pacific system, which brought him to the notice of Harriman.

The latter made him president of the road on which as a boy he had started his career in life as station agent in a remote country town. From that time on he was frequently consulted by Harriman in matters involving corporation and railroad law and finally the then railroad king found his services at hand essential to his interests and he was induced to remove to New York. For the two years prior to his death Harriman leaned upon the Texas lawyer. He entrusted him with every secret and until the very day of his death Harriman referred every detail of his vast interests to Judge Lovett. When it came to confiding those interests to other hands there was no one more intimately acquainted with Harriman's masterful plans and ultimate policies than the Texas lawyer. It was to him those concerned looked and trusted when the great railroad chieftain passed away. He has now taken up the work of Harriman and in his own words—

"The public will judge me by my acts."

TO PROTECT THE BIRDS.

The National Association of Audubon Societies has issued a circular letter to all the granges advocating a revision of the bird laws in this country for the protection of the birds and the benefit of the farmers. The letter reads:

"If the bird laws are to be improved, it can only be done through the powerful influence of the grangers, who are more deeply interested than any class of citizens. Every bird that is wastefully destroyed means loss of money to the agriculturists of New York. The millinery trade does not wish the bird laws changed; it fights every attempt to improve them."

"Have you ever contrasted the relative size of the two interests—millinery and agriculture? If not, carefully examine the following figures taken from the last United States census report (1900):

"Capital invested in the millinery (wholesale and retail) business in New York state, $11,805,220.

"Capital invested in agriculture in New York state,

"Land, $551,174,220.

"Farm buildings, $337,000,000.

"Total, $888,174,220.

"There are 226,720 farms in the state. Almost 250,000 families depend on the products of these farms."

"There are 22,648,109 acres in these farms; every acre harbors swarms of insect and rodent pests that destroy crops, entailing enormous losses annually."

SAN FRANCISCO.

By Otto E. A. Schmidt.

(For The California Weekly.)

Born of the sea! When first Balboa's startled gaze

Enraptured scanned the broad and placid flood

Whence art thou sprung—a regal parent-hood!

He thought recked of thee beyond the northern haze.

A naked babe that smiling sprawled on shifting sands

And Time struck many a chord on History's lute

Ere yet thou heardest thereof a single note,
Nor bore the winds thy faintest lisp to other lands.

The wandering children of the wild their rude abodes

Here reared, left mountain-stream and gloomy wood

To break thy long and lonely solitude
With mystic rites and plaintive prayers to myriad gods.

Until the eager hither-stumbling padre came—
Anon beneath his earnest touch arose

The humble mission hamlet, thy swaddling clothes—

And christened thee that sweet forgotten childhood name.

Thou heardest his droning orisons arise by day.

The music of sweet chiming at vesper hour,
Nor dreamed the coming richness of thy dower

As slipped the happy years of careless youth away.

When, lo, by frozen strait and over stormy sea,
O'er snowy range and death-parched burning sands,

A host, of lion hearts and willing hands,
Came first for gold, then stayed for love—for love of thee!

Ah God, the shudder and the shock, the raging flame

That refit thee of thy crown and fairest gems—

The ash-strewn ruins, black and twisted beams,

Left but a wistful mocking mem'ry and a name!

Alas, most pitiful of all, in this sad hour,
While wept the stranger world appalled, dismayed,

Thine own dishonored sons thy trust betrayed

And like the viper struck the breast that gave them power.

Beside thy prostrate bleeding form crouched ghoulish greed

And sought with tainted gold to make of thee

A loathsome creature of venality,
To draggle in the mire of shame thy helpless need.

But virtue is not dead, and honor's more than name,

For thou hast other sons of nobler strain
To rally to thy call and raise again

Thy banner proud and plant it firm on the heights of fame!

Thou sittest still "serene beside the Golden Gate."

And vistas gold of glorious ripening years
Stretch long and fair beyond the mist of tears;

Thou art thyself again, "indifferent to fate."

Thy glorious heritage with fearless faith maintain,

The eyes of East and West are fixed on thee.

For written large in the book of destiny
Is San Francisco, Queen of the broad Pacific Main!

Senator Tillman was praising the humor of a Republican Congressman, says an exchange. "His humor, however," he concluded, "is a rather grim. I told him the other day about a mutual acquaintance who had died, a man he had never liked. 'And his wife is dead, too,' I said. 'He himself died on Monday. His wife died two days later. A practical joker recently made his first trip to Niagara Falls, and a guide that he hired was trying to impress him with their magnitudes, says the New York American. "Grand!" suggested the guide. The visitor did not seem impressed. "Millions of gallons a minute," explained the guide. "How many in a day?" asked the tourist. "Oh, billions and billions," said the guide. The other looked across and down and up as if gauging the flow, and then turned away disinterestedly. "Runs all night, too," suppose," he remarked nonchalantly. The guide never recovered.

Mademoiselle advanced bravely. "Please," she said, smilingly, "will you kindly take a sponge and give me a big bath sponge?"—Success.

Reginald de Koven, the famous composer, motored recently to his native Middletown, says an exchange. There, as he strolled in a sunblistered street, he met one of the friends

Mr. de Koven smiled. "I am he," he answered. "No, no," said the other, impatiently. "I mean De Koven, the great composer from New York. The one that's writing a grand opera on 'Tribby,' you know." "Yes," said Mr. De Koven, laughing. "Yes, that's me." With an exclamation of disgust, the boyhood friend turned and leaped back into his hole. "De Koven," he sneered, "you always were a liar."

"Going the whole way, mister?" inquired the passenger with a green necktie, as he took out his snuffbox preparatory to settling himself for a cross-examination, says Tit-Bits. The man interrogated eyed him attentively, then replied: "No, I get out at the third station, am going to collect some money due to me for groceries supplied. You see, I am a wholesale grocer. The business was left to me by my father. I am married and have five children. The oldest is eleven years old. I am exactly twelve years and nine months old. I live in a semi-detached house, rented at forty pounds. My wife is fair and weighs twelve stone. She was a dairymaid before I married her and has been vaccinated twice. I have £1150 in bank and I was 14 when I left school." The man in the green necktie had a dissatisfied look as he inquired: "What did your grandfather do for a living?"

AMERICANISMS.

One must not forget that many well-known Americanisms are necessarily good old English expressions, of the date when English men and women first proceeded to make themselves into Americans. Hence the affinity between Locke's language and that of the modern Yankee. For all that, they are really Americanisms, because we have ceased to talk like Locke; and the American apparently has not; just as a word like "chuck" means something slang today, though in Shakespeare's England a king might have said "Chuck me my crown," and remained a king. Race relationships in words are always turning up in the career of the traveler. Go to Denmark and you will find that "hus" means customs house, and "barn" means child. And the Scots, closely allied in the past to northern races, still talk of "tollbooth" and "bairn"; and, allied also in the past to the French, still talk of a giggett, instead of calling it a leg of mutton.—English Exchange.

SUBMARINES IN 1635.

In Lord Bacon's delightful phantasy, the "New Atlantis," the marvels of modern science are thus anticipated: "We imitate also flights of birds," explained the father of Solomon's House to the shipwrecked strangers; "we have some degrees of flying in the air, we have ships and boats for going under water, and brooking of seas; also swimming girdles and supporters." Elsewhere we read of "new mixtures and compositions of gunpowder, wild-fires burning in water, and unquenchable." And, apropos of the grand olden, there is a curious passage: "We have certain helms which, set to the ear, do further the hearing greatly. We have also divers strange and artificial echoes, reflecting the voice many times, and as it were, tossing it; and some that give back the voice louder than it came, some shriller and deeper." Gas and electric lighting, tinned provisions, meat lozenges, Liebig, fruit essences, aniline dyes—all these and many other discoveries and inventions seem to have been the possession of the New Atlantians several hundred years ago!—Exchange.

GROWTH IN COLORED SOILS.

The effect of the color of soils on the growth of vegetation has been studied in France at the experimental meadow of Montpellier, with interesting results. Says Cosmos (Paris):

"The experimenter covered the surface of a vineyard with a thin layer of cement, easily traversed by moisture, leaving a small space around each stem. Then he painted part of the surface with a part of red and part red, and he found that the red and black plantations were almost twice as vigorous as the white."

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Legislature and Its Organization.

On the first Monday after the first day of January, in odd numbered years, the legislature of California convenes in regular session. This it does of constitutional right and without the proclamation of the governor or anyone else. It sits until it is ready to go home. The governor may call the legislature together at any time if he wishes to, but if he is a wise governor he will not wish to, for there is no knowing what a legislature may undertake to do. Calling the legislature in extraordinary session incurs so great a responsibility that any cause less important than was the great fire in San Francisco would hardly be held to justify it.

The legislature of California is composed of forty senators and eighty assemblymen, sitting in two bodies at far ends of the capitol building. Each senatorial district is as nearly as may be the same size, as to population, as every other senatorial district, and assembly districts are constituted on the same principle, but they may all of them differ immensely in area or wealth. In the heart of the residence sections of San Francisco or Los Angeles it may require no more than a few city blocks to constitute an assembly district, while, in the mountain districts it may require two or more counties to make an assembly district and four or five counties to constitute a senatorial district. The basis of representation is population and not area or wealth or agricultural, industrial or financial importance. Nevertheless, when the legislators reach the state capitol they do in fact represent interests and not population.

The state is redistricted once in ten years, after each United States census has been taken. The senators hold office for four years and the assemblymen for two, but they both receive the same compensation, $1,000 each for each regular session, together with a mileage allowance and $25 for each session for contingent expenses. In the event of an extra session they are allowed $10 per day each, besides mileage, for not exceeding thirty days.

When the legislators reach Sacramento they are only so many individual men. The Secretary of State has prepared their respective legislative chambers for them, at the far ends of the capitol building, and has allotted each member his seat according to the rules of chance, and the chief clerks of the last legislature have prepared the rolls of membership. The senate has a presiding officer prepared for it in the person of the lieutenant governor, whom the constitution assigns that duty in the way of something better for him to do. He is seldom a trained parliamentarian and so a president pro tempore of the senate must be elected in order to furnish that body with a person who knows how to preside until the lieutenant governor can learn the duties of his new position. For president pro tempore the senate chooses a senator of much experience and proved executive ability.

The presiding officer of the assembly is known as the speaker, and he is elected by the members of the assembly as soon as the roll of membership has been approved.

Generally the members of each party in the assembly are called to meet in caucus for the selection of a candidate for speaker and the issue is there fought out within the party. As a matter of fact, in most instances, the issue has been fought out before the caucus assemblies by a process of trading or compromising of claims on the part of some party or corporate political boss. The caucus merely ratifies the action of the boss and then the assembly ratifies the action of the caucus. The majority party nearly always elects the speaker, although sometimes there may be enough independents, allied to neither large party, to hold the balance of power and so do some trading on their own hook. The consideration is generally better places on committees than they would otherwise receive. Ordinarily the majority party names all the legislative officers and the minority party has to content itself with passing around empty honors.

Having elected a speaker the assembly proceeds to elect a speaker pro tempore, a chief clerk, sergeant-at-arms, minute clerk and chaplain. The chief clerk appoints an assistant-chief-clerk and three or four assistant clerks. The minute clerk appoints three or four assistants and then there is a history clerk with an assistant, a journal clerk and one assistant, an engrossing and enrolling clerk and five assistants, a file clerk and two assistants, a chief stenographer and six or seven assistants, eight or ten pages, and each legislative committee has a clerk and some of them more than one. The office of the assembly sergeant-at-arms requires forty-five to fifty subordinates aside from the postmistress and her assistant.

The senate elects a chaplain, a secretary, and a secretary and page to the president of the senate. In the office of the secretary of the senate are about thirty clerks, nine or ten stenographers, besides clerks to all the senate committees with two or three special clerks to important committees. The senate sergeant-at-arms has about as big a force of clerks, assistants, porters, pages, etc., as has the assembly.

It may be doubted if the legislature of any other state in the union supports such an army of attaches, and yet the number employed last session was much smaller than for years, because of a constitutional amendment adopted by the people limiting such expenses to $500 per day for each house. Before that attaches were positively underfoot and many of them rendered no service at all.

Since the adoption of the new constitution, and until the last election, the members of the legislature were unable to draw pay after the expiration of sixty legislative days, but it was found to be impossible to do the useful legislative work in that time however anxious the legislators might have been to do the work cut out for them. They may not do any better under a system that gives them a longer time, but at least they have the opportunity, whereas, before, the opportunity was denied them except at their own expense. This they often bore for a few days, but soon tired of it and went home.

In our next lesson we shall complete the organization of the legislature and show how the work is theoretically done and, perhaps, actually, too.

The Anaheim Gazette, of which Henry Kuchel is editor and proprietor, has entered upon the fortieth year of its publication, and rightfully congratulates itself on having done good work for Anaheim.

It is reported that the Southern Pacific Company will build a fine steamboat to make fast daylight runs between San Francisco and Sacramento.

Francis J. Heney.

FRANCIS J. HENEY HAS MADE MISTAKES, offended against good taste, shocked the proprieties. He has bluffed and he has blown, proclaimed his readiness to scrap with anyone who would come at him from the front, lost his temper and boasted of the big things he was going to do but must now leave undone. His English has not been choice and he has used too much of it. His course has centered upon himself all the hatred and opposition of organized cunning, vengeful greed and political power of this city and commonwealth. These are the worst things that can be said of Heney with truth.

But Francis J. Heney has done what no other man in our history has done, worked like a slave for three years, without money and without price, facing the threat of assassination every hour of every twenty-four, dropped in his tracks with a bullet only to up and at 'em again as soon as he was physically able. He has turned a leprous condition of civic life inside out and wrong side up, and laid as bare the iniquities of malefactors of great wealth as they will be laid on the Last Day. He has aroused the civic conscience of a continent. His voice has echoed around the world. His faults are the faults of Roosevelt. Those who hate him hate Roosevelt and for the same reason. Those who love Roosevelt will love Heney. The fight for equality before the law must now go to the makers of law. The appeal must be made to the State of California. Francis J. Heney is the man to lead that appeal.

Rudolph Spreckels.

WEALTH IS POWER. THAT IS WHY men never become sated with it, and power is the supreme love of the human heart. The men of our generation have centered vaster wealth in relatively fewer hands than before in 2,000 years of history. If this aggregated wealth will stand together, if it will "take orders," and execute them, the world will be its oyster and the industrious millions will be its bondservants for ever. The only hope for the rise of the common man is through dividing the oppressive power of concentrated wealth on an issue of human rights sustained by a militant conscience. Rudolph Spreckels is hated by his class because he has gone back on his class. He has been separated from it on an issue of human rights and his spirit is energized by a militant conscience. If his life is spared, and he can learn to work with other men, to lead instead of dominate, there is no measuring the good that he can do his country and his time. He is rich, he is young, he is strong, he loves justice and hates greed, and if he can so hold his imperious will in leash as to win men to him and co-operate with them he can make his life of greater service than though he were to endow a great university or found the noblest of charities. God grant him length of days and singleness of purpose!

Charles M. Fickert.

THERE IS NO MAN WHO, ON THE 3RD OF JANUARY next, will take oath of office in San Francisco from whom less will be expected than from you. No man entertains the hope or expectation that you will continue the graft prosecutions with any purpose other than to whitewash the accused in the speediest way possible and suffer them to go hence. It is anticipated that when you take your oath of office you will do it with such a mental reservation as will leave you free to carry out the expectations of those who procured your nomination and election at vast expense in order that the forms of law may be employed to thwart the law. It is not believed that, even if disposed to respect your oath and enforce the law without fear or favor, against rich and poor alike, you have the ability so to do. You were selected because of your front elevation rather than because of your ground plan. By taking the direction of least resistance you can make your incumbency of office easy and easily earn the unforgettable contempt of those who shall have used you as well as of all right-minded persons. And yet if there is manhood in you, if you have ability and sincerity, if you fear God and have regard for an honorable reputation among honorable citizens, you have the opportunity of your life, an opportunity that comes to few, an opportunity that will not come a second time to you. We shall see what we shall see.

Why Off Hunting Lions?

OF COURSE THEODORE DESERVED A REST. After seven years of strenuousness he had earned a play spell in the wilds of Africa, but it was deucedly unfortunate that he was off hunting lions at a time when San Francisco so much needed to have him speak to its people. They had become dead tired of being good and needed someone to fire their hearts anew. President Taft smiled upon them benignantly, but had no message for them. It would have been different with Theodore. He would have spoken and those ivories of his would have glistened with a meaning that no man could have mistaken. Well, there will be big game in abundance at home when he gets back. It has gained the courage, since he went away, to come right out onto the open veldt in broad day.

An Epoch-Marking Discovery.

THE DISCOVERY THAT POVERTY, shiftlessness and dirt are the results of hook-worms is monumental, and it is good news that that enemy to poverty and shiftlessness, John D. Rockefeller, has come to the rescue of the Sons of Rest a million dollars strong. This is a real benefaction and warrants us in looking for a speedy social uplift, not alone in the South but, if late reports be true, in California also. Well, there were never any hook-worms in John D. That's a cinch.

Who Is to Have Peckham's Place?

IT IS LESS IMPORTANT TO HAVE A DEMOCRAT on the supreme bench of the United States, to succeed the late Justice Peckham, than it is to have a really big man there. That bench is at all times more or less the victim of senility. To make it the victim of mediocrity also will be to bring it into contempt. If somehow the cards could so be shuffled as to put the President on the bench and Elihu Root, for instance, in his place the nation would greatly be the gainer, but the next best thing might be for the President to put Root on the bench and stay where he is.

Ox Team Competition.

THE BEST JOKE OF THE SEASON, in shipping circles, was the digging up of an old Southern Pacific rate sheet showing what rates were charged when the S. P. was forced to compete with ox teams for business, and showing that the rates then charged were little, if any, greater than they are now. As a matter of common knowledge in railroad circles there are many local rates with which good mule, if not ox, teams could profitably compete were it not for the fact that a team line would no sooner be established than rates would be so lowered that not even a mule could live on what he could haul. In railroad ethics no rate is looked upon as unreasonable that does not kill the business, and even a killing rate is regarded as perfectly reasonable if it results in a longer and better haul from somewhere else. That is what it means to be ruled by a railroad.

WE APPEAL TO CAESAR.

Every indictment reads, "The People of the State of California against—" The indictments found against the grafters do not read, "The People of the City of San Francisco against—" Therefore we appeal the case of the People vs. Graft from the city to the state, from the superior court to the Legislature. San Francisco is not our Caesar. If justice can not be vindicated in the Legislature appeal will be made to the American People instead of to the People of California. The problems here raised are national problems, problems involving the perpetuity of free institutions. Democracy is on trial before the civilized world and the head of this nation himself has confessed, what the head of no other civilized nation on earth would think of confessing: That attempts to establish justice under this free republic are a disgrace to the civilized world. And they are.

There are many reasons why the election held in this city on Tuesday, as it did, not one of which reasons had any moral justification for existing; but the paramount reason was that an incorporated plutocracy had planned to that end and had executed its plans with consummate ability. If this achievement of the forces of evil can have the effect of bringing home to good citizenship a realizing sense of the menace of an organized and incorporated plutocracy, a knowledge of its evil character, final victory may be snatched from defeat. Otherwise the substance of the democratic idea will be sucked out of free institutions leaving the form, the husk, the shadow to beguile the people into believing that they have the thing that they have not.

Our fight is for equality before the law. Our enemy is an incorporated plutocracy, working through a class-conscious proletariat, both ends being played against the middle. Tuesday this combination achieved the victory in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland and Sacramento as well as in San Francisco. Against a divided, unorganized, unaroused and uninspired commonality it is strong. Confronted by a solidified, determined, organized, moralized patriotism it will cringe and crawl and kiss the toe of manhood's boot.

Our criminal procedures must be so revised as to give the prosecution every right of appeal, change of venue, challenge of jurors that the defense enjoys, and certain hampering legal maxims, that grew out of conditions that have not existed for two hundred years, must be blotted out. To accomplish this the emancipation of our political parties from corporate control is a part of the campaign. These two reforms must go hand in hand, and other than these there are no issues worth mentioning.

As for the grafters under indictment, no one doubts their guilt and no one entertains the shadow of a hope that Charles M. Fickert will inaugurate anything more than a perfunctory prosecution designedly intended to whitewash the accused; but, no matter how thick the whitewash may be smeared on, the deep damnation of their guilt will never be eradicated from the public mind. No man who voted for Fickert, and the quashing of the prosecutions, doubts that Calhoun caused that $200,000 to be paid to Ruef with intent to debauch the supervisors, and that they were debauched therewith; but it is to be doubted if Fickert, or Hency either for that matter, can obtain a jury in San Francisco, under the law as it stands, that would bring in a verdict of guilty. It was this feeling more than any other that contributed to the defeat of Hency and the election of Fickert.

Fortunately, justice has its extra-judicial vindications and not a man among the accused will outlive the taint of treason to the state. The accused have used the machinery of the law to crush the law and have done it successfully, but the stigma of their infamy will live while they live and be a heritage for their children.

The result of the election in San Francisco was a disappointment, but it need not be a discouragement. This nation was dedicated to equality, equality before the law and equality of opportunity. Neither exists. Both must be reconquered. They can be. There is manhood enough in America, in California, yea, in San Francisco, to win that fight on any battle ground if that manhood can be mobilized, centralized, energized. Leave out the temporizers, harmonizers and quitters. It is a fight with quarter neither asked nor offered. Then go to it!

SHALL VOTING BE COMPULSORY?

Education in America is free for all. It required a long and hard fight to make it so, but the battle was won and now any child may begin at the primary grade and go through a postgraduate course at the university free of cost for the educational facilities afforded.

It was supposed that so great a boon as a free education would be reached out for so eagerly as to require no compulsion to make its use general. Such was not the fact. It was found that the most trivial hindrances kept tens of thousands of children out of school and that the efficiency of the American system of education was low. It was urged, however, that this was an affair that concerned parents alone, that the educational facilities were there to be made of use or let alone as each parent or guardian might prefer and that the public had discharged its duty when it had supplied the educational facilities.

Gradually it dawned upon public comprehension that to school or staying away, securing a common school education or growing up in illiteracy, was not wholly a personal matter; that a government founded upon ignorance and stupidity was a dangerous experiment to try, and so compulsory education laws began to be enacted. In order that the American Republic may not prove a failure among the nations of the earth we are still occupied with the problem of compelling American youth to become fit for American citizenship.

It is dawning upon the American mind, too, that a free suffrage, like opportunity for a free education, is not wholly an affair for private concern. With much complacency it has been declared that those who do not exercise the right of suffrage are entitled to just such government as those who do exercise that right see fit to give them, and that whether a man votes or does not vote is exclusively his own business. It has been commonly held that a citizen may vote or not vote as his humor or convenience may dictate, with the qualification that if he does not vote, and does not like the government given him, he shall hold his peace regarding that government.

The extent to which this view obtains is well exemplified in San Francisco where, at the last general bond election involving more than eighteen million dollars, 23,560 out of a total registration of 75,388 voted. It was exemplified again at the recent direct primary when 36,998 votes were cast out of a registration of 84,571. In round numbers, in both of these important elections, one-third of our electors voted and two-thirds shirked the obligation of citizenship.

Now, it has been discovered that, at primary and bond elections in particular, that portion of the electorate votes whose votes the public welfare could best dispense with. The element that would naturally vote wrong generally votes while the element that would normally stand for Right Things, if it stood at all, remains at home. Therefore it becomes evident that the public welfare is mainly dependent upon the non-voting constituency.

Elsewhere in this issue of The California Weekly will be found a thought inspiring article on compulsory voting. Shall the voter be compelled to go to the polls on election day, to cast a blank ballot if nothing more, for the same reason that education is made compulsory—because the public welfare demands it? If he does not go what shall the penalty be?

What does the thoughtful man think of the idea? The California Weekly would like to know. Any citizen who has an idea on the subject is cordially invited to fire it at The California Weekly, and through The California Weekly at the public.

INEFFICIENCY OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

There is nothing that the man who is in politics for what he can make out of politics holds in such disfavor as the "clergy in the pool of politics." This is partly because the clergy do not make much of a figure in the pool of politics and partly because of the fear that they might if they were ever to learn the rules of the political game. The political efficiency of righteousness is low. It scatters. It is easily divided into hostile camps and conquered because divided. And yet every church and church federation contains the nucleus of a political power that would have to be reckoned with if that power were focussed, directed, and made efficient by some master organizer working for Right Things.

Church members have so often been told that, "The clergy can not exercise an important influence in politics, but can seriously injure the cause of religion by dabbling in politics," that they have almost come to believe it themselves, although told so by as arrant knaves as ever packed a caucus, sold out a convention or reduced the honorable profession of journalism to the moral level of harlotry. It is time that the forces of righteousness, in church and out, reviewed the situation to see if this disqualification be well founded.

Of course we do not wish the church to go into politics for the benefit of the church. No church will warrant any other church in doing that and public sentiment will not tolerate it, but relatively little of the work the church does is done for the church. It is mainly done for humanity, for charity, for purity, for justice. In the name of religion men have dared to demand of Almighty God himself that he be just, and just before being merciful. Greater courage than this hath no man.

The head boss issues his orders to his political subordinates and they reissue them to their corporals and privates clear down to the odd-jobs man who carries his earthly possessions in his grip and at a day's notice changes his residence from boarding house to boarding house, precinct to precinct, ward to ward, or wherever his ballot can do society the most harm. This is convenient but not indispensable to political efficiency.

We are not a nation of political irreconcilables. We believe in majority rule and will submit to it whenever we have had our say in regard to what policy shall be followed, have cast our vote and know that it has been counted. If we have been outvoted on the square we yield the point with grace, even if we go on arguing in favor of a lost cause. The forces of righteousness will have to act through representative bodies, after full discussion, but when the final vote is taken every true American will admit the result for the nonce at least. An effective political instrument can be founded on good conscience and the representative idea and every church federation can be made the nucleus of such a political mechanism.

What is needed to constitute a political machine more than a head and a few good hand-to-hand workers in each precinct? That is all that any political boss ever has or needs. These church federations in San Francisco has ready at hand. All that is needed is to organize and discipline them. The organization must, to be sure, be on a representative and not an autocratic basis, but that is only a hindrance and not an obstacle. The moral forces will "take program" if they have had a hand in making the program. So organized, the moral forces can be made tremendously effective in "the political pool," so effective as to make it something better than a pool. And moral influences reinforced by religious influences will be all the stronger. That moral influence that has behind it no religious sanction may be looked upon as negligible so far as practical results are concerned. It is time to make the political efficiency of righteousness as much an object of fear to the politically unregenerate as it now is an object of derision.

Had the church federation of San Francisco been organized on the lines above laid down it could, in the campaign just closed, have threshed out the issues between Crocker and Leland, and aligned its power with one or the other, as to have forced the one discarded to retire from the race, and so saved the city from humiliation. To neglect or refuse to make use of the power for good ready to hand is to bury the talent instead of to employ it fruitfully.

The Legal Craftsmen.

According to Dean William Reynolds Vance, of the George Washington University law school, the lawyers of America are mainly craftsmen and not professional men at all. The administration of the law in America, according to Dean Vance, is two generations behind the rest of the civilized world, and for two principal reasons: One is that of a low moral tone at the bar that results in a legal parasitism coupled with a selfish indifference to the public interest. The other is that lawyers lack a knowledge of the law as a science and only know it as craftsmen.

If deans of law schools are coming to see and know these truths we may, in the near future, look for better equipped men in the legal profession, but the public must demand them or the law schools can not supply that demand. A good beginning here in California would be to exact four years of preparatory work in Hastings Law College as well as at the University. If the profession of the law can not be kept on a parity with that of medicine it is a pity.

Tamalpais Center.

The dedication of Tamalpais Center, at Kentfield, Marin county, on Sunday last, was a notable event. It marks what we may hope will become a characteristic feature of rural or suburban California life, the fixing upon and preparation of a convenient center upon which to focus the intellectual and social life of a contiguous community. People need to be brought into contact with other people. They need to be enticed out of their self-sufficing shells, without which there is neither intellectual, moral nor spiritual growth. In founding this enterprise, Mrs. Adeline E. Kent, the donor, has broken new ground in that she has sought to apply to a rural and suburban district a form of benefaction heretofore held to be applicable to congested urban centers only. It was out on the heath, and not alone in the Ghetto, that Christianity and civilization made slow progress, in the Ghetto because the people thronged each other, on the heath because they lived solitary lives with nothing to draw them out.

The dedicatory address was delivered by Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones of Chicago, the great liberal preacher and humanitarian. He took for his text this from Middlemarch: "Things are not so ill with you and me as they might have been but for hidden lives of those that rest in unvisited tombs." His theme was the debt which the living owe to past generations and which must be paid forward and not backward. The obligation is stupendous. The speaker left little in the pretensions of so-called self-made men. Take from them what was bequeathed them from the past and they would be wanting a habitation, a language, an upright position, the adequate functioning of their own bodies—everything. As a partial recompense for benefits received from countless ages gone we can not, without ingratitude, do less than our best for those who are to come after we have gone and, in the opinion of Dr. Jones, a philanthropist of more than forty years of service, "The best bequest to a growing state is a healthy community," and a community, like a pond, can not be healthy if it is allowed to stagnate.

The Tamalpais Center problem has not yet been worked out. The people accessible to it must make it a necessity to their lives or it will fail, but that also must be a work of time and effort. The want has not been long felt, but may be, and whoever shall make the feeling of that want vital, insistent and enduring will prove a greater benefactor than the donor. In this service all may share and others, seeing the good results flowing therefrom, may be prompted to do likewise. Neither religion, culture nor happiness thrives alone.

The Western Pacific.

Not as much attention as the event deserves has been given to the driving of the last spike in the construction of the Western Pacific Railroad. The finishing of this road completes two parallel bands of steel running from Oakland's water front to the docks at Baltimore. The advantage to be gained by an ocean-to-ocean line will be such as to make it imperative to consolidate other lines so that they may have one end washed by the Pacific and the other by the Atlantic. The more the better for both Atlantic and Pacific. The Western Pacific comes to us without clamoring for bonuses or special privileges. If it proposes to run the politics of all the country it goes through, as its great competitor, the Southern Pacific, has undertaken from the first to do, that fact has not been apparent. This, also, should commend the enterprise to the favor of good citizens. Shippers may well strain a point to throw a generous share of their business that way.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

How like foolishness do fairy stories seem to grown up! Stuff and nonsense! Filling the child's head with airy nothings worse than useless! What we want is facts, rigid realities, truth that touches bottom and builds up from a rock foundation unshaken and unshakable. None of your dreamy nonsense for my children. I mean that their heads shall be filled with something real, not smoke. How have we all of us heard the matter-of-fact man inveigh against fiction, the unreal.

And yet it is upon the fairy story that the foundation for the religious life is to be laid if there is to be a religious life. If there is not, if the influence of the unseen world is not to be felt, if the slave to the demonstrable fact is always to look down and never up, then it does not much matter upon what the growing mind is to feed for that life will not be worth the living anyhow.

The Rev. Dr. Rainsford, whom ill health drove from the wilds of Great North York to the wilds of tropical east Africa, to live among a less savage if a more densely ignorant people than he left at home, found that the black tribes among whom he has spent the last two years are alike untouched by past or future. They have neither tradition nor history, no belief in God or in a life after death. The only peg upon which this fisher of men, one of the most successful of our country has produced, is able to hang a hope for the future of that race is the fact that those aboriginal blacks all believe in witchcraft. It is through the door of that superstition that he believes the truths of the Christian religion may effect an entrance for the regeneration of a debased but essentially lovable people, and for the reason that a belief in witchcraft presupposes imagination. No person without imagination will ever come into fellowship with the supreme Father of the race, "See God in the slain in the wind."

Imagination is a God-given grace. No person without it has ever impressed himself upon his people or his time and few without it have ever added one fact to the world's store of useful knowledge. The scientific method, popularly supposed to be so exact, and to allow so little opportunity for imaginative conjecture, consists in the results of careful observation connected together by imagination into a working hypothesis, afterwards verified by countless other observations that make certainty doubly sure. Without imagination no working hypothesis would be possible and science would make no progress. Indeed there would be no science to progress.

The truths of religion are not demonstrable like propositions in geometry. Even a proposition in geometry can be understood without imagination to transform the lines on the blackboard into real geometrical forms in the mind. The drawn chalk lines are only visible symbols of what the soul sees.

Therefore when your child sees the lightning flash across the dark sky asks if that is because God put a light in the window of heaven do not squelch the child as a dreamer. Direct and develop that imaginative faculty as you would a vein of gold, for it is through that faculty, if through any, that he will by and by come into a closer walk with the celestial author of his being.

Than a good, wholesome, lively imagination there is no better human quality, but it needs training, cultivation, nurture, else it will grow askew. It will manifest itself in belief in witchcraft, clairvoyance, palmistry, spiritism, astrology or some other morbidism that sharpens use for fleecing the unwary. Feed it on wholesome fairy tales, on imaginative literature of the best class, and the parables of Jesus and the visions of John, the missionary spirit of Paul, will become understandable. So feed your children's minds, and they will be able to live in the companionship of the great souls of all ages, and if that does not constitute the communion with the saints, in which so many believe, then what does?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Great Palaces of the Deep.

The Lusitania and the Mauretania, the greatest of sea-going vessels, will be eclipsed, both in size and luxurious appointment, by the Olympic and the Titanic, two gigantic steamships which are now in process of construction, at Belfast, Ireland, by Harland & Wolff, for the White Star Company. The tonnage of the two former is 33,000 each; the vessels being built will be of 45,000 tons each. That is, the latest leviathans will surpass the others in size by more than one-third. Each of the new steamships will be about 840 feet long, or somewhat less than the length of three city blocks, and the boat deck will be more than 60 feet above the water. Each will carry more than 5,000 persons, or enough to populate a fair-sized town. There will be not only suites of rooms but complete flats, and some of the cabins will have private shower baths attached. One of the upper decks will be completed as one great room, to be used as a ballroom or a skating rink. A veranda cafe will be built out over the sea from one of the upper decks, and a complete gymnasium will be found on each boat. A conception of the immensity of the entire structure may be formed when it is noted that each one of the four funnels, on each vessel, will be so large that double-decked street cars might pass through it side by side. The vessels are not being constructed with a particular view to speed, but it is calculated that they will average 21 knots per hour, which is not slow. The Olympic and the Titanic will cost about $10,000,000 each, and it is expected that their first voyages will be made in the spring of 1911.

The Ownership of London City.

The city of London has a population of more than 7,000,000, and it covers a land surface of 115½ square miles. A memorandum recently issued by the London County Council gives some suggestive ideas concerning the ownership of the city. In the first place, 20 square miles, or more than one-sixth, are owned by the Crown, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the London County Council and the City Corporation. This leaves but 95½ square miles which is owned by individuals, and a living interest pertains to the nature of the distribution among them. Here it is: Forty square miles, which is not so much less than half, is owned by 187 persons; 34,413 persons own 55½ square miles; more than 7,000,000 persons own neither a fraction of one square inch nor "the hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto pertaining." So stand the facts relating to the great city's ownership, as the County Council gives them to the world. As for the moral of these facts, there will be many of them, but more of them will drip with tears than weathen themselves in smiles.

Londoners the Smallest Englishmen.

Possibly one of the morals of the foregoing paragraph may be found in the fact, asserted by British military authorities, that Londoners average the least in stature of all Englishmen. The rifle regiments, which are mostly recruited by Londoners, are compelled to place the minimum height at 5 feet and 3 inches—a fair height for a woman—and the average does not greatly exceed the minimum. The Seventh Royal Fusiliers is given the privilege of picking carefully, and, by dint of doing so, it manages to maintain a minimum standard of 5 feet and 5 inches, but the Hussars, who are not given so broad a selection, very frequently are not more than 5 feet 4 inches in height. When it comes to securing dragoons and guardsmen, ranging from 5 feet 5 to 5 feet 7 inches, London is left behind and their ranks are recruited from the country. When it is considered that a large proportion of these city soldiers come from the "slums," it is not difficult to understand why they are stunted in body, and, although the military authorities do not say so, there is room for a suspicion that they may be dwarfed in mind as well.

Man's Death Rate Is Decreasing.

The president of the Actuarial Society of America, at a recent meeting of actuaries of life insurance companies, asserted that "for more than 250 years there has been in Europe and America a more or less continuous increase in the mean duration of human life." It is true that, until the last half century, statistics had not generally been kept, but an exception to this rule exists in Geneva, Switzerland, where, excepting the years 1556 to 1576, records have been kept since 1551. According to these tables, the death rate of the seventeenth century, as compared with that of the sixteenth century, so far as ascertained, shows a decrease of one-fifth from birth to 50 years of age, one-fourth from 51 to 60, one-eighth from 61 to 70, one-fiftieth from 71 to 80, and after that an increase of one-fifth. To bring the matter closer home, there has since 1850, in the United States, been a decrease in the death rate as follows: From 1851 to 1863 the rate averaged 28 to the thousand, from 1864 to 1875 it averaged 25, from 1876 to 1888, 23; from 1889 to 1901, 21. Stated in another way, this means that from the average year 1857 to the average year 1895 there was a decrease of one-fourth in the death rate. The death rate is decreasing, but nothing indicates that the extreme limit of life is being increased.

The Telephone's Home Is America.

It is estimated that there are in the world about 9,500,000 telephones, and of these 7,000,000 are in the United States, 2,000,000 in Europe, and the remainder in outlying parts of earth's surface. It seems almost astounding that nearly three-fourths of the entire number are in this country, but the National Telephone Journal, published in London, admits that the estimate probably is correct. In all France there are less than 200,000 stations, while Austria and Hungary together have less telephones than has Chicago. Commenting on the surprising situation, the Journal says: "Ancient cities of universal renown, counting 400,000 or 500,000 inhabitants, and moreover of greater commercial importance, such as Rome, Naples, Antwerp and Prague, are far behind American towns with 50,000 to 100,000 inhabitants, such as Peoria, St. Joseph, Dayton and Norfolk, Va., which few Europeans have ever heard of; while Vienna, with a population of nearly 2,000,000, has not so many stations as San Francisco, with 350,000 souls. If the countries of central and western Europe were as well developed telephonically as even Great Britain and Germany, to say nothing of Scandinavia, the comparison with America would be vastly more flattering."

On Guard Against Suffragettes.

The suffragette Amazons of Great Britain have not yet attained that for which they battle, but that they have made a large dint in political affairs over there is demonstrated by the manner in which public meetings now are held. Formerly such meetings, if of a political nature, were free to all; the doors were wide open, and anybody might enter. It is different now. Suppose, for example, a cabinet minister has been announced to speak in the first place, everybody who attends must have a ticket. Then the approaches to the building in which the speech is to be made are stoutly barricaded, and the neighboring streets are closed to traffic unless it be of an extraordinary nature. Guarding police are numerous, and would-be auditors must be prepared to show their tickets to them at any moment. At the hall they are not unlikely to be called upon to give their names and addresses, and they must respond. All this change in the conduct of such meetings seems to pass solely because the constant invasions by suffragettes so frequently resulted in riots that steps had to be taken in the interest of public peace.

American Students in Germany.

The invasion of Germany, in the winter season, by American students who go there with the purpose of studying music, German, or for some profession, adds a very neat sum of money to Meinher's pocket change. Early registrations at various institutions of learning in Berlin indicate that few, if any, less than 5,000 such students will be in that city this winter. It is estimated that on the average one of these students remains there about six months and expends a hundred dollars a month. This would make a total of $3,000,000, which all of them would spend, and this is Berlin's share in the picking. Yet other students go to Heidelberg, Munich, Jena, Dresden, Göttingen and other cities, and it is believed that these expend not less than $2,000,000 annually, so that the total of American-student contributions to Germany would be about $5,000,000 annually. It is said that numbers of the best-known and most accomplished vocal and instrumental teachers in that country would absolutely fail to "make both ends meet" financially if it were not for the pupils who go to them from this side of the Atlantic.

A conference of rabbis is to be held in New York city November 9. The objects are practical; the rabbis will visit Ellis Island, where so many Jews come in, and as well all the Jewish charitable institutions, and moreover there will be an important discussion of intermarriage of Jews with other races.

ANCIENT ROMAN SUFFRAGETTES.

The Chicago Evening Post is delighted to discover through the researches of Professor Frank Foster Abbott of Princeton, which he has given to the world under the title, "Society and Politics in Ancient Rome," that the Roman women as far back as 195 B. C. demanded and got their rights, though the historian Livy and the great Cato were not only scandalized but "fighting mad." All well-read persons will probably remember, though the more frivolous many won't, that after the battle of Cannae, "when a display of wealth by the rich might have stimulated a class feeling which would have been disastrous," the Oppian law was passed forbidding any woman "to have more than half an ounce of gold, to wear a parti-colored garment, or to ride in a chariot within the city or within half a mile of it, except for religious purposes." The women did not object to this edict, taking into consideration existent conditions and willing to deny themselves for the good of Rome. But the war ended; prosperity smiled upon the country, and the women very reasonably saw no occasion for further restrictions in apparel. Still the law remained in force. The Roman dames did not lack for spirit, and when their reasonable request was denied, they first secured the services of two tribunes to compel the repeal of the sumptuary law, and then proceeded to work up a popular demonstration in their favor. They poured into the streets, and the records say they swarmed at the approaches to the Forum and by persuasion and argument sought to influence men to vote in their favor. And the sour-tempered Cato, waxing furious, addressed first the women thus:

"Are your ways more winning in public than in private, and with other women's husbands than your own? And yet not even at home ought you to concern yourselves with the laws which are passed or repealed here. Our fathers have not wished women to manage even their private affairs without the direction of a guardian; they have wanted them to be under the control of their parents, their brothers and their husbands. We, by our present action, if the gods permit it, are letting them go into politics even; we are letting them appear in the Forum and take a hand at public meetings and in the voting booths."

And to the men he said:

"Pray, what will they not assail, if they carry this point? Call to mind all the principles governing them by which your ancestors have held the presumptions of women in check and made them subject to their husbands. Though they have been restrained by all these, still you can scarcely find them so bound. Tell me, if you let them seize privileges and wrest them from you one by one, and finally become your equals, do you think that you can stand them? As soon as they have begun to be your equals they will be your superior."

How these arguments of long centuries ago sound like those of today! The sequel of the affair was what Kipling's clever Bengalee in "Kim" would have called "a creaming joke." The Oppian law was repealed by a unanimous vote of the assembly!

MUSEUM AT NAPOLEON'S BIRTH-PLACE.

There is some talk of establishing a small museum in the house at Ajaccio, Corsica, where Napoleon was born. A good deal of attention has been given to it, so French papers say, by visitors to Corsica of late.

The house is a little old world Italian villa of yellowish plaster work and windows with shutters which are nearly always closed up. A small garden with palm trees and other semi-tropical vegetation separates the house from the roadway. There is not much to single out the historic building as having any special interest except for a marble slab over the doorway with the inscription: "Here was born on August 15, 1769, the Founder of the Imperial Dynasty."

TO A WIFE.

By Edwin Chase.
(For The California Weekly.)

Prologue.

I joy for her to be my friend,
A Fire by night, a Cloud by day,
To be my friend who knows my way
O'er hill and dale; can comprehend
The love I hold in hallowed place
For her, God's gift to me and Grace—
I joy for her to be my friend.
I joy for her to be my friend,
A Fire by night, a Cloud by day,
Whose heart, a compass, points my way
O'er hill and dale; can comprehend
Her need, as meadows live by rain,
Her need to me, my love her gain—
I joy for her to be my friend.

NOTES.

Theodore Roosevelt's book, "The Strenuous Life," has just been issued in the Portuguese language, for circulation in South America, under the title, "A Vida Intensa." There are probably some half-cocked republics down that way which have nothing new to learn about the life strenuous.

The Funk & Wagnalls Company are about to publish "The Speeches of William Jennings Bryan," with a biographical introduction by Mary Baird Bryan, his wife. The speeches are to be published in two volumes.

Nearly 3,000,000 copies of "Little Women" and Miss Alcott's other stories have been sold, and although the author died in 1888, they are the most popular juvenile books to-day.

Robert Mantell has added "As You Like It" to a repertoire of Shakespeare's plays that is already formidable. He will alternate the roles of Orlando and Jacques in the comedy. This revival gives him ten of Shakespeare's plays.

Henry B. Harris announces that the first performance of Charles Klein's newest play, "The Next of Kin," will be given at Powers Theater, Chicago, on December 6.

The Bible contains 3,566,480 letters, 810,697 words, 31,175 verses, 1,189 chapters and 66 books. The longest chapter is the 119th Psalm; the shortest and middle chapter is the 117th Psalm. The middle verse is the 8th of the 118th Psalm. The longest name is in the 8th chapter of Isaiah. The word "and" occurs 46,627 times; the word "Lord" 1,855 times. The 37th chapter of Isaiah and the 19th chapter of the 2d book of Kings are alike. The longest verse is the 9th of the 8th chapter of Esther; the shortest verse is the 35th of the 11th chapter of John. In the 21st verse of the 7th chapter of Ezra is the alphabet. The name of God is not mentioned in the book of Esther.

GROWN OLD WITH NATURE.

By John Vance Cheney.

If true there be another, better land,
A fairer than this humble mother shore,
Hoping to meet the dear ones gone before,
I fain would go. But may no angel hand
Lead on so far along the shining sand,
So wide within the everlasting dark,
All lost will be this good green world. No more
Of Earth! Let me not hear that drend command,

Then must I mourn, unsoothed by harps of Mourn for the boughs, the birds, which taught me song,
Mourn for the nightfall on the forest fold;
Yea, must bemoan, amid the joyous throng,
These early loves. The heart that has grown
With Nature can not, hanny, leave her long.

TENNYSON ON SHAKESPEARE.

Alfred Tennyson once wrote the following impression of Shakespeare's most affecting lines:

There are three repartees in Shakespeare which always bring tears to my eyes from their simplicity.

One is in "King Lear," when Lear says to Cordelia, "So young and so untender," and Cordelia lovingly answers, "So young, my lord, and true." And in "The Winter's Tale," when Florizel takes Perdita's hand to lead her to the dance, and says, "So turtles pair that never mean to part," and the little Perdita answers, giving her hand to Florizel, "I'll swear for 'em." And in "Cymbeline," when Imogen in tender rebuke says to her husband: "Why did you throw your wedded lady from you?"

Think that you are upon a rock, and now, Throw me again!"

—and Posthumus does not ask forgiveness, but answers, kissing her:

"Hang there like fruit, my soul,
Till the tree die."

MODJESKA'S MEMOIRS.

Mme. Helena Modjeska's memoirs, finished just before her last illness, are to be published in the Century. Reminiscences of unusual interest and charm are promised, dealing with the great in many arts and walks of life; and abounding in observations on the art of acting in general, as well as on the characteristics of contemporaries in both Europe and America.

HARRY LAUDER ON HUMOR.

Harry Lauder sees much resemblance between American and Scotch ideas of humor. He says:

The understanding of a Scotchman is like that of an American, and he can see a joke with the same quickness of perception. In most cases anything that will make a Scotchman laugh will tickle an American, and vice versa, always, of course, making allowances for times, places and conditions. A joke that deals with American political conditions, for example, would not strike home to a Scotchman, but he would at least see the funny end of it, even if the people or circumstances concerned had no interest for him.

There is a dry satire to the Scotch joke and the Scotch idea of humor in his entertainers. I am told that the New England Yankee has this same characteristic—a trait that is always notable among men who fight hard for a living on a rocky soil. The Scot has a hard time. He lives in an inclement climate, where a bare sustenance must be wrung from reluctant nature, and, as a result, he becomes a somewhat embittered thinker, with the dry sarcasm that is inseparable from such a state of mind.

The American is of a lighter, livelier nature—more like a Frenchman in the particular—but of a bright, easily comprehending mind. He sees a joke quickly, he tells one with great speed. The American can not abide a joke that takes a long time in telling. The Scot can see the point as quickly, but will stand for a long-winded and argumentative joke, which would be rejected by the American.

HALS' PORTRAITS HIGH.

The huge sum of $400,000 is the price paid by Duveen Brothers of New York, Paris and London for the painting by Franz Hals of himself, his wife and two children, says the New York Times. The picture is from the collection of Colonel Warde, in whose family it has been for 150 years. It is generally held to be superior to the work by the same master recently acquired by the British National Gallery. The present purchase constitutes the high-water mark of the furor for Hals pictures which began a decade ago. It is believed to be more than likely that this portrait will soon find its way to the United States.

"THE PEOPLE'S PLACE"

(A SOCIAL CENTER AND A SCHOOL FOR FUTURE CITIZENS.)

Down in the heart of the North Beach district of San Francisco is a crowded and picturesque settlement of Italian fisher-folk—a mixed breed, partly immigrants from the turbulent Sicilian island, partly from the more peaceful dwellers of the province of Italy above the "toe." Their picturesque qualities have been made famous in pictures and stories; their quaint customs and costumes, and their many dialects.

But to the student of sociology they offer a different and more serious front. Half of the adults of the quarter do not speak English, are not naturalized, and have no interest in America except as it is to them a land where life is easier and where one's labor brings greater material rewards than in their "sunny isle."

Of American ideals of citizenship, of the duties and privileges of that citizenship, they are both ignorant and careless. It is a literal fact that today (November 2nd), when the people of San Francisco are exercising their democratic right to elect their public servants for the next two years, half of these people are untouched at the sight; and to the other half, Abe Ruef, convicted felon and betrayer of the people's government, is their idol. Why? Because he used to live in the neighborhood and on every election day hired four or five men to stand around the polls and do nothing and get paid for it.

Surely here is a field for missionary work in teaching the principles of American citizenship. The adults are mostly proof against instruction, either through indifference or because they have become petrified by age or habit in a low ideal of civic duty. But these Italians are a fruitful people; their generation is profusely populating the district with boys and girls who, being born and reared here, teach American citizenship by example and initiative age and to whom instruction may be given effectively if it be made interesting.

There is another side of the picture: these Italians are an acquisitive people; they are poor; they live poorly as they are paid; they may save. This means overcrowding in insanitary quarters, cheap food, early removal of children from school to enter the ranks of earners.

This opens another field for the settlement worker—the opportunity to uplift these people through instruction in hygiene, domestic science, and manual training.

"The People's Place" is one of the most interesting of the "settlements" which seek to remedy the unfortunate parts of life in this district, and its work is mainly directed toward supplying the two deficiencies suggested above—lack of education in citizenship and lack of wholesome home conditions of life.

The People's Place was founded nearly eleven years ago by the Rev. Henry A. Fisk, and in the seven or eight years preceding the great fire had been brought to high usefulness in the community. Mr. Fisk had the co-operation of his wife and of a large staff of assistants. Their ideal was (and is) to make the Place a "social center," attracting to it the interest and good-will of the neighborhood by club work, gymnasium classes for the boys and girls, musical entertainments, illustrated lectures, reading rooms, and the other rational and pleasing diversions that people more fortunately situated in life pay largely to enjoy, and that combine very necessary instruction with diversion.

By these methods large classes of people are reached to whom the ordinary advantages of life would be otherwise denied. For instance, few of the boys reached by the Place ever get beyond the fifth grade in school, as they are as they grow up, and as they grow up they are withdrawn from school by their parents and placed in gainful employment. They miss the broadening of the mental horizon that a few more years' schooling would have brought. And they miss even the most rudimentary instruction in the form of American institutions that are essential to an understanding of the responsibilities of citizenship.

The girls miss knowledge that is just as vital. They marry young, and rear large families. Few of them know even the merest elements of sound cooking or of sewing or of hygiene. The result is a heavy mortality rate amongst the children; dyspepsia amongst the mothers, tending toward an insatiable craving for the alcoholic stimulants and the multiplication of the evils of saloons; insanitary dwellings; improper and inadequate instruction of children in the first principles of hygiene, which result in physical deterioration and considerable immorality.

Mr. Fisk and his assistants have attacked these problems by going right down among the people, adjusting the activities of the settlement to the convenience of the people to be reached, and devoting most of their efforts to gaining the attention and molding the characters of the children. The fire burned out all the buildings and all the equipment of the earlier settlement, and the hard times have hindered the rehabilitation. But renewed interest has been aroused, the settlement has retained some real estate and acquired adjoining property by gift, and the support and co-operation have been enlisted of such men as the following as incorporators and directors: Edw. F. Adams, Chas. H. Bentley, Charles R. Bishop, Arthur H. Briggs, F. P. Cole, Charles H. Fish, Henry A. Fisk, J. F. Forrester, Livingston Jenks, Dr. Hartland Law, Thos. Richardson, H. S. Stedman, John H. Stevens, Rev. Robert Whitaker and J. T. White.

So Mr. Fisk has replaced the permanent structures with temporary shacks and begun anew the building of a great work.

The settlement is reached by boys and girls are reached by the settlement. The little gymnasium is marked out as a hand-ball court, and at specified hours every week the place is opened alternately to the girls and to the boys. After the wholesome fun of the game comes the first elementary and practical instruction in hygiene, the compulsory bath for every player. The necessity for this compulsion is easily apparent: in the dwellings of nine families adjacent to the settlement—families comprising from four to nine children each—there are only three bath tubs, and these are not too often used. The practical results have been noticed by the workers in the bathing-habit formed by many of the children who come at regular intervals and avail themselves of the privilege of a free bath.

The boys are especially interested in the band. Something over twenty boys belong to this organization, which meets on Mondays and Wednesdays. A drum corps also attracts many boys to the Place.

The direct and valuable charity is the old-clothes room. Here are stored clothes and hats and shoes donated by charitable folk, and these are distributed free to the very poor, or sold for a nominal sum to those who can afford to pay a little.

The old-clothes room has a direct connection with a useful part of the instruction of the girls and young women. Usually these clothes have to be altered for the use of the persons receiving them, and a confession of inability to sew opens the way for lessons in the art, which are gladly supplied without charge.

The Place now has, also, a kitchen equipment which will be used to teach young women how to cook. The settlement workers have long noticed the connection between ignorance of cookery, the multiplication of cheap wine-cho and the craving for liquor; and a model kitchen in a poor community has proved itself a regenerating agent of surprising efficiency.

A women's club is now in process of formation. This club will attract the young mothers of the neighborhood, for whom it will provide a basis of sociability amid pleasant surroundings, and such diversions as music and tea.

This gathering of mothers, supplemented by the illustrated lectures and musicals in the gymnasium for both men and women, draws the parents of the neighborhood into bonds of interest and sympathy with the settlement, and increases the opportunity to influence the children.

Some instruction is given the boys in carpentering and brush-making as aids toward practical training for manual trades. A library has been started. The dispensary handles a good many neighborhood cases of minor ailments and injuries.

One of the most important works, however, is the education of the boys in citizenship. The first step in this is the enlistment of their interest through a club called the Castle of the Knights of King Arthur. This club has three degrees, of page, esquire, and knight, progressively attained by merit in the virtues of chivalry, and made desirable in the boys' eyes by ceremonies that appeal to their sense of display.

From this club the boys are attracted to the performance in miniature of the duties of citizenship, such as becoming acquainted with the structure of self-government, instruction in the rudiments of parliamentary procedure, and the rights of citizens in the ordinary events of life, such as the discovery of adulterated milk, or of the proximity of infectious diseases, or the methods of voting, and like simple instances of public functions. For example, the boys held a mock city election, using sample ballots—an interesting and practical demonstration of methods, invaluable for growing voters.

The Place is incorporated solely for the purpose of holding realty, and is supported by the contributions of charitable people. These contributions are applied to equipment and the maintenance of the necessary staff of regular settlement workers. This fund amounted before the fire to $400 a month, but it has now fallen below that, and subscribers are needed to bring it back up to a level insuring full efficiency. The Place owns enough land, practically free of debt, to suffice for a large settlement from which an invaluable work may radiate. Next year the first of the permanent buildings will be constructed, and by that time Mr. Fisk hopes to have enough support pledged to bring the work back to the high standard it had attained in 1906.

The help of workers who will devote a few hours a week to forward the various activities is needed, such activities as teaching sewing or cooking, visiting in the neighborhood, directing the work of boys' or girls' clubs, and the like.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

This Is Our Creed.

We have heard. The People have spoken, and here is the creed they cry
To him who aforesaid doubted that wisdom with them shall die:

Go, tell to the waiting peoples,
Confess to the One on High,
That Justice here is a chattel
That he who has wealth may buy;
Whisper, but whisper it bravely—
Ay, though our sore he raves—
That here we do breed the briber
Who tramples on helpless Law.

Lightnings shall bear our message
Unto the startled ether;
Riches are more than Honor,
And Treasure is more than Worth.
Say to the little children—
Yea, though the truth be grim—
One came with the sword of Justice,
But we would have naught of him.

Mutter it to the heavens
That Henev may war for God,
But we will bow to the briber
In sandals of riches shod.
Cry, that the world may hear you,
Justice is but a name;
Ours be the briber's gear;
Wealth—and the briber's shame.

Murmur, but weep to murmur,
That little for guilt care we—
We know the name of the briber;
Secure in his wealth is he,
There is joy in the grafter's palace;
He whispers to all who heed:
"Shall wealth be bought by dishonor?"
We answer him, "Yea, godspeed!"

This is our creed—God help us yet—add, as in letters of light:
No problem shall ever be settled until it is settled right.

Gentle Woman and Man's Pockets.

Once upon a time, Ethel, I knew a young and lovely woman who married the man of her choice. Such instances are not remarkable, and I am mentioning this one only for the sake of what comes after. She was very sweet and devoted, this young woman, and she was determined that she would give her husband an ideal home, and for a time she succeeded. Then, in a dark and bodiful hour, she was tempted, and she fell.

Her husband's suit needed pressing, and she said that she would press it. He never complained about the manner in which she did the pressing, and I presume it was all right, but, in getting at the job, she took the things out of the pockets of one suit and attempted to put them into the pockets of the other suit.
Ethel, it can't be done. Never yet has a woman succeeded in placing a man's pocket articles in the pockets where they belong. The secret of how a man disperses his bric-a-brac throughout his pockets is, and forever must remain, a solemn and unsolvable mystery to gentle woman. Sometimes she tackles it, and it unseats her mind. More than one woman is in an asylum because she did not resolutely turn from the problem presented by her husband's pockets and their filling.

The young woman of whom I write put all she could into one pocket, and then she put the remainder into another pocket on the same side, and when the husband donned the suit he toppled over sideways. The fall hurt him, and his remarks hurt his wife, and the rift was within the lute. So they drifted ever farther and farther apart—all because she couldn't understand about her husband's pocket-etc.

It is better that you should understand about this now, Ethel, thus being prepared to avoid the pocket-rock on which the happiness of many a faithful but too aspiring wife has been wrecked.

The Opinions of Rufus.

If a merchant that makes his money by sellin' out below cost an' a saloonist that opposes prohibition because the most liquor's sold in prohibition communities would explain their theories to each other I'll bet it would be a mighty interestin' meetin'.

Just remember, son, that any man can know another's reputation, but it takes the Almighty to be real well acquainted with his character.
Generly speakin', the man that thinks the most bout himself has the least to think about.

Feller complained to me that Joaquin Miller poses too much, but when I asked him what he'd give for a pose that would work out in a "Passing of Tenyson" or a "Columbus," he never said a word.

I wouldn't want my son to live too much like King David or Bobbie Burns, but if he could write a few psalms or a "Cotters' Saturday Night," I couldn't help trustin' that he'd more'n evened up his accounts with the world an' the Almighty.

I believe there was more chance to serve God in one vote in San Francisco last Tuesday than there is in ten prayers on ordinary occasions.

Some folks remind me of some furniture
I've seen—mighty nice till the veneer's knocked off, and then dern shoddy.

In the pullin' and haulin' of many creeds men get mixed and befuddled, but, thank heaven, they's only one "love thy neighbor as thyself," an' they's no misunderstandin' that.

I read in a book that man evolved to where he is through the jelly-fish. Well, after lookin' round me more or less, I've come to the conclusion that consider-ible of it stuck to him.

Somewhere Is Justice Waiting.

We do the deed of our error,
Then cry in our foolish glee,
"I have scouted the claim of Justice,
And Justice has winked at me.
The God who sits in the shadows
Is blinded by clouds that press;
He sleeps while I win by scheming
The guerdon men term success."
But somewhere is Justice waiting.

Patience and unafraid,
Noting each debt that we owe her yet,
And knowing it shall be paid.

For dollars, and yet more dollars,
We stoop to the shameful deed;
We may bow our heads in the churches,
But here is our living creed:

"The God of Justice is dozing,
Nor heeds when His children call;
I reap the fruits of my cunning,
And never He knows at all.
But somewhere is Justice standing,
Patiently waiting yet;
Though our deeds we hide, she is eagle-eyed,
And she knows we shall pay each debt.

Nay, not in the courts where judges
Seek for the precedent still,
And not at the regal banquets
Where beakers to Wealth we fill.

But over the tinsel pretense,
Apart from the wind-blown scum,
Standeth our fair, white Justice,
Biding her time to come.

She standeth, and aye she waiteth,
Patient and unafraid,
Biding in trust the reckoning just
When all of our debts are paid.

"Yes, he is."
"But he doesn't talk good English."
"I know it."
"And he doesn't read it well."
"You are right."
"And he spells atrociously."
"Yes, but what difference does it make? His diploma is in Latin, you know."

Thoughtful Man on the Daily Papers.

"It is the daily paper, sir," the Thoughtful Man observed, "that is the life and salvation of this country. As a dispenser of news, what would we do without it? What would home be if it were not there? Can you conceive of a happy hirsede without its daily account of a murder to cheer it up and make it look pleasant?
Where would the fares and penalties get off if we had no means of knowing which train Mrs.
De Style took when she eloped with the Count? Would not the God-Bless-Our-Home motto turn over on the wall if there should be a 'function' and we were not informed concerning who was there and what she wore or didn't wear? Could we rest easy in our beds at night if we felt that there might be a shameful scandal and we not inhale the rich odor of it? Truly a great and uplifting mission is that of the daily papers, and nobly do they perform it."

"But it is when Business lies crushed and bleeding, and the magnates don't know whether they will be held up or tripped up, that the daily papers hesitate not in exhibiting their heroism. An election is approaching, candidates have been nominated, and the people are looking to the daily papers for information as to their character and qualifications. They get it."

"Writing calmly, dispassionately, logically and patriotically," says the Scoop, "we wish to assure all our multitudinous friends that our candidate, the distinguished Mr. Secker, is actuated by a divine purpose to help the dear people whether they like it or not. The opposing candidates are liars, traitors, and perjured villains. The only safety is to vote for Secker."

"An all-knowing Providence," says the Whoop, "realizes how spotlessly pure are our motives in urging the high duty of the people to elect the patriotic statesman, Beaker. The opposing candidates are scoundrels and assassins. The only safety will be found in voting for Beaker."

"Yearning for the welfare of the dear public," says the Soup, "our tender conscience will not allow us to do otherwise than to demand votes for Mr. Reeker, that fond lover and devoted friend of the people. The opposing candidates are falsifiers and supposititious dynam-iters. Vote for Reeker, and be saved."

"So it goes, until the public doesn't know which one of the candidates is not a liar, but fancies that they all are, generally ending by voting for the man that yells the loudest. In paying tribute to his lungs they feel that they are standing on sure and recognized ground.
Naturally the men who want a chance to be held up see that the right candidates—candidates with tested lung capacity—are named and await the outcome with serene confidence.
And all because of the daily press! Oh, it is a great and noble institution. By the way, did you read about the Hockhasset wholesale murder?"
I didn't.

Political Maxims to Fit Some Cases.

The ballot of ignorance counts as much as that of intelligence, and sometimes costs much more.

The loudest bass drum does not necessarily make the most proselytes.

Possibly the man who would scorn to plead with anybody to vote for him would make a good official.

The politician who appeals to prejudice rather than reason generally does not have to complain of small audiences.

Brass bands are a feature of most political campaigns, but there are some of us to whom they do not prove much.

All you need to secure the votes of some men is to demonstrate to them that you are on the wrong side.

Very often they who rejoice most in the outcome of an election are they who should be most ashamed of it.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editors The California Weekly:

It would be a great pity to discontinue your "School for Citizenship." For some time I have been thinking of these articles as eventually gathered into one book to be introduced to the high schools of our country as a companion book in the study of civil government.

Mrs. E. TIELEN,
National City, Cal.

November 1, 1909.

We regard the foregoing as a great compliment to our "School for Citizenship," and yet we cannot be insensible to the fact that it has not accomplished all the things we have dared to hope for from it. It has seemingly gone over the heads of the younger people or else has not sufficiently been brought to their attention. A rather amusing incident of the "Pledge for Citizenship," which has been looked upon as related to the "School," is that nearly all signers have been middle aged and quite a number have passed their three-score-and-ten, while but one pledge from a first voter has come to hand. The Staff of The California Weekly wants further testimony on the issue: Shall the School for Citizenship be dropped or shall it be continued? If it is to be continued how can it be made more interesting and better worth while?

The California Weekly:

My compliments to the man who wrote the editorial in your paper of October 8th, entitled: "He Uttered Not a Word." It is a restrained but very effective piece of writing—more effective because it is restrained. I wish we might get some of you people, such as the writer of this editorial, for instance, to do something for this magazine. We are, after all, working under the same impulses and purposes, though in a different form.

Very sincerely

JOHN S. PHILLIPS.

Phillips Publishing Company,
Office American Magazine,
New York, October 29, 1909

Mr. Phillips is correct in saying that The American Magazine and The California Weekly are working under the same impulses and for the same purposes. Neither is doing any muck-raking in the offensive signification of that term, but both are striking hard blows for Right Things in sincerity of spirit and with no other purpose than to serve the common good. The American magazine is a mine of basic information upon which to found sane, sound and healthful conclusions. We acknowledge our obligations for the generous compliment paid us and tender our services to the American Magazine on demand.

"BE OF GOOD CHEER."

By Francis J. Heney.

The first battle for equality before the law has been fought and lost, but the war against graft will continue to be waged by all true soldiers who have been fighting with me in the great cause of common honesty, common decency and civic righteousness.

The fight between the forces of evil and the forces of good is and must be a perpetual one. The first battle of Bull Run cast gloom over the entire earth, but that disaster only inspired the immortal Lincoln and his followers with stern resolution and fresh courage.

San Francisco has received a sad blow and the cause of equality before the law a great setback, but be of good cheer and take fresh courage, you many thousands of good men and women who have joined in this fight for the maintenance of the purity and protection of our homes and the uplifting of the moral standards of our city!

We have been defeated in this election, but the sober moral sense of the community will again reassert itself and San Francisco will vindicate herself before the world.

I retract nothing that I have said during the recent campaign. On the contrary, I reassert the truth of all that I have stated from the public platforms. I have no regrets except that for poor San Francisco and the many thousands of people who fought shoulder to shoulder with me in the good fight.

Let it all finally result that we will continue the battle for equality before the law with unabated vigor until success has crowned our efforts.

A NATIONAL MOVEMENT.

By Rudolph Spreckels.

"I am more firmly convinced now than ever before," said Mr. Spreckels, "of the real need of reform in business, in politics and in labor. We must restore the old confidence in each other that once prevailed, and we must come to a realization that honesty must prevail in all of our activities.

"It is my belief that the people will come to a realization that the rich man who debauches government for his personal gain is of the most vicious type of criminal, for the undermining of government is the most vicious crime of which any man can be guilty. I see no way to stop this.

"I am going to continue to serve the cause I have espoused. My method will be to work upon educational lines, to bring home to the people the necessity of action upon the part of the rich man and of the poor man to compel honest dealing between man and man, and to bring about a new condition of self-respect among citizens.

"I shall continue to organize the citizenship that has seen the light. My work is intended to become national because I believe there is not a city or state that is not corrupt, and I cannot even accept the national capital."

A MODEL BENEFACTION.

The purposes for which Tamalpais Centre was designed were, some time since, quite fully set forth in The California Weekly, and editorial reference will be found to it elsewhere in this issue. The formal dedication of the property to public use took place last Sunday. We give below Mr. William Kent's brief introductory remarks, in making the audience acquainted with Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones of Chicago, who preached the dedicatory sermon, and we do this as furnishing a model for that form of public benefaction which helps without pauperizing and lends a hand without undertaking to carry the whole load, the only form of benefaction that really benefits.

"My mother has asked me to say a few words for her at this dedication service. She represents the idea that her gift should be described as generous, rather it should be considered sensible.

"She believes it is merely putting land and capital to better and more productive uses. This land can raise better livestock than calves. This building can pay better rent than any calculated in terms of dollars. Land and building have passed beyond her control but not beyond her ownership. That ownership is more precious because it is equally shared with each of her neighbors and has become part of the commonwealth, the living, growing commonwealth. The best of the commonwealth is human love and sympathy, and that this land and building may be a fruitful seed plot is her hope and wish.

"The trustees have accepted this trust for the public welfare. Every gentle interest that can be taken up will find here its opportunity as fast as people are willing to support it. Nothing will be tolerated that is injurious to the public welfare, or hostile to the rights of others. Personal liberty shall not here be degraded to license, nor the privilege of the few subordinate the welfare of the many. In the clashes of opinion that may come, you must trust to the representative capacity of the board of trustees who know the neighborhood and who know California. The man who is going to address you is a Lincoln man, and is Chicago's great democrat. He fought three years for human rights on southern battlefields, and ever since has loyally followed the standard that has led toward greater opportunity for men and women and children.

"Doctor of Laws, Head Resident of Lincoln Centre, leading citizen of a great city, disciple and prophet of democracy, preacher of the gospel; we, who are putting our armor on, salute you who, though entitled by service to put your off, are still vigorous in the battle, Jenkin Lloyd Jones."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Sombody Proud of Senator Frank Flint is an object of pride, not to one Mrs. Flint and her two children, and to William F. Herrin and Abe Ruef, but also to the town of North Reading, Massachusetts, where the able senator from the South was born forty-seven years ago. The people of North Reading "blow" over having produced one mayor for Boston, "Old Hutch" of the Chicago wheat pit and a United States senator from California—the second California senator Massachusetts has produced. The late A. A. Sargent was the first. Being "get there" Yankees the "blowers" of North Reading care little how their senator "got there" so he got there, and the fact that he left the home his great-grandfather built when he was only seven years old, and has not been back to his native town since, takes little or none of the wind out of their blowing. They are proud of him none the less and proud, too, that his great-grandfather, Col. Dan Flint, fought in the Revolutionary war and helped to frame a constitution for Massachusetts. The town of North Reading is content. It has produced something besides the biggest onions and the smallest potatoes.

Has Got All Out of It It comes to The Watchman, rather indirectly, but not after the way of the corkscrew, that Senator Frank Flint has put the senatorial problem up to himself in this wise: "I have got out of this senatorship all there can be in it for me. I have been a United States senator from California. The records of the state and of the United States will show it. All the honor the office can yield I have squeezed out of it. Posterity is not going to be curious as to who made me a United States senator, and if I quit the job now, that unpleasant bit of information will soon fade from the memories of the people of California. Perkins would have gained in distinction if he had quit a dozen years ago and stepped out of the senatorial office into a good law practice and make a lot of money, if I step out now. I can't make a lot of money while I am in the senate. Burton of Kansas queered that business forever. Having got out of the job all I can get in it FOR ME, why should I stay with it? What possible reason can there be? And I won't." And the "get there" type of man will appreciate the view of the situation that Senator Flint takes and say, in his heart, "Flint is a fool if he does, why should he?" Senator Frank Flint stands well in the United States senate. He was a good boy from the start. He "fagged" for the old fellows the first two years and complained of nothing. He worked well on the committees. Aldrich and Hale saw that he could be made useful, because obedient, and so Aldrich gathered him into the finance committee where he rendered important service to the interests. By way of recompense he was given half a cent extra on California lemons, so that there could be somebody outside of North Reading "blowing" for Flint. The fact that the S. P. took a third of this to itself tempered the breeze that blew in Flint's direction. The Flint tire is soft, not flat—that is not yet.

Not That Kind That California Wants It is time that California sent to the United States senate a man imbued with an ideal more lofty than that of getting out of the job all there is in it and then dropping it to turn to something more profitable to himself. Senator Perkins, many of his shortcomings are actually no such motive as that. He is in the senate because he likes the job and the associations and, according to his lights, he genuinely serves his state and his country. His early advantages were scanty. He has spent his life in "getting things" for himself, his friends and his state. He feels that he is sent to Washington that he may "get things" for California, and to that end he works like a deck hand. When fault is found with him for his lack of a more exalted senatorial concept he exclaims in a pained surprise: "Why, what more do you want than I am doing for you? Am I not one of the most successful men in the whole senate in getting things for his constituents?" He is. But California needs to ask more even than that, more than "getting out" of the senatorial office "all there is in it" for the senator himself, more than "getting all the good things going" for his constituents and his state. California needs to have in the United States senate a real state-man, a man with a purpose well and truly to serve the highest interests of the nation and, in that service, to forget self, to fight the existence of a "pork barrel," to stand for Right Things even if public sentiment at home is temporarily on the wrong side and, above all else, to be free of corporate influence.

The Race Track Evil Not Out of Politics One who had not a little to do with outlawing the race track iniquity feels certain that the men who have so long fattened their purses at the expense of the suffering from horse madness are to be reckoned with in next year's campaign. They will try the temper of the courts by seeming to comply with the present law while transgressing it in effect. They will, at the same time, do their utmost to secure the election of senators and assemblymen who will make concessions in the interest of "breeding good horses" rather than good men. Nor is it so certain that this time the Southern Pacific's political bureau will keep hands off. The race track men have been taught a valuable lesson. They have been shown the standing alone, they are not so strong but that they can be beaten, that if they want protection they now know, better than before, where to look for it. But, at the start, those who used to be bookmakers will now become valuable voters, if not cash, betting with every individual who wants to bet. The cash will be handed up to employed stake-holders who merely hold the money, without receiving any commission (which the law forbids and upon which the law seems to depend), passing back the full amount to the winner, when the race betted on shall have been run. It is thought that this pretended compliance with the law, and practical evasion of it, may suffice when it shall have been subjected to judicial interpretation. If not, then for the legislature.

Will Frank Leavitt Succeed Abner Weed? If the fight for the race tracks is still to be waged a first consideration with the touts must be the keeping in the state senate of Senator Frank W. Leavitt of the sixteenth senatorial district, which district embraces Emeryville and the western portion of Oakland. The people of Oakland have become so incensed over the race track evil that the chances of Frank Leavitt's succeeding himself from that district are slim, but he is by all odds the best floor manager in the senate. He has not the finesse of Eddie Wolfe. The battles he wins are won by storm, while Wolfe saps and mines, deploys and skirmishes, lays ambushes and uses diplomacy. Leavitt swings the bludgeon, Wolfe thrusts with the rapier. Together (and they usually are together) Wolfe and Leavitt make a strong team. As neither of them possesses other than the most shadowy notions regarding right and wrong they can work without embarrassment for any iniquity that requires their services. The race track interests can count on them. Wolfe is in the senate for two years more. Leavitt's term is out. Abner Weed represents Siskiyou and other counties up that way. He is as unmitigated an old materialist as ever slaughtered a forest or carried a primary election by running in unregistered and unnaturalized Greek section hands and timber jacks to overthrow the forces of reform at a primary, but he entered the senate too late in life to become efficiently pernicious. Beyond voting consistently wrong he can't do much harm and he is understood to be willing to step aside and help to elect Frank Leavitt to succeed himself. Leavitt has interests in Weed's district, and spends part of his time up there, and can as easily represent the second district until the sixteenth, as far as residence is concerned, if Abner Weed can furnish the Greeks to carry the primary election. It is to that end that the tangle of political gossip tends.

Never Had a Chance From Start to Finish It is gratifying to know that the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco, which fattered the bills to reform the criminal procedure, and which bills failed so miserably in the last legislature, has not been discouraged by that experience, but will renew the fight in the Legislature of 1911. The reform will certainly come if the contest is kept up long enough, but it ought to come in the Legislature to be elected next year, and it will if no mistakes are made this time. As in most movements for reform, it is necessary to pay some attention to the politics of the thing. Last year the Commonwealth Club laid the plan well; the needed legislation was drafted with unusual care; leading lawyers, as well as judges of the Superior and Supreme courts, were consulted on this phase, and public discussion was stimulated; the legislators elect were dined, in order that they might be talked to, and few stones were left unturned that the movement might be given a good send-off. But it never had a chance in the Legislature? Why was it?

Are Lawyers Against Reform of the Laws? Principally, of course, on account of the kind of men who made up the Judiciary Committees of the Senate and Assembly; with few exceptions these men are totally incapable of appreciating the need for legal reform; they are so selfish as to want to spoil the game at which they had been accustomed to play in defending persons accused of violating the laws; they were too prejudiced to be able to see anything in the proposed changes of the laws except an effort to injure the chances of the defendants in the San Francisco graft trials. Outside of the two sets of attorneys on these committees, it will be understood, the Legislature counted for nothing, because all strictly legal questions are left entirely in their hands. Such was the situation at the last session, and, more or less, it will be the situation at every session.

A Reformed Procedure Must Be Made an Issue It will be necessary to wage the fight both inside and outside of the Legislature. There must be constant agitation to stir up a vigorous public sentiment. Last time the members of the Legislature were not sensible of any pressure from their constituencies, and therefore they could see no politics in it except the politics being done in the Legislature, and that was all antagonistic to the bills. It will be necessary next time to have it understood that it will be good politics to pass the bills and dangerous to defeat them. The question must be taken up with candidates before the election, when they are in the soft plastic state which candidacy produces; a California senator or assemblyman of a certain kind can harden up wonderfully within twenty-four hours after he has been elected. In short, the sentiment on this subject, which has been latent, must be rendered active by the election of members of the Legislature, and it can be accomplished if a regular campaign for that purpose is inaugurated, but not otherwise.

Send No Boy to Mill, This Is a Man's Job Again, there must be elected, at least one Senator and one Assemblyman of first-class ability who will make this their principal measure. In the last session the Commonwealth Club was weak in having no strong men on the floor to conduct the fight. It was assumed that the bills would pass on their merits, if their merits were explained to the committees. A representative was sent to Sacramento by the Commonwealth Club, but he was "on foot and alone" when he went up against the opposition in the Judiciary Committee; he was barely tolerated; the disposition was altogether to browbeat and trample on him. This kind of tactics will not do; when the Legislature meets the fight must be carried on from within and not from without; there must be strong lawyers on both committees, committed to this issue, who will not be browbeaten or trampled on. This also can be arranged, if the Commonwealth Club will take it in hand in time, and pick its men and see that they get nominated and elected. The club has enlisted for the war and might as well go to work systematically, for it has before it a hard campaign but one full of glory if fought to a successful conclusion.

Another Union Labor Victory

Tuesday on the crest of the "tired" wave. The election demonstrated that the public is suffering from the reaction that invariably follows a strenuous constructive period. They want to rest their minds from the thoughts of permanency in civic morality. This is unfortunate, but it cannot be helped; it is human nature.

Good Government League Rescued the Few Survivors

That the wave was not tidal is probably to the credit of the Good Government League. Twelve thousand straight ballots were cast by adherents of the league, and these votes undoubtedly saved from defeat such men as Percy V. Long for city attorney and Paul Bancroft for supervisor. Having demonstrated the utility of the league, steps were taken Wednesday morning to finance it as a permanent institution, and to keep it compact for future occasions when a nucleus of action for reform movements is needed.

Crocker's Candidacy Fault Of Chronicle and Call

A good deal of the responsibility for the defeat of Leland and Heney falls upon the Chronicle and the Call. These papers kept Crocker in the field when they knew he was a hopeless thing in the race, and when Crocker's best friends had warned him that his candidacy was not only hopeless but an aid to McCarthy.

McCarthy's Administration Responsible for Next Years

The Union Labor party now has the opportunity for which it has sighed, the opportunity to rehabilitate its good name from the odium of the Schmitz-Ruef regime. It is to be hoped that McCarthy intends in good faith to work toward that end, but one cannot escape recalling that the political alliances into which he entered as a part of his successful campaign are not of the sort that encourage any rosy hopes. He is, however, entitled to a suspension of judgment until his administration has shown what it intends to do, and this suspension the public will generally make in his behalf. There is one advantage in the situation for everybody: his ticket is so nearly completely elected that he can claim the full credit for its good work, and his opponents can lay the full responsibility on him for its evil works.

Does Heney Step Down, or Up Higher?

Francis J. Heney's defeat puts him in a new political category. As a candidate for prosecuting attorney he is a "has been" of the completed order. But his unflinching courage, the high standard of his morality, the stanchness of his character, and the dash of his methods as a campaigner may easily project him by popular demand into a wider field of public usefulness. The country exchanges of The California Weekly and the best political acquaintances of The Watchman turn strongly in sentiment toward Heney for next governor of California. It is possible that the people of San Francisco have relieved him from a thankless task just in time for the highest honor in the gift of the state.

Sacramento Also Slumps

Amid so many election results of greater moment the outcome in Sacramento will not excite particular interest outside of the capital city itself; but that city appears to have repented of some of its recent progress and gone back at least two years. Marshall Beard, who re-

Hichborn's History

So many applications have come to The California Weekly for copies of Franklin Hichborn's

"STORY OF THE CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE OF 1909."

that we have arranged to take orders for this valuable book and fill them directly from our office, either in person or by mail. The regular trade edition is $1.25, post paid.

Mr. Hichborn's book should be in the hands of every person who desires to gain an interior view of the government of California AS IT IS, and the function of legislation AS IT IS PERFORMED session after session under our very eyes.

Having resided at the state capital and attended upon legislative sessions for a number of years, Mr. Hichborn has had unusual opportunities for getting close up to the true inwardness of things legislative and he deals with his subject in entire frankness.

No better volume could be put into the hands of a young man preparing himself for citizenship and for doing his part in making political conditions better than they are.

SHALL VOTING BE COMPULSORY?

A SUGGESTED REMEDY FOR INDIFFERENCE TOWARD THE FRANCHISE.
By COURTENAY DE KALB.

In Paris, not many weeks ago, before the irritated Clemenceau had made ready for Aristide Briand, a remarkable scene occurred. It was during the attempted general strike, when the government was challenged at every repulsive step it took. From the extreme left of the Chamber of Deputies arose the tones of a chant; instantly every socialist and radical was on his feet, and the solemn hymn proceeded. It was the same weird monotone which a few days earlier, like the sound of a wind among the rocks, had swept through the galleries of the postoffice when the employees laid down their work and hurled a challenge in the words of l'Internationale. It is curious to reflect that the answer to this song, which by government order no one is allowed to sing, and which therefore everyone knows and sings when he can, was a feeble effort by the Moderates to sing the Marseillaise, the battle hymn of the revolution of a century ago. The radicalism of one age becomes the conservatism of the next. It reminds one how often it has been shown that reason takes it last appeal to the new wise heresy. Monsieur Briand sits among his fleurs de lis and roses, puffing his scented cigarettes, the type of a lover of ease, whom one would expect to shrink from violence. It was but seven years ago that this same man incited the people to resistance with fire and dynamite. Few recent orators in France have been more inflammatory in their utterances than he; yet today he is conservative enough to lead the ship of state, and sustain respect for the established order. It is not a paradox; it is the expression rather of that energy which jerks the organism forward, which loosens the fetters which have worked evolutionary change, while the old structure still prevents a mad dash to destruction. But France is nevertheless directed by a socialist, and it marks a new departure in the history of liberal government. It reminds us of the power of the movement which has worked through so large a part of the world that ministers and kings are compelled to make plans with reference to it; that renders misgovernment more and more an opportunity to radical theorists to sweep the discontented into line for successful attack upon the strongholds of conservatism. Change we must and change we will; we may not become socialists, but we are getting farther away from autocracy. The tendency to substitute the tyranny of paternalism for the tyranny of the monarch is manifest not only in Europe, but it has invaded and swayed the Parliament of Great Britain, and is showing its strength in municipal and state legislation in America.

There is always some false note in every great human expression of sentiment—some one weakness, some spot on the body of Siegfried where the linden leaf fell when he sought to render himself invulnerable by his bath in the dragon's blood; and the facts are often flung at us in melody. The despair of those who seek to guide the masses are the scorching truths that find utterance in popular song. So in l'Internationale, amid a vast deal of savors of blood and violence and exaggerated humanism, there flashes forth one gem-like ray, illuminating a defect in democratic government:

"No rights without duties;
No duties without rights."

It is that which gives vitality to the revolutionary hymn of today. It seems to sum up the difficulties that arise so commonly in the administration of popular government.

Indifference Democracy's Weakness.

The weakness of democracy is that weakness in the individuals which has made it easy for monarchies to thrive in the past—indifference as to how we get governed; political inertia, exaggerated by selfish devotion to personal ends. The average man shrinks from actually beholding the administration of government; apparently he wishes to be governed in the way that he submits to a surgical operation—under the influence of anesthetics. He shrinks from a tax, hence he chooses to conceal it in the prices added to his daily necessities; the indirect tax is submitted to, while any form of direct tax is strenuously resisted. A perfectly healthy social organism would welcome the obligation to sustain the commonwealth at least partially. It would have no desire to evade the discharge of its civic duties unconsciously. Moral responsibility toward the state weakens when co-operation is impersonal. The normal, vital relation of every citizen toward his government should be that of a direct and active participant in the work of guidance, protection, and support. He should know when he contributes for its sake, and how much. The citizen who evades direct taxation, and prefers oblique methods, is shirking responsibility and inviting corruption and oppression. The chief argument in favor of a poll-tax has been that it serves as an object-lesson to remind the voters of civic responsibility. In effect it is a sort of branding iron, to show the herd we belong to, and as many as can make a dash to escape the annual rodeo. Its very artificiality makes it the more repugnant. If it did not stand alone, but were part of a system of direct contribution to the government it would perform a better function.

Evasion of Jury Service a Symptom.

The tendency to shirk responsibility appears again in the persistent evasion of jury duty, and in the general ignorance of what it entails. The average citizen has never sat on a jury; he has no conception of the operation of the judicial system, nor of the function of the jury. He is ignorant of the meaning of controlling the public honor. There are men who refrain from registration as voters, not merely through indifference, but with the motive of hiding from summons to perform jury duty.

Lack of participation is the great evil of popular government, leading to the loss of rights without duties, the unwillingness to sacrifice personal convenience for the sake of a better conduct of affairs. It used to be commoner for men to enter public life for patriotic motives than it is today. A man who pretends to good government and discommits himself to himself places himself under suspicion; he is deemed a hypocrite; he is expected to desire office for ulterior ends. If the case be clear he is flattered into incompetent vanity, proving how true is the rule to which he stands as an exception. The man who attends to his duty as a voter at inconvenience to himself and from altruistic motives, is still more rare. The popular impression is that the elective franchise is a privilege, not a duty. If he is zealous it is because he is an ardent adherent to a party; he is voting not for his city, his state, his central government, but for a party scheme, for a legislature or a judiciary that will favor the purposes of a limited class. The end of such special aims is the control of government by demagogues and the subversion of the general good to the interests of a minority. The inevitable consequence is corruption, and the correction as inevitably comes by a sudden spasm of righteousness. Reform by spasms is necessarily weak. Its very violence leads to speedy collapse; high tension invites excesses; too much is attempted at once; the changes are inharmonious, and the party of reform soon finds itself discredited.

All this is true, but terribly true. I had a valued assistant who has made many journeys with me through the wilderness, and if ever I grew impatient to hurry on, he would say, "Don't get nervous; it's the steady count that counts." That is true in politics as well. It is a law of nature; the effective, permanent improvement comes as a result of patient, ceaseless effort, of slow evolution. The defect of radical measures lies in their disregard of the past. We must build on the old foundations to insure stability. We must discover the unused potentiality in the old, and the changes must proceed from an extension of the principles which have already received the approving stamp of past success.

Non-Voters Worse Than Partisans.

We have demonstrated the power for good of popular suffrage. It has become the cornerstone of independence, but it is also a ready means for working incalculable harm unless the whole mass of voters exercise the right. The only safeguard of a right is the consistent use of it. If we do not use it, some one else will, and that leaves open the door to abuse. The protection of the state involves the exercise of the suffrage by all who are entitled to it. The non-voter is a greater danger than the violent partisan. How to awaken his sense of responsibility has always been a difficult problem. The socialists who chant l'Internationale have probably given the cue:

"No rights without duties;
No duties without rights."

The suffrage is a right which carries with it an obligation, but obligations are apt to be ignored save in moments of remorse or under compulsion. Reform waves represent the ineffective periods of moral revival. The trouble with revivals is that the faithful are few while the backsliders are many.

Obligatory Voting the Remedy.

The obvious remedy is to make voting obligatory. The suffrage is not a natural right, as the encyclopedia of the 18th century used to teach. It is granted by the state for its own benefit. No better statement of the case was ever made than that in Gougar vs. Timberlake (37 N. E. rep., 660, Ind.). The suffrage must come to the individual not as a right, but as a regulation which the state establishes as a means of perpetuating its own existence, and of insuring to the people the blessings it was intended to secure."

In another famous case (Blair vs. Ridgely), Justice Wagner of the Supreme Court of Missouri said: "The right to vote or to exercise the privilege of the elective franchise is neither a natural nor a vested right of which a man cannot be deprived but by due process of law, but it is purely a conventional right, and may be enlarged or restricted, granted or withheld at pleasure, with or without faults; for outside of society, and disconnected with government, no person either has or can exercise the elective franchise as a natural right, and he only receives it upon entering the social compact, subject to such qualifications as the state may prescribe."

In like vein Chief Justice Cartter of the District of Columbia (Spencer vs. The Board of Registration) announced: "In all periods and in all countries it may be safely assumed that no privilege has been held by the people exclusively within the control of conventional power than the privilege of voting."

No Guarantee of Suffrage in Constitution.

The Constitution of the United States guarantees no right of suffrage. The power to control this lies with the separate states. The Constitution defines the qualifications of those who may exercise this function, but that provision does not execute itself; it requires legislative action to give authority to vote. The United States only guarantees the right of exemption from certain prohibited discriminations. Until the adoption of the fourteenth amendment there was no safeguarding of such privileges as had already been accorded to citizens by the several states.

From this brief review of the legal status of the suffrage it is plain that no man can claim it as a right except in so far as the states concede it, and what is granted is a privilege to this extent—legislation has been warped by an undue regard for individual liberty. The sacred duty of sustaining the state by the performance of a service has been overlooked.

The obligation to aid in the direction of public affairs is as imperative as that of contributing to the expenses of administration by the payment of taxes. The separate states, deprived of the power to levy duties, have been formed to direct taxation. This has been distinctly beneficial, and there is no hesitancy in using the authority granted. The federal government possesses the right of impressment for national defense. By what sophistry then, should the individual be excused from the ever present need of helping to sustain his government by contributing his thought, and the expression of his opinion of reasoned judgment, as well as his money? Where may we distinguish between voting and taxing in this regard? If a man declines to pay his taxes, his property becomes forfeit. If he refuses to serve under arms at the call of national peril, he is imprisoned. If he avoid the great civic responsibility of lending his voice to the election of those who shall frame and administer the laws, why should he not suffer penalties for neglect?

The Example of Spain.

We may argue and educate forever, but the indifference of voters will not be overcome. It is curious to find that of all countries in the world, Spain is taken the lead in this eminently practical reform. The election of deputies was regulated by an act of August 8, 1907, whereby all males over 25 years of age, who are in possession of their civil rights, and have resided in their district for two years are under compulsion to exercise the function of the suffrage. Only those beyond the age of 70, and certain judicial officers, are exempt.

It has been proposed in this country to fine those who abstain from voting. It would undoubtedly produce a salutary effect, but it would not exercise the moral force which would awaken the individual to a full sense of his responsibility. It could too readily be treated as a mere convention, and carry no more sting than an automobilist feels on being fined for "scorching." It is needful to arouse a regard for intelligent performance of his duty, and nothing will so surely do that as to deprive him of the privilege for his indifference. To brand him as an enemy of the state would awaken his dormant regard for the obligations of citizenship. Failure at first might be met by the imposition of a fine, and these fines might be made cumulative for persistent neglect, ending in deprivation of the right. Self-respect as a man might thereby be extended to self-respect as a citizen.

Personal Liberty Not Everything.

Accentuation of personal liberty and independence is well enough as far as it goes, but we do not stand alone. We have our little atomic orbits of gyration, but we are, after all, only parts of a larger organism. As social beings we are invested with social duties, and if we fail to perform them, like all effete matter we must expect to be cast out; otherwise we impair the health of the body politic.

Do not understand me as decrying the effort to better political life by appeal to the moral sentiment of the community. No purely mechanical method can supplant the conscience either of the individual or of the people. It would be perhaps as uplifting as the Buddhist prayer-wheel, and no more tiresome. The prayer-wheel was founded on the desire to pray, on a religious sentiment evidently somewhat exhausted and out of breath at the moment when this particular machine was invented. The enactment of sentimental provisions into law is not only part of the process of social evolution, but it is also ossification of social tissue. It is part of the inevitable course of the race in growing old, or I might say in growing older, for I doubt whether the human race has yet passed beyond its adolescence. The ossification of tissue need not be feared; it is necessary for giving strength and power to the body-politic.

It is our duty to not steal, and the sentiment of the world is against it; even the savage will go to war to protect what he regards as his own; the sympathy of the world is with the one who is robbed (unless it be a big corporation) and we might say that the instinct of men, and their promptness to make reprisal when theft is committed, would be sufficient deterrents, but nevertheless there have been laws down through the ages to protect property. Laws that stand for generations are the expression of the settled conviction of what is good and necessary for the commonwealth; even the fleeting statutes, which do not bear the test of time, represent good intentions—for some body.

Forced to a Mechanical Method.

We are forced to the mechanical method; we have adopted it because there has seemed to be no human probability of living in a state of spontaneous and universal brotherly love. Brotherly love is spontaneous when it arises, but spontaneity is not dependable. The good things, when we find them, have to be crystallized for preservation, so as to be available when needed. The good things have usually been fought for; paid for, not in money, but in anguish and tears, in heroic sacrifice, and in human blood. Our liberties have been bought in that way; our right to govern ourselves has been wrung from the hands of oppressors on the battlefield; and now before us is the certainty of another great change in the political and legal status of all peoples.

We in America are prone not to realize how the great revolution has been gaining progress. We are still individualistic; our courts have not shown unanimity as to the principles which shall determine in cases where plainly there is conflict between the right of an individual and the public advantage.

Within a year two famous treaties have been decided in the West on diametrically opposite bases, both within the law, but tending in antipodal directions. In each case it was a question of damage to property of neighboring farmers by large corporations engaged in the reduction of ores. One held that the individual was entitled to be freed from the continuing cause of damage to his property; the other that he might recover damages in court, but might not restrain the operations of an industry that had contributed to the support of a large number of men and women. It was Individualism vs. Utilitarianism. That is the trial in progress today all over the world, and the utilitarians are winning.

The socialists are making their appeal to this principle, regardless of the fact that at LARKIN had lost her, and he knew it. It was wholly his fault, and he knew that, too, and he admitted it to himself as he saw her coming up the street. Tough, too, for there was a prettier girl south of Market, whence, in Larkin's opinion, most of the pretty girls come. And she was as sweet as she was pretty. Just to see her at a dance, for instance, smiling and happy—Larkin's eyes watered a little at thought of it and of what he had lost. All that feminine daintiness and charm had been promised to him—and he had thrown it away! The thought stung. "But it's a good thing for her, I reckon," he whispered to himself. "A fellow that's got a chance at all that and won't let booze alone, well, he deserves what he gets sure." Thus Jim Larkin at his best to Jim Larkin of the Primrose Path.

She was a deserted path at present. It all had happened more than two weeks before this evening, and he had been "on the water-wagon," as he explained to convivial friends, since that time. She had "thrown him down" rightfully enough, but he would prove to her that there was in him the stuff of which men are made. She had promised nothing in that final interview, but—who knows?—she might hear that he was playing the man's part and—Larkin did not quite dare to express the rest, even to himself.

She was drawing nearer, and while he longed to see her, while his very soul rejoiced at the sight of her fresh daintiness, he did not wish to be seen. There was a deeply sheltered doorway at hand, and in a moment he was a part of its shadows. She was fairly fellows whom he had seen behind her passed her, and one of them turned and accosted her. Larkin saw her start as in fear, turn as if to retreat, and then hurriedly press forward, to be again accosted.

Red rage boiled in the heart of the man in the doorway, his fists clinched convulsively, and the muscles corded themselves upon his brawny arms as he sprang at the ruffian. The latter saw him coming, and dodged, but not so quickly as to escape a blow which staggered although it did not down him. Then he turned, and prepared himself for defense.

Physically the two were seemingly well matched, with little difference in height and apparent weight, but another factor set the odds desperately against Jim Larkin. While the two rained their blows, some of them well guarded, others reaching home, upon each other, a blow from an unseen quarter brought Larkin to his knees. The other ruffian, crafty after the manner of his vermin kind, had stolen up behind him and dealt the blow by that treacherous blow. The ghosts of his battling forebears, of men who had lived in the days when might made right and death was the penalty of weakness, lived in him again. He forgot self and its law of preservation, forgot everything but a maddening, desperate desire for revenge. There should be no room in the one city for these immeasurable beasts and himself. He sprang to his feet, and the unequal battle was on.

How it went he knew not, nor did he care. Giving or taking mattered not; he would have his revenge. He scattered houses along the street swam in a bloody haze, the faces of his enemies were ghastly, fitting, brutal masks which in some way he must annihilate. Blood crept down his face and blurred his eyes, but he shook it away and did not notice it. He had been fighting, he did not know how long; it might have been minutes, it might have been inestimable hours, nor did that matter—there were two reptiles before him whom he must crush, and he would do it. The ghosts of dead warriors whispered this to him, and he knew that it was so.

Larkin scarcely realized it, but the instinct of self-defense had caused him to seek the wall of the adjacent building, and there, although the odds still were two to one, he was at any rate protected against treacherous attacks from the rear. Nor are two to one odds so unequal as they appear, when the one is a man and the two are of the slinking litter of woman-accosters. In the fury of that mad battle, the grim silence of which was broken only by muttered oaths and the thud of blows, Larkin realized this, and it nerved him. What was a flow of blood, save as it blinded one's eyes and interfered with the best use of one's fists? What were contusions and bruises? He might mind them to-morrow, but to-night a task was set for him: he must give a lesson in etiquette to two of the scum of the big city, and it would be for her. No matter what the odds, he must fight on until the end, the right end, was attained.

A MILITANT CUPID

BY

It was finished, and Larkin did not know it. All he knew was that, in some way, his fist had reached one of the brutish masks, and then it had disappeared. He waited for more blows against which he must guard, and they did not come. He wiped a red mist from his eyes, and looked about him. At his feet lay one of the combatants, evidently just returning to consciousness, and retreating steps in the distance indicated that the other had slunk away after the manner of his kind, when it became a man to man contest. Directly the other fellow gained his feet, and, finding himself unmolested, also ran. Then Larkin sat down and investigated his condition as well as that condition would permit.

It was the roaring in his head and the tendency of the lights along the street to leave their places and join in a sort of goblin dance which principally interfered with the investigation, but gradually the roaring ceased and the lights wearied of eccentricity, and then he discovered that, beyond various painful cuts and bruises, he was uninjured. At any rate, no bones were broken; he could walk home, and thus avoid the possible coming of one of the police who occasionally strayed into that out-of-the-way neighborhood.

He sat up at length, somewhat tottering, but as he did so the lights along the street resumed their hobgoblin dance, and he stood still, waiting for them to resume their normal behavior before he made his way home. Then, for the first time, he wondered what had become of the girl. She was not far away when the fight began, after that he had forgotten her, and now she was gone. Unconsciously he had hoped that she would appreciate that he had defended her, but—oh, well, she knew her own business. When a girl has turned a fel so sure of it was he that he did not even look to see whence the voice came, but started on. He would be controlled by no sick fancy. The thing to do now was to get his disabled body home and to bed before his mind showed other signs of weakness. Curious, by the way, that the lights again had begun to dance just because he had fancied he heard the voice of one who probably would call him no more. Evidently he had forgotten to forget her, but now he would do better. He would—

Jim. No mistake about it this time; no distracted fancy. It was Her voice. She was coming down the street behind him. She was running to overtake him; Her hands were in his; Her face was—yes, no mistake, it was against his shoulder. The shoulder had felt somewhat battered a moment before, but now it was all right, oh, perfectly all right. She was half-speaking, half-sobbing, something—was it to him? It was—

"Jim, dear Jim"—yes, She said it—"why didn't you wait for me?"—ran for help for you, you splendid fellow!"—She really said that, too—"and I couldn't find anybody, and then I came back, and you were gone. Tell me, dear, dear Jim, that you are not killed!"

Say, did somebody say that Jim Larkin had had trouble with the sweetest, and the dearest girl in the world?—then there was an unbridgeable gulf between them? Then who was this who was sometimes crying, sometimes laughing, and sometimes doing a little of both in one and the same moment, against his shoulder? Who was a who did not protest was a brawny arm, with a bruised fist at the end of it, stole about her? That was the way She used to treat Jim Larkin, but somebody said there was trouble. And who was it, too, whose lips responded to the pressure of his own as if they were quite enjoying themselves? Never any mind about the one dear, sweetest and most gracious answer to all of these questions. Jim knew what it was, and She knew what it was, and nobody else has the least right to do more than guess, and guess without telling anybody, at that.

It is an interesting fact, and possibly worthy of scientific investigation, that, although Jim Larkin received neither medical nor surgical attention, he almost immediately recovered from the effect of his bruises. There can be no doubt of it, for, within five minutes, he assured Her no less than seven times that he was not hurt at all. The fact is mentioned here because it ought to serve as the basis of several profound treatises by learned gentlemen, entitled, "The Co-Relationship of Wounds and Recovering Her," or something of that sort.

There is one more, and most convincing proof of Mr. Larkin's complete recovery. They had reached her home, for he was able to accompany her, and, after they had said good night in the good, old-fashioned way of which some people know, she turned to him, naturally being anxious, and said:

"And you are perfectly sure, Jim, that you are not hurt?"

"Naw, not at all."

"I am so sorry, dear, that you got into this trouble on my account."

"Well, I ain't. I'm mighty glad of it," said Jim Larkin.

And there is a large number of people who would agree with him.

bottom socialism means the denial of the individual initiative. That is the ultimate morass of difficulty into which it must logically fall unless in the process of making over the social system it be guided by the constant and thoughtful co-operation of every voter. It is precisely the more capable and intelligent men who are most remiss in attention to this great civic duty; it is necessary that these men be sharply rounded up to the performance of their obligation as citizens.

I have said little concerning the need of due regard for civic responsibility in suppressing political corruption. If men acquire the habit of doing their political duty it will be effective in regard to all details, in so far as any system can accomplish it.

Certain it is, reform is not feasible by sudden enthusiasms; it is the steady performance of duty, and the resultant acquaintance with the minutiae, that give power to control and direct affairs for the general good. If all men were careful and conscientious we would need no safety devices; they are made for those who are indifferent. The machinery of state requires men—all the men and mind it can get to insure that the governor is kept in working order so that the engine may not race and wreck itself. That is the ground of my plea for compulsory voting.

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded.)

tired from the office of mayor when Clinton White was elected, two years ago, has been again chosen, and it remains to be seen whether he will permit his second administration to be dominated, as his first was, by Tom Fox, the Democratic boss. Possibly the re-made mayor can rise above his former self in this regard, and if he can and does, due credit should be given him. In some other respects Beard's first term as mayor was by no means a failure. The event has proved that the Republicans' choice of John E. Sullivan as a candidate for mayor was not a happy one; but it is likely that any other candidate they could have put up at this time would have been defeated by the combination which was behind Beard. A really more important and regrettable result of the defeat on popular vote of a wholesome saloon restriction ordinance, which it is said the Prohibitionists joined with the liquor dealers and gamblers to vote down.

Shall Standing Timber Be Exempt From Taxation? In the annual convention of the county assessors, held in Chico recently, the question whether there ought to be a different method of taxing timber lands, in order that destruction of the forests might be delayed instead of hastened, was given consideration which was at least respectful. One of the assessors from mountain counties read a paper which presented this view, and the proposition appears to have been discussed rather keenly, although it was argued that so long as T. B. Walker and other great timber land owners are not compelled to pay more than fifteen or twenty-five cents per acre each year they will not be driven to cut the timber to save themselves from being eaten up by taxes. It is Mr. Walker's claim that he is a victim of the income, and is running a literary bureau, and conducting quite a campaign of publicity which is nominally in the interest of conservation, though T. B. Walker's private interest in it is very apparent. Yet, after all, there really is a large question of public interest also in it.

Shall Cash Also Be Exempt From Taxation? Another point of interest was developed, according to newspaper reports of this meeting. In the course of a discussion between Theodore Sell and John Ginty, the latter speaking for the banks, it was argued that to compel banks to reveal the commercial deposits of their customers, in order to give the assessor a chance to assess them, would be to produce all-around bankruptcy. That was figured out in this way: If the banks keep the secret of their depositors, and the latter lie to the assessor, telling him they have no deposits, when they have; if the banks should be required to tell on them the customers would draw their money all out of the banks just before assessment day, in order to be able to do so without detection, and as the banks could not meet such a universal demand, they would go down. Therefore the present arrangement is best, and universal perjury is the safeguard against universal bankruptcy. Shall we lend our money or break all our banks every Thanksgiving? Why not exempt from taxation cash which is not wealth but only an order on society for wealth?

Gillett Will Make Race On Good Roads Scheme The piece de resistance of the Gillett administration is his scheme to bond the state for eighteen millions in order that the politicians of California may construct some fine long stretches of macadam for the automobilists to scorch over. It leaks out from rather reliable sources that James N. Gillett will try for a new nomination for governor, and base his candidacy on the good roads measure in order that he may have four years in which to work out the problem. This will mean a great deal to the manufacturers, vendors and menders of automobiles, considerable to roadhouse keepers, something to tourist hotels, and perhaps some good sales for real estate dealers, inasmuch as it will tend to make California attractive to swift people. Incidentally it will mean a vast expenditure on the part of the taxpayers, principal and interest, and will not mean very much to the farmer whose need for good roads is between his farm and the nearest railway station. Insufficient though this claim is for a second nomination and election to the gubernatorial office, it is without doubt the best card Governor Gillett has to play.

Rights and Wrongs Of the Automobile No doubt the automobile interests would contribute handsomely to Governor Gillett's campaign fund if he were to hazard his political fortunes on the $18,000,000 proposition. The automobile is with us. Its owner has a right to say something about roads, and those who must pay for raising and keeping in repair the roads also have a right to say something about him. That something is to this effect: Nothing not made of iron or steel will stand the wear and tear of the automobile as it is and as it wants to run and does run. Either the automobiles must be put up on tall wheels, to reduce the suction on the "humpion" on the roads, or they must be geared down to twenty miles an hour. Else they must be taxed to within an inch of their lives to pay for the roads they destroy. Until this problem is somehow solved what folly to propose an eighteen-million-dollar experiment! Talk of expert knowledge of road building is nonsense. There is no expert road-making known that will stand the sucking and bumping of a low-wheeled automobile going forty miles an hour. The only kind of road that will stand it is a railroad. Perhaps, however, the roads can render a more important service than he knows by going before the people and, by making himself and his good road scheme ridiculous in their eyes, setting wiser brains than his to working out a real good roads policy toward which the state may work.

SHORT TALKS ON DOMESTIC SCIENCE

That science which fits girls for their high work is commonly known as Domestic Science. This big subject was given an unfortunate introductory name, for to the majority, the word domestic means everything that is undesirable about a house, or in other words, about the menial side of life. When this sense of the word is taken only the woman is meant and this, of course, means "household servant." Can any but a dwarfed mind interpret domestic science in such a way? As an adjective the word domestic means "pertaining to the house or household affairs; private, home-made."

Some have attempted to remedy this seeming mistake by calling the subject Household Economics. Can a better definition of Domestic Science be given? Do teachers of this subject make this definition clear in the minds of their pupils? Lack of interest in the subject and snobishness concerning it have their beginning at the very first lesson, if this sane, wholesome idea is not conveyed to the young mind.

"Definition is the kernel of education, and the use of the best word to express his meaning is the half-battle for the woman means that."

Sufficient stress is rarely laid upon the two fundamentals of life and education, the knowledge of right living and the knowledge of English grammar. Domestic Science in the public institutions and schools is yet in its infancy, while in the home it is certainly in its second childhood. The latter is the more deplorable. The lax methods at home have made greater demand upon schools and of girls. The training has thereby been more fully equalized with that of boys.

Economic government for woman means that every girl in our land shall be taught a trade or a profession whereby she can earn a living. It means more than this. It means that we must see to it that she earns her living; that we blot out pauperism from respectable families and from our homes; that we demand there shall be no more pauper desires of wanting something for nothing. This education will be needed by fathers, husbands, lovers and brothers fully as much as by mothers, wives, sweethearts and sisters—and this education, which we know we can not make rational beings out of the indigent poor, those who are helpless and in poverty when fortune flies.

So many contend that owning a home is mere sentiment; possibly so, probably so, undoubtedly so, but, if so, with the existing conditions, we need not fear an over indulgence. Apartments, boarding houses, lavish expenditure and consequent shallow thinking, shattered nerves and enfeebled bodies seem to prevail. Can there be much sentiment in an apartment crowded by a score of people, where not and for whom we care not, do we use with the same respect or pleasure old furnishings belonging to some stranger, and in such an environment are the dear little homey, comfy things done for those who come back from the bustling world? No, it is all too conventional! Ruskin has well said, "We have warped the word 'economy' in our English language into a meaning which it has no business to bear." In our use of it, it invariably signifies merely saving or spending.

Economy more means saving money than it means spending money. It means the administration of a home, its stewardship, spending or saving money or time or anything else to the best possible advantage. With this latter definition in mind, Francis Gannon's "Eugenics" and Mrs. Richards' "Eugenics" seem to supply the two words needed to express the upward and onward steps of the growth of a most vital science. Eugenics or right environment will, of course, in its teaching couple hygiene and the importance of wider knowledge in sex relation. The ignorance of these sub-subjects is so widespread that no wonder the results are appalling.

In our agricultural universities all sides of lower animal environments are discussed, and congress appropriates three million dollars yearly for research work along this line, while for man only twenty thousand dollars have been expended and there has been no appropriation since 1906. Should we wonder, when we read in a paper that graham bread gives more nutrition than white bread and in a few months in the same paper we find just the opposite view, or that human beings so often represent quantity rather than quality?

Research along any line can not be made without money and scientific men are usually not of the money class. Because of ignorance and lack of respect for the subject we find classes in physiology, anatomy and hygiene bored to death—or else asleep—that is, unless they are medical students. Is it too far reaching to suggest that osteopathy is a strong co-efficient of Domestic Science or Household Economics, Eugenics and Euthenics?

A ROUNDABOUT MAIL DELIVERY.

One of the most remarkable mail routes in the world is that which a letter journeys in getting from Beebe Plain, Vt., to Beebe Plain, Quebec, Canada, says the Cleveland Leader. While the two offices are within ten feet of each other—are located in the same room, in fact—a letter mailed from one office to the other must make a trip of 294 miles—sixty-seven miles in Canada and the rest in the United States.

The plain old fashioned store building, which is situated on the international boundary line, contains both the United States and Canadian offices. There are separate entrances to each, but both are in the same room, have the same lobby, and there are no partitions to mark the division between the domain of Uncle Sam and the possession of King Edward.

"If you mail a letter from the Vermont side addressed to the Quebec side," says the postmaster, "it goes from here to the junction, then to Newport, then to White River Junction and back to Lennoxville, Quebec, over the Boston and Maine. There it is transferred to the Grand Trunk and goes to a south-bound mail pouch and comes to Stanstead Junction and then back to this same building, a distance of 294 miles."

FOURTEEN ERRORS OF LIFE.

The fourteen mistakes of life Judge Rentoul told the Bartholomew Club of London are: To attempt to set up our own standard of right and wrong and expect everybody to conform to it.

To try to measure the enjoyment of others by our own.

To expect uniformity of opinion in this world.

To look for judgment and experience in youth.

To endeavor to mould all dispositions alike.

Not to yield in unimportant trifles.

To look for perfection in our own actions.

To worry ourselves and others about what can not be remedied.

Not to alleviate if we can all that needs alleviation.

Not to make allowances for the weaknesses of others.

To consider anything impossible that we can not ourselves perform.

To believe only what our finite minds can grasp.

To live as if the moment, the time, the day were so important that it would live forever.

To estimate people by some outside quality, for it is that within which makes the man.

The University Club of San Diego, which is composed of the leading professional and business men of that city, has moved into its new and elegant quarters at Fourth and A streets. The club membership is rapidly increasing.

SHEAR WIT

There is a destiny that shapes our ends: the dressmaker, too, sometimes gets busy in this direction.—Montgomery Advertiser.

"Who is the heroine of your novel?" "Well," answered the authoress, "after seeing the photographs and advertisements used by the publishers, I guess I am."—Washington Star.

"Pa," said little Willie Skulebagger, "teacher told us to be prepared tomorrow to tell what meter 'The Charge of the Light Brigade' is in." "That's easy," replied W. Skulebagger the elder. "Gas meter, of course."—Catholic Standard and Times.

"Well, they've elected Blingsby to congress." "What! Did that soulless, truckling, low-down politician—" "Yes, and he told me he would push your name for local postmaster." "Oh!—Blingsby! Why I didn't understand the name. That fellow's all right, and I've always said so. He's got the makings of a statesman—Blingsby!"—Lippincott's.

A Yonkers teacher says she was instructing her class in composition. After a talk of several minutes, she wrote two sentences on the blackboard, one grammatically wrong, the other a misstatement of fact. The sentences were: "The hen has three legs. Who done it?" "Willie," she said, "go to the blackboard and show where the fault lies in these sentences." Willie did so. To her astonishment, he wrote: "The hen never done it; God done it."—Yonkers Statesman.

"What Is Your Money Doing?" is the title of a booklet issued by a bank and mailed to persons not now depositors. An official in a Yonkers institution says that one of these advertising devices came back to the bank that sent it out bearing on the front cover this reply: "Buying beefsteak at 28 cents a pound, eggs at 45 cents a dozen, milk at 8 cents a quart, paying a washerwoman $1.50 a week, house rent at $50 a month—But what's the use?"—Yonkers Statesman.

Little Robert and Jim, the grocer's delivery man, were great friends, and on the momentous day of Robert's promotion from dresses to knickerbockers, he waited eagerly in front of the house for Jim's coming, says Everybody. But the delivery man, when he came, busied himself about his wagon, without seeming to see anything unusual in his small chum's appearance. Robert stood around hopefully, in various conscious positions, until he could stand it no longer. "Jim," he burst out at last, "is your horses 'raid of pants?"

Near the approach of the final examinations, a few years ago, one of the law professors was cautioning his class against neglecting a thorough review of the semester's work and pointing out in a general way what the examination would cover. "I'll pause now to answer any questions," the professor said, "and then I must go to prepare the examination papers and hurry them to the printer." Nobody had any question for a moment and then a solemn thoughtful-looking student in the rear of the room arose and signified his desire to ask something. Says he: "If I may ask, who is the printer?"—Cleveland Leader.

The economy practised upon the Great Northern Railroad is well known among railroad men, one of the staunchest believers in the old saying that "Economy is the road to wealth" being the president, J. J. Hill. The story is told in the West that upon one occasion when President Hill was looking over a stretch of track he found a new railroad spike. Taking it to the boss in charge of that stretch of road, he handed it to him and said: "You must be more careful. Nothing must be wasted. Pick up all your spikes as you go along." "Why, Mr. Hill," replied the boss promptly, "I've been payin' a man a salary for three years to hunt for that spike."—Lippincott's.

PERSONALIA

Henry Sienkiewicz, author of "Quo Vadis," says he can write to his satisfaction only when he uses scarlet ink.

Mme. Bernhardt will soon enact the role of Mieris, a blind woman, in Brieux's "La Fol." It is the part Mrs. Patrick Campbell is playing in Sir Hubert Tree's London production of the drama.

Mrs. Dewey C. Bailey, president of the Denver Woman's Club, has been endorsed by the State Woman's Club of Colorado for the nomination for congress in the First district. Mrs. Bailey is the wife of the United States marshal of Colorado.

Oscar Strauss' new operetta, "Didi," was produced for the first time in Vienna at the Carl Theater on October 23rd, with only slight success, mainly owing to a weak and monotonous libretto. Some chansons and waltzes were encored, though the audience was not enthusiastic.

The retirement of Jules Claretie, a veteran litterateur, whose administration of the Comedie Francaise has been so successful, is now under discussion. It will not take place until after the present season, when M. Claretie will have attained the age of 70 years and completed a quarter of a century in charge of the theater of Moliere.

By a decision of Judge Stockbridge of the city court of Baltimore, Mrs. Ada Smith Lang has become the Socialist candidate for the Legislature in the Second district. It does not follow, however, that if the people rally at the polls for Mrs. Lang she will be allowed to take her seat. Judge Stockbridge calls attention to the right of the house of delegates to pass upon the qualification of its members.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Legislature at Work.

Last week we organized our legislature in session, elected its principal officers and appointed the greater part of the subordinates. To-day the gavel of the president of the senate and speaker of the assembly rap for order, the chaplains offer prayer and, for five minutes, there is order and dignity in both houses. In five minutes more the prayers are forgotten, the chaplains take their departure and the legislators begin to "do politics."

Some member, more alert than the rest (or possibly by prearrangement), addresses the presiding officer. His name is called in recognition and the member holds aloft a package of legal looking documents. "I desire to introduce these bills," he says. A page runs to him, takes the bills and runs to the desk of the clerk in front of the presiding officer. The clerk reads the titles of the bills. Then what?

Our constitution declares that, "No law shall be passed except by bill. Nor shall any bill be put upon its final passage until the same, with the amendments thereto, shall have been printed for the use of the members; nor shall any bill become a law unless the same be read on three several days in each house unless, in case of urgency, two-thirds of the house where such bill may be pending shall, by a vote of yeas and nays, dispense with this provision." The provision is very frequently dispensed with in the interests of expedition of the work in hand. "On the final passage of all bills they shall be read at length and the vote shall be by yeas and nays on each bill separately."

There are, perhaps, never fewer than 2,000 bills introduced in any California legislature during the session. It is impossible that any legislator shall be able, in the course of any session, however long, to look into the merits of each one of the 2,000 bills offered for his consideration. Therefore every legislature is practically swamped at the outset. The only way to grapple with the job at all is to divide the membership up into committees and parcel the work of inspection of the bills out among these committees.

The senate has thirty standing committees. Besides such special committees as may from time to time be required. The assembly has fifty-two. These committees are commissioned especially to consider such bills as refer to such subjects as agriculture and dairying, hauling, commerce and navigation, corporations, county government, drainage of swamp and overflowed lands, education, elections and election laws, fish and game, fruit and vine interests, hospitals and asylums, irrigation, mines and mining, military affairs, and so on to the end of the chapter of subjects that concern the public welfare, not omitting a committee on public morals, sometimes made up of saloon men and others engaged in preying upon, instead of praying for, the public. Then there are committees appointed to see to it that bills passed are properly enrolled, engrossed and placed in the hands of the governor for approval or rejection; committees on contingent expenses of each house, committees to determine what attaches are required and how they shall be appointed, committees to see that the requisite printing is done and that unnecessary printing is not done; committees to make rules for the government of each house, for the constitution empowers each house to make such rules for its own convenience as it may require. Besides these committees, and others, the senators from San Francisco have a committee of their own, to which is referred all matters relating to San Francisco. In the assembly are similar committees from both San Francisco and Los Angeles.

But the most important committees are the judiciary, of which each house has one, generally containing all the lawyers in each house; and the finance committee of the senate and the ways-and-means committee of the assembly. All measures about whose legality there is any question, and their name is legion, go to the judiciary committees sooner or later. All bills that carry appropriations go to the finance committee of the senate and to the ways-and-means committee of the assembly.

And "no bill shall become a law without the concurrence of a majority of the members elected to each house," the constitution tells us.

The reader will see, therefore, that all the legislating done has to be done twice. It has to be such as commends itself to two separate bodies of men, at opposite ends of the capitol building, one body comprising forty men, of whom twenty-one must vote aye, and the other comprising eighty men of whom forty-one must vote aye, in order to enact a law. Nor is that all. The governor of the state must pass his judgment upon each measure before it can become a law unless twenty-seven members of the senate, and fifty-four of the assembly, override his veto. Of course the governor may neglect or refuse to exercise his veto power and suffer a bill passed by a mere majority to become a law, but that is looked upon as dodging the issue and is seldom resorted to.

Now it would seem, would it not, that with all these checks and hindrances to legislation little bad legislation ought to be enacted? But such is not the fact. A great deal of unwise, ill considered and unwholesome legislation is enacted at each session, in part because of the avalanche of bills introduced and the lack of time for their proper consideration, and in part for the reason that many small men and relatively few able ones are sent to senate or assembly. The personnel is mainly made up of legislative tinkers who tinker at the laws as their whims prompt them without breadth of view and with no great integrity of purpose.

In our next lesson we shall follow the work of legislation a little deeper.

Mrs. Mary Coonie is said to be the richest full blooded Eskimo woman in the world. Though she can neither read nor write she has accumulated a large amount of wealth, consisting of mining property and the largest private reindeer herd in the world. Besides young reindeer there are said to be more than two thousand animals in the herd all bearing her brand. Mrs. Coonie employs as her private secretary an Englishman who is a graduate of Oxford. By Eskimo standards Mrs. Coonie is the best dressed woman in the Arctic region.

The Leaven In the Lump.

COMMISERATION IS SOMETIMES HARDER to bear than pain, pity than enmity. For the past week the interior press, not to speak of the eastern, has rung all possible changes on "Poor Old San Francisco," but San Francisco is no Sodom nor is it a Gomorrah. Francis J. Heney received 25,992 votes in the late election, every one of them cast by a man who can be counted on in any emergency to stand for Right Things and to fight for them again and again. The leaven is sufficient for the lump and, in time, it will work its salvation out. It needs to learn some lessons in political efficiency, and especially how not to be divided against itself. We mourn not as one without hope.

Majority Rule At Berkeley.

NO PRINCIPLE IS MORE fundamentally democratic than that the majority shall rule and, wherever the principles of democracy are strictly applied, nothing less than a majority is permitted to rule. This principle is fundamental in the Berkeley plan of government. Under it the two highest for each office in the primary election automatically become the candidates at the final election and no others are possible. Had the Berkeley system prevailed in San Francisco McCarthy could not have been elected inasmuch as he received 3,882 less than a majority of the votes cast. The Berkeley plan has much to commend it. It is sound in principle and, so far, has worked admirably in practice.

A Game Old Sport.

THE REPORT THAT JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER witnessed a sparring exhibition given by big Jim Jeffries in New York, and pronounced Jeffries a great man, gives credence to the declaration of an old lady resident of Cleveland who remembers when John D. was the proud possessor of a brace of bull pups that he kept harnessed together with collars and connecting strap and led about the streets with him by a chain. In those days he was regarded as sporty and he does not appear wholly to have conquered the sinful spirit even yet. Jeffries is a big man, but not a great.

Doth He Protest Too Much?

IF THE CHAMPIONS OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT and his policies are out of conceit with the President it cannot be because of any lack on his part of protesting his loyalty to the Roosevelt policies. He has renewed his fealty to those policies as often as once a day during the fifty-seven days he was swinging around the circle and, about every time he did it, Ballinger has chipped in with: "Them's my sentiments." After all it is not a question of, How do you feel, Mr. President? but How do you do?

The Bitter With the Sweet.

MANY MEN WHO HAVE CHORTLED over the defeat of Heney have professed great grief over the election of McCarthy. What are they taking the intelligent public for? The election of McCarthy was the consideration given for the defeating of Heney and after the goods have been ordered and the package delivered according to contract is a poor time to squeal at the price. It is the part of manhood to take the bitter with the sweet without a grimace for there certainly were none so verdant as not to know the terms of the contract. It was: "Put our fellows in office and we will keep your grafters out of prison." There was a full quid pro quo. Why should not both parties be happy?

Hurting the Town.

MANY NEWSPAPERS HAVE FOUND many ways for hurting their respective towns, but it was left for the Fresno Mirror to suggest that the "abolition of the saloon will hurt the moral tone of the community." Of course the converse must follow that the reopening of fifty or a hundred saloons must elevate the moral standards. Great discovery! Or was the Mirror deliberately trying to hurt the town?

The Fresno Republican.

THERE IS NOT A MORE INFLUENTIAL daily paper in California than the Fresno Republican. It covers the San Joaquin valley like a blanket, owns more automobiles and hires more rural carriers at bigger wages than any other paper in the state, prints as much telegraphic news as any paper in San Francisco and, in the domain of policy, does all the things which a prudent, safe and sane metropolitan journal would not dare to do for fear of its life, but with the result that it is kept poor buying new equipment to enable it to keep pace with its growing business and is now being pushed to the verge of suspension of payment by the necessity for erecting a new office building 75x150 feet, two stories high, to supplement an office building erected only six years ago, 75x150 feet and two stories high, which will still be occupied after the new supplemental building is finished. It has jumped the party traces, bearded the Southern Pacific lion in its den, talked religion as well as politics, and new crazes as well as religion. The only palliation offered for its eccentricities is that it is uniformly on the right side, no matter which way the crowd may be headed. Traditional journalism like traditional dogmatism is mainly not so.

Not Less But More.

THE SANTA CRUZ NEWS THINKS that, "The less we mix religion with politics the better." The better for which, religion or politics? Substitute "church" for "religion" and The California Weekly is agreed; but that religion which does not stay by a man in sickness and in health, in poverty and in wealth, in politics and profession, in prayer meeting and in business, on Sunday and all through the week, will be of no more use at St. Peter's toll gate than a dead transfer on a street car. In fact it will not be as good for the ticket taker will scrutinize more closely. If the forces of evil get together, as they do, the forces of righteousness have got to, and where shall we look for forces of righteousness well aggregated if not in a church fellowship and affiliation?

Aldrich Wants Information.

WITHOUT "LETTIN' ON" that he knows anything about finance, Nelson W. Aldrich is asking the American people to tell him what they know about the central banking idea, and other ideas relating to money. He shall not say that The California Weekly scorned the request: All currency should be tied to gold and take potluck with it up and down. The only place on earth where the requirements of elasticity in currency can be instantly and accurately known, and complied with, is through the windows of the paying and receiving tellers at the banks where the citizens transact their everyday business. Further than this deponent sayeth not.

A CONSPIRACY TO DOWN TAFT.

It is reported from Washington that friends of the President are suspicious that partisans of Roosevelt have entered into a conspiracy to discredit the administration of William Howard Taft, with the view of making Theodore Roosevelt their candidate for the presidency at the next election. That any such purpose has taken organized form is unbelievable. That there is in the breasts of impatient millions a wish, strongly felt, that Roosevelt were still at the helm of affairs in this country, goes without saying. That this is so is partly the fault and partly the misfortune of the President.

The President's limited and qualified, but palpable, certificate of character given to Nelson A. Aldrich at Boston rubbed the nation the wrong way of the fur.

His Winona speech on the tariff proved indigestible.

The President's failure at San Francisco to make any reference to the herculean struggle here going on for the establishment of equality before the law, left a dark brown taste in the mouth of the Pacific Coast.

His defense of Ballinger has not restored Ballinger to public confidence. While it was accepted as true, so far as the President knew, the feeling of distrust of Ballinger has continued, and the consensus of opinion is that the President has himself been deceived as to Ballinger.

The President's insistence that the government shall act only so far as the law authorizes or commands it to act for defense against corporate aggression, has begotten a feeling of disquietude in the public mind through fear that the spirit of the law may be subordinated to the letter. The belief is that wherever this is done predatory interests will gain their point.

The President's cabinet was not such as the general public would have liked to see him make up. It wanted Garfield retained in possession of the Interior portfolio and it has been suspicious of Wickersham. The Crane incident has made it suspicious of Knox.

Perhaps some of the champions of Roosevelt may have been unreasonable enough to anticipate that President Taft would pursue the methods, as well as adopt the policies, of Roosevelt, forgetting that the judicial type of mind is different from the executive, and that the temperamental endowments of Taft are dissimilar to those of Roosevelt.

Nevertheless, the square deal is the essence of Rooseveltism and no true follower of Roosevelt or friend of his policies is going to render a final verdict against President Taft until he has a reasonable time in which to prove the quality of his executive statesmanship.

The coming session of congress will be the testing ground for the Taft character and the Taft administration. During that session his friends will develop and his enemies will align themselves. By that session will his administration be judged. Every eye will be upon its every act and the President will be forced to show his hand step by step. The friends of Roosevelt will be fair to Taft. They will be fair to Taft through loyalty for Roosevelt if for no other reason; but it is not too much to say that, as the case now stands, the President will have to "show them." There no longer runs any presumption in his favor that will disarm his critics or bolster his friends in advance.

WILL IT BE WORTH THE RISK?

For many years frontier merchants did a fine business selling firewater and fire arms, gunpowder and lead, to the Indians, but afterward it cost the United States government half a company of soldiers, and half a million dollars, to kill every hostile Indian that was killed. That form of merchandising did not prove profitable to the public and had to be penalized with severity.

Men of great executive capacity and acquisitive genius have mobilized the social villainies and taught them political efficiency. It was by organizing and centralizing the tenderloin vote in New York that Tammany Hall has held the government of New York and, through New York, has proven a powerful and baneful influence in national affairs. It was the tenderloin, and its patrons that, in the late election in San Francisco, first registered as Republicans for the defeat of Maunz and then voted as Union Labor party men for the election of McCarthy. There are more "cadets" and "maquereaux" in the redlight districts of our cities than decent people have any idea of and they all have votes. Add to these the patrons of their white slaves and the red-light vote is to be reckoned with.

In old times a Spanish army that failed of getting as much foreign loot as it hungered for was as likely to sack the most convenient Spanish city as any other. Suppose that the red-light voters, failing to make the white slave trade as profitable as they could wish, even though unhindered in its prosecution, were to take it into their heads that the public service corporations might furnish richer booty than the public treasury or their own unholy trade? It shall go hard with the cunning "cadets" and "maquereaux" if they do not improve on the lessons in practical politics they have received from malefactors of great wealth or their hired agents. Where, then, will lie the safety of the fortunes which these Big Ones will have left to their children? What guaranty can any government afford that looks for its sources of power to the least form of human being that walks the earth? There are not many who realize that the scum of the earth is the cream of the army which the Crockers, Murphys, Herrins, Lynches and Sullivans employ for the subjugation of honest citizenship. By splitting the better element on issues of party or policy, and plumping with the vote that has neither party nor policy, but is held together by the cohesive power of graft, effective political power may be exercised.

It must be admitted that the man who can make politics a business has advantage over the citizen who merely gives now and again an hour to public concerns and begrudges the time it takes for him to go to the polls to vote. The maquereau, like the paid political manipulator and odd-jobs man, is a man of leisure. By owning three or four victims of his lust he lives in affluence and can give all his time to political planning and to the executing of plans. Trained to efficiency, suppose he essays an independent political career?

It is a scientific truth that every wrong carries within itself the seeds of its own destruction. The political bureau that governs carries within itself the seeds of its own death. The forces that carried the election in this city last week may find, if they will look for it, their own death warrant written into their own constitution, but they will not look. They shut their eyes and say, "After us the flood." With their destruction will go the destruction of all the institutions whose integrity they sought to undermine, whose intents they prostituted to evil purposes. In the day of retribution and social reorganization the good is, as in the great fire, impartially consumed with the bad. That is where the interest of the so-called better element in public affairs becomes vital, else the devil might be suffered to claim his own without protest.

GENTLEMEN OF THE BAR.

Gentlemen of the California Bar: In common with your brethren of other states, you have been taking the direction of least resistance. As a profession you have lost your esprit de corps. You have not only not kept pace in the administration of justice with the requirements of an advancing civilization, but you have distinctly lost ground. Within the memory of practitioners now living you have permitted bench and bar to degenerate in ability, in learning and in integrity of character. There is no longer equality before the law except where the litigants pitted against each other are fairly equal in wealth and in social and political influence. You are under indictment at the bar of public opinion, and that indictment includes the bench, the bar, the laws that have been enacted, and the lawyer legislators who drafted those laws and pushed them through the legislatures, mainly to meet private ends. It is in vain for you to regret a too palpable public lack of respect for the laws and their administration. They will be respected when they are made worthy of respect and not sooner. It is up to you more than to all others to make them worthy.

Here are some hard facts that should make you put your thinking cap on if you have not already donned them. In New York and Illinois there are fourteen times as many judges in proportion to population as in England. In California there are fifty-four times as many, and every legislature is importuned to create more of the little fellows, mainly men who fare indifferently well in private practice.

There are now, in the United States, more than 100 homicides per year per million of inhabitants against fewer than 27 a quarter of a century ago. Our ratio of murders to population is from ten to twenty times greater than in Britain and in those nations of Europe lying west of the Danube and north of the Alps. The fault mainly lies with the administration of justice and the fault with the administration of justice mainly lies at the door of an indifferent, and irresponsible and overflowing bar.

You have tardily formed a State Bar Association. Your delegates to your convention have been told some startling truths and have listened to some inspiring addresses. There is no obstacle in the way of a reformed judiciary not of your own letting if not your own making. In common with the rest of our citizenship you gentlemen of the bar have suffered the government of California to fall into the hands of an incorporated plutocracy that has made our laws, named our judges and done more than any other influence to degrade the legal profession. It was that influence that defeated the Commonwealth Club bills at the last session of the legislature, that effected the passage of the infamous change of venue bill, for the vetoing of which Governor Gillett obtained a not too well-earned, or thoroughly established, reputation for official independence. You will have that same malign influence to fight whenever you seriously attempt to reform the laws or to create a non-partisan, well-paid and efficient judiciary.

Have you the manhood in your ranks to make a winning fight for political liberty as well as for equality before the law? If you have, God bless you and your profession, which should rank among the noblest pursuits followed by men! If you have not then may God d-d-do the other thing to you and to your profession. Whoever fights for justice fights for God, humanity and country. Whoever neglects or refuses so to fight is a skulker and a camp-follower if not an apostate and traitor. The whole issue is comprehended in that earth-born cry for liberty and equality that comes to us through blood and tears down the ages.

Gentlemen of the bar, more than all others, the issue is up to you.

Oakland's Forward Movement.

The coming week Oakland will hazard new fortunes. On Monday it will vote on a proposal to issue $3,733,000 in city bonds to be used for the construction of municipal wharves, a city hall and a fire-proof fire alarm and police telegraph building. The very next day Oakland and a number of her suburban districts will vote on consolidation.

For many years Oakland was so under the domination of certain greedy corporations as to take the collective courage out of her people. They voted down everything they came to. In recent years Oakland has enjoyed a progressive and encouragingly honest city government with the result that new courage has been imparted to the voting public and the whole east bay district is minded to go forward.

Oakland needs the proposed wharves. Unless she builds them herself they will not be built. If she does build them the car and the ship will be brought together on the east side of the bay as well as on the west and the commercial possibilities of San Francisco bay will be enhanced.

Annexation should carry, too. It ought to carry whether taxation in the outlying districts will thereby be increased or not. The suburbs are necessary to the moral and social health of the parent city. They will offset the redlight vote. No suburb should be contented to be a parasite. May success attend these worthy enterprises, one and all.

The Case of Glavis.

When President Taft undertook to reinstate Secretary Ballinger in public confidence, he cast out L. S. Glavis neck and heels. There were two courses open to Mr. Glavis: to hide his diminished head or take his version of the affair to the public. He chose the latter course and, thanks to Collier's Weekly, his letter is now the talk of the United States.

He has made out a strong case. He has shown first that he was striving to stave off the consummation of the sales of coal lands in Alaska until congress could adopt a more rational plan for utilizing the common wealth for the common good, a most laudable purpose if it could be accomplished by methods legislative, executive or judicial—even Fabian.

He has shown that in taking the cases of the Alaskan claimants under two years after retiring from the office of Land Commissioner Mr. Ballinger disregarded the plain provisions of the statute.

He has shown from the records that Ballinger went before the public lands committee of the House of Representatives and there argued for the enactment of a law designed to enable the Alaskan coal lands claimants to perfect their titles and secure their patents, contrary to the highest interests of the people of the United States.

He has shown a shiftiness on the part of Ballinger and his subordinates in dealing with these claims certainly not creditable if not criminal in a moral, though not a legal sense. Mr. Glavis has distinctly improved his status by taking the issue to the people.

Who Is Going to Washington?

The National Rivers and Harbors Congress is to assemble at the national capital on the 8th to 10th of December. Who is going to attend it? This question becomes important in the light of the truth that investigation has disclosed the fact that access to the waterways of the nation is vested in the possession of the railroads. Unless something is done to shake them loose the railroads will monopolize the waterways as surely as they now monopolize the track-ways of their own roads. What if the National Rivers and Harbors Congress is made up of men who represent the railroad interest to the exclusion of all others? Unless public bodies empowered to send delegates keep a sharp lookout they will find that they have sent only railroad attorneys to a waterways congress. Our California railroad push would have a special representative commissioned to attend every prayer meeting held in the state if they had faith to believe that there would be anything doing that would affect the interests of the Harriman system. They are seldom caught napping. There is no form of organization that gives promise of exerting power into the very core of which a special railroad representative will not worm his way.

Is There Any Other Way?

A correspondent desires to know if those who are espousing the ship-subsidy idea have taken into account what the American people will think of any plan that will pay a bounty to such railroad systems as those of Hill, Harriman and Hawley under conditions that will permit them to monopolize the deep sea carrying trade as effectually as they now monopolize carriage on land. The California Weekly cannot answer for others, but, as for itself, it agrees with its correspondent in believing that the American people will prefer no merchant marine at all to one that will prevent the world's highway being as free as a public road. The idea of a rehabilitated American merchant marine is taking root, but it will be a mistake for its proponents to tie themselves irrevocably to the ship-subsidy idea without first having exhausted every other resource. There may be no other way. This paper is inclined to the opinion that, so long as other nations subsidize, there is no other way, but if this be so the nation must be so convinced of it as to leave scarcely two opinions about it before congress can be induced to act. If it were otherwise the heads of congressmen would roll into the garbage basket more rapidly than the heads of aristocrats during the reign of terror in Paris. Mr. George W. Dickie, who has another article on the subject in this issue of this paper, has stimulated discussion as no other man has done, but there are other points of view than his. Let them also be brought forward.

Interior papers are in error in regard to the saloon license in San Francisco having been reduced at the recent election. The license was kept the same, $500 per year, but supervisory and police control over the saloons was reduced, and hurtfully, and a license, too low already, cannot be increased without another referendum vote.

President Taft made 266 speeches during his just completed swinging around the circle, but that was not so hard on him as listening to the 266 addresses of welcome that preceded them and the banquet spiels that followed.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

In the New York Outlook Dr. W. S. Rainsford tells many interesting things about a most uninteresting people, the black savages of East Africa. They have no belief in God, no desire for or expectation of a life after death, and in their nakedness and poverty they are content. All they want is to be let alone. And yet, for those people many missionaries are giving their lives, striving to carry to their dull understandings, mental and heart conceptions of religious dogmas of which they can have no more notion than of snow and ice, wholly foreign to their lives. While these missionaries are striving to uplift, other agencies of civilization are striving to pull down, teaching the liquor habit and injecting into undisturbed veins those venereal maladies that follow the flag of Christendom.

But did Dr. Rainsford need to go so far as East Africa to find those to whom God is only an expletive, a future life of no concern and the down dragging of purity, honor and high purpose a craft, a business, a profession? Did he need to go so far to find missionaries striving to make plain to a heedless, hulking, human mass the way of right living and right governing? Watching by a sick bed who has not seen one in that stupor of fever bordering upon death aroused with difficulty to look for an instant out of eyes that betrayed a brittle intelligence, move the lips as if to speak, smile ever so faintly and then sink back into an unknowing and unceasing unconcern for the things of this life or another? What a heart break for the watcher!

Is this not about the condition of the great human mass most of the time? A relatively few zealous workers for Right Things must toil upward like Sisyphus only his stone only to have the good they have seemingly accomplished slip from their grasp and roll back to where they started from. The dragging down process works like gravity, day and night, with neither rest nor recreation and, apparently, without ever growing weary of faint hearted. Small wonder that the psalmists sang of their enemies, that the prophets denounced them and that pious leaders of men prayed for their destruction and to be delivered out of their hands! Sometimes the reformer would fain have power to do with the forces of iniquity as David boasted that he would do with Goliath, smite him, take his head from him, give his carcass to the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth, "that all may know that there is a God in Israel."

There are more Gethsemanes than many are prepared to believe, ay, and more Calvaries, too. Also there are more surging mobs of hatred, selfishness, bestiality, at war with Right Things because more pleasure is found in wrong things, who know not what they do, than may commonly be believed. But what of it if these things be true, did not God make the world and shall we quarrel with him for not making it to our liking? It is the duty of the soldier to obey orders. Having done this the responsibility lies with the commander. Shall soldiers for the common good do less than hired mercenaries? Job tried quarreling with God and made little out of it. He was forced at last to confess his ignorance of God's plans and we shall have to do the same.

Let us, who are striving for Right Things, and fretting because the world little heeds us, but persists in its wrong-headed way, reflect how little hurried is the maker of the universe, to whom "a thousand ages are like an evening gone; short as the watch that ends the night before the dawning sun." Shall we grudge our God the lives he sees fit to work into the maintenance of order, establishment of justice, redemption of the race?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Wireless Telephone Sets Air Brakes.

Fred Lacroix, an electrical engineer of San Antonio, Texas, has invented a wireless telephone, with steam whistles, which has been successfully tested by the Erie Railroad Company. The device may be used by train passengers as a telephone, but its most valuable feature is that by means of it approaching danger may be announced, while at the same time it automatically sets the air-brakes on a train, thus covering a danger zone of two miles. The device, which is operated by means of a third rail that can be touched, much resembles an ordinary telephone in appearance, and is placed in the locomotive cab. The engineer may so set it as to apply brakes immediately or by degrees. In the Erie test a train which was running 25 miles an hour was stopped within 60 feet, with little or no jar. It will again be tested, if it has not already been, in the near future, but the test already made indicates that it doubtless will be a great life-saving invention.

Our Differing Valuations of Education.

Probably the most striking feature of the recent report of the National Commissioner of Education was its suggestion of the apparent difference in valuation which the people of the several states set upon education. Taking expenditure as an indication of such valuation—and it would be difficult to conceive a better test—Nevada thinks more of public schools than any other state in the Union, while South Carolina values them the least. The former state, with her yearly expenditure of $72.15 a pupil, pays between 11 and 12 times as much per pupil as does the latter, with her $6.37, while California, with $49.29, multiplies South Carolina's expenditure by seven and three-quarters. In general, our West stands high, although Oklahoma, with its $15.79, appears to be willing to stand with the South, which makes the poorest showing of any section of our country in its expenditure being headed by West Virginia, with $20.36. The average yearly expenditure throughout the country is $28.25. One-fourth of the states spend more than $35 yearly per pupil, while another fourth spend less than $15. Three states exceed California in annual expenditure per pupil, and these are Nevada, New York and Montana, but, except in the case of the Silver State, the difference is small. Forty-two states below us, three above. Californians have a right to be proud of the record, but the first prize goes to yellow-coated and yellow-veined Nevada.

A Steam Turbine Electric Locomotive.

There has been much discussion of the feasibility of electrifying steam railways, but heretofore the prospective cost of such a proceeding has impeded progress in that direction. Now, however, comes President Hugh Reid of the Glasgow University Engineering Society and announces that a locomotive now under construction probably will lead to such a revolution in railway locomotion. In the locomotive to which he refers the turbine system will be used for the first time. Steam is generated in an ordinary locomotive boiler, but thence it is carried to a turbine of the impulse type, making 3,000 revolutions a minute, to which a continuous current dynamo is attached. The dynamo supplies electric energy to four series of wound traction motors which are built on the main axles of the locomotive. The exhaust steam from the turbine is condensed and used over and over again, and it is claimed that there will be a great saving of both water and fuel. If the locomotive does what is claimed for it, it is believed that it eventually will come into general use, although the cost of its manufacture will be rather heavy.

Concerning Those Who Walk the Tracks.

Some time ago the Pennsylvania Railroad Company inaugurated a campaign, which it still continues, against the trespassers on its tracks, and how vigorously the campaign has been prosecuted is indicated by the fact that during the year 1908 it had more than 11,000 such trespassers (mostly track-walkers) arrested. This is radical action, but statistics demonstrate the urgent necessity for it. The total number of such trespassers killed on the roads of the United States during the decade ending December 31, 1908, was 47,416, an average of about thirteen a day. These figures read unpleasantly enough, but it is even more unpleasant to learn that the death rate is constantly increasing. To illustrate, the number killed in 1898 was 4,063, an average of a little more than eleven a day, while nine years later, in 1907, the number had increased to 6,512, or nearly eighteen a day. The Pennsylvania's share in the latter year was 915. No wonder that it is doing what it can to terminate such a condition. Of course, a large proportion of these victims are tramps, but included among them are a very considerable number of women, children and laboring men. It is a notable fact that the main obstacle which confronts the Pennsylvania in its campaign is the objection of the local officials to making arrests because of the cost they involve.

The Forest Service and Stockmen.

It is an encouraging fact that western stockmen more and more are co-operating with the National Forest Service, establishing amicable and mutually beneficial relationship with it. During the past year seventeen associations of such stockmen have applied to the Forest Service for its recognition of their advisory boards, and, as 29 had been applied, this gives a total of 46 such boards thus far recognized. Of course the Forest Service is benefited by the friendly co-operation thus established, but the stockmen are even more benefited, as the service acts as a species of arbitrator in disputes that may arise, for instance, between sheep and cattlemen, establishes their respective ranges and in various ways acts as both advisor and peacemaker. Formal recognition is granted an association whenever its membership constitutes a majority of the users of the forest or division for which it seeks recognition.

A Substitute for Dreadnaughts.

A London correspondent of the New York Sun says that the British Admiralty is considering a new type of war vessel as a substitute for the Dreadnaughts. The vessel under consideration may be designated a semi-submarine, its hull being shaped considerably like that of a submarine boat. In fighting condition it would be sunk, by admitting water into ballast tanks, until only the navigating bridge, chart house, conning tower, funnel and mast were above water. These would be protected by armor and so shaped that a ball would be almost certain to strike them, glancing, and consequently little effective, blow. On top of the water the speed of the vessel would be about 25 knots, while it would be 19 to 20 knots at fighting depth. It would carry two 12 or 13.5-inch guns, 12 4-inch guns, and 10 torpedo tubes, which is twice as many as a Dreadnaught carries. If the vessel would do a sufficiently effective work of death, its chief advantage over a Dreadnaught would be its greatly less cost, as one could be built for $2,500,000, or just about one-fourth of the cost of the former.

Uncle Sam and His Pensioners.

Uncle Sam is generous in dealing with those who defend him in time of stress. His is no niggard hand; he pays out much more to pensioners than does any other nation on earth. It is estimated that thus far he has paid them considerably more than $100 million dollars, of which probably 95 per cent has gone to veterans of the civil war, their widows and children, and still the distribution continues at the rate of more than $150,000,000 annually. The civil war is 45 years past, and still every average man, woman and child in this country is taxed nearly two dollars annually to pay its expenses. There are five states which receive more than ten million dollars each in this annual distribution. These are Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Illinois and Indiana, Ohio heading the list with almost sixteen million dollars. The states receiving from $4,000,000 to $8,000,000 apiece are California, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri and Wisconsin. Forty-eight years is a long, long time for a war to continue, but that is what the civil war is doing—financially.

Physicians and the Drug Habit.

Dr. Oscar Jennings, who has recently published a book entitled "The Morphia Habit," brings some charges against the members of the medical profession which, it is to be trusted, are as unjust as they are severe. In retailing these charges—in the hope that some reputable physician will refute them—probably we can do no better than to quote exactly what he says in summing them up. Here it is: "One medical man out of four is a drug user. The proportion of medical addicts to the total of cases is in some statistics as high as 90 per cent, and one-fifth of the mortality in the profession is said to be caused by morphinism." Dr. Jennings is a recognized authority concerning the morphia habit, but there is a good deal of "it is said" in his book.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR LITERATURE OF EXPOSURE.

All students of history and literature have observed that the Elizabethan age—the grandest era of productivity in English writing—was an age of unexampled, and since unrepeatable, frankness of speech. Please note the distinction between frankness and indecency. Later, the classical age, when the drama was polluted with the language of indecent suggestion, made itself odious for all time.

But in Elizabeth's time, a spade was called a spade, not because the writers wanted to be indecent, but simply because, being intellectually honest, they preferred to call things what they were.

The Victorian era developed the rose-water style of language. A leg was a limb and people never went to bed, they retired. A false modesty grew up that affected every branch of thought and custom, except the scientific, and sowed the seeds of an abounding ignorance of simple facts of life that has latterly resulted in a rich harvest of broken hearts and homes. In literature, its pernicious effects were seen in the lack of robustness of thought and expression, and in the remoteness of literary subjects from the actual life of humanity.

Lately, in America, the interest in public affairs has led to the long series of articles of exposure, begun by Lincoln Steffens in McClure's Magazine, and coming to its climax in Judge Lindsey's articles in Everybody's, and George Kibbe Turner's in McClure's, all designed to tell an inquiring public mind the exact facts, in plain English, that explain the corruption in our cities. The public reads because it is aroused; it does not gag at honest words because they are the only words that tell the truth. Twenty years ago, The Daughters of the Country could not have been printed in any American magazine. Today, everybody is reading it.

This return to honesty in the use of language indicates a return to broadness in thinking. If a thing is true, the public will now listen to a statement of it in words that really describe.

The effect upon literature of such a state of the public mind is certain to be encouraging. Literature is mainly a reflection of life, and so long as the public refuses to see obvious facts in life, or to hear the words that reflect them, every sensitive author feels the dead hand of restraint upon even the most innocuous use of language; but when the world is alive to its realities and unafraid of their names, this hindering sense of restraint is lifted from his pen, and he feels that he may deal naturally and truthfully with life as he finds it. Nor does good taste suffer, for sound authors describe life in proper perspective, putting morals in their proper ascendancy and depicting vice only in its true colors and in its relatively inconsiderable quantity.

So we may hope, if the public taste does not change again in the next few years, for the blossoming of a new literature with something, at least, of the freedom of motion that made Shakespeare's epoch great.

"JOE MILLER'S JOKE BOOK."

Joe Miller, who is generally believed to have been the soul of wit, never made a single joke in his life. He was an actor, and so grave in manner as to become the butt of other people's hilarity. When any witicism went in round Miller was accused of its authorship, and he would never deny it. He lived an exemplary life and died universally respected. But no sooner was he dead than appeared "Joe Miller's Jests; or, The Wit's Vade Mecum," compiled by "Edith Tenison, Esq.," that is to say, forged by John Motley, the Jacobite, just as, years before, Hobson's "Polly Peachum" and Ben Johnson's "Jests" had been forged.

It is said that James M. Barrie has made $450,000 out of "The Little Minister" and that his plays as a whole have earned more than $2,500,000 for him.

TO A WIFE.

By Edwin Chase.
(For The California Weekly.)

II. Appreciation.

When Justice fits her balance to thy hand,
Thy nerves are steady as the famous rock.
That guards the portals named for Hercules.
The curving ringlet of an infant's brow Marks distance more than thou wilt turn the cause

When once thine own fair conscience deems it right.

When Mercy trusts thee with her healing balm,
Thy throbbing veins are Springtime freshets of Compassion sweet. And, from thine eyes whose deeps

Reflect the tender hues of heavenly sky, Shines forth the perfect Love of God in Christ,

As beams the Spirit from yon constant Star.
Does Love present thee that transforming wand

Cut from the timber of yon tragic Cross—
Thy Spirit, an obedient, tuned harp.

Will yield its music to the guide Divine.
Eternal justice thou, completed Grace,
Compassion sweet, Incarnate Love, and Wife.

Ada Rehan has just returned to this country from her summer home in Ireland. She is much improved in health but will not act this season, anyway. She is going to spend half her time in this country and the other half abroad in the future.

The original of George Meredith's "Diana of the Crossways" was Mrs. Norton, whose life, by Jane Grey Perkins, is soon to be published by Henry Holt & Co. Mrs. Norton was one of the "three graces" of English society in the first half of the last century. She was the great Sheridan's granddaughter; the author of several novels and many poems and songs, contesting contemporary popularity with Mrs. Browning. A friend of Lord Melbourne, Fanny Kemble, Motley, etc., her influence was potent in politics.

Californian Poets' Corner

WHEN RICHARD LOVELOACE CAME TO WOO.

By Henry S. Foote.

In the field of vers-de-secrete the following lines by Henry S. Foote take rank with the best which our Californian bards have done:

The feet of time make fast pace,

And we, like players in a play;

Strut up and down our little space,

And act our parts as best we may;

Alas! Alack! and well-a-day!

The stage is dim in somber hue,

Where once that stateliest vogue held sway;

When Richard Lovelace came to woo.

And much we marvel, as we trace

The feuds and foibles passed away;

While pomp of power and pride of place

Troop down the years in grand array.

In court and camp, in fete and fray,

Fickle and flippant, staunch and true,

Such were the gallants, bold and gay,

When Richard Lovelace came to woo.

In doublet line and frills of lace,

The lover sought his suit to pay;

With such a form and such a face,

Who could resist his plea, I pray;

And then that tender roundelay.

So like a wood-dove's plaintive coo,

Sweet Lucy could not say him nay,

When Richard Lovelace came to woo.

Envoy.

Ho, Kentish Towers! your lordly race

Had words to draw and deeds to do,

In that eventful year of grace,

When Richard Lovelace came to woo.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHEL.

"The Three Musketeers."

The late Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, was one of the greatest and most learned statesmen of his day, a rock of solid purpose and a well of serious information. But he snatched many an hour in the senate chamber from the tiresome platitudes of his colleagues to devour the adventures of Nick Carter and Dick Deadeye. He was, indeed, one of the most consistent purchasers of this primitive brand of fiction.

A clever French lady, scorns Dumas the elder as a spinner of children's tales. We modestly part ways with her in this judgment; rather, we accept the designation of children without admitting the necessity of qualifying it with "content." Admit "The Three Musketeers" is a children's tale, a swishing romance of sublimated cut-throats and hangers-on. It is, these, but it is more. D'Artagnan is more than a stage-dummy of swash-buckling; Porthos and Aramis have character and very human quality; and Athos, that pale ghost of a murdered love, that silent Nemesis and inflexible friend, how he stirs the heart as well as the imagination. Milady, too, where is a character more subtly fascinating in literature whom, at the same time, the gallery gods can appreciate?

Have done, fair carper! Back, for an hour, with us into the mud and blood and turmoil and intrigue of France, slay Buckingham again and sit once more in the stern of the boat at midnight in midstream when the grim headman's axe ends the romance and beauty of Milady, while Athos groans and the cold waves race shuddering down our spines. Many a love of books fed first upon these pages, loves that, with the poet, have risen on stepping stones of such dead selves to higher things.

SOME RARE OLD BOOKS.

Presentation copies from Queen Victoria of Great Britain are seldom met with. One of these rarities was sold recently in New York. It is "The Churchman's Year," written by George F. Townsend, two volumes, published in London in 1842. In each volume is an autograph inscription, "Edward Cust, Gift of Victoria, March 17, 1851." The inscription is in the Queen's handwriting, and the work also has Sir Edward Cust's book plate. It was this same year that he was raised to the rank of major general. He enjoyed the personal friendship of the Queen for many years. In 1845 he was appointed assistant master of the ceremonies to Victoria, and in 1847 master of the ceremonies. He held his post until 1870, when ill health obliged him to resign. He was thereupon created baronet in reward for his services. His wife was bedchamber woman to the Duchess of Kent, the mother of Victoria.

Other interesting rarities sold at the same auction were:

A copy of the rare "History of the Rise, Progress, and Termination of the American Revolution" by Mrs. Mercy Warren of Plymouth, Mass., three volumes, Boston, 1805. She was the wife of Gen. James Warren and sister of James Otis, the famous revolutionary patriot.

Some observations on the bill entitled, "An Act for Granting His Majesty an Excise on Wines Consumed Within This Province," a scarce Boston pamphlet, issued in 1754.

Sketch of the "Life and Voyages of Capt. Alvah Dewey," by Silas Judg. Chittenden, N. Y., 1838. It is a rare copy of 16 pages, known to Sabin. Commodore Perry, it will be recalled, died in Capt. Dewey's arms, and the author gives a full account of Perry's illness and death.

Observations on certain documents * * * in the "History of the United States for the Year 1796," in which the charge of speculation against Alexander Hamilton is fully refuted. Written by himself, Philadelphia, 1797. This is the first edition of this famous work.

THE REFORM OF LAW AND LAYWERS

REMEDIES SUGGESTED BY DISTINGUISHED MEMBERS OF THE CALIFORNIA BAR.

[The address of Hon. William R. Davis, of Oakland, was delivered without notes and the stenographic report was not transcribed in time for publication in this week's issue of The California Weekly. Extracts from this address will be published in our next issue.—Editor.]

The banquet tendered last Tuesday evening by the San Francisco Bar Association to the delegates gathered for the purpose of forming a state bar association, was the occasion for several speeches on the general subject of the reform of legal procedure. The California Weekly has carefully selected from these speeches those portions which suggest positive remedies for the evils of our present system of administering justice. Much of the interest of the addresses as oratorical specimens is sacrificed by this method, but our main interest is to show simply what lawyers themselves think should be done to correct the law's delays and inequalities.

Mr. Lynn Helm.

The first to speak on this subject was the Hon. Lynn Helm, of Los Angeles, who said, in part:

"We do not need more courts or more judges to transact the judicial business of the country; but we need better judges equipped for transacting business under a reformed and better system of legal procedure. We need a revolution of the entire judicial establishment."

As to justices' courts, their efficiency, and if possible, their jurisdiction, should be increased. These courts should be made more popular and justices should be selected apt in the disposition of business. In such courts pleadings should be permitted. This is the most essential reform and goes to the root of most of the evil in the present practice in justices' courts. Judgment should be entered forthwith. Appeals to the Superior Court should be permitted only on points of law."

There is no necessity for changes in organization of Superior Courts, but only in the procedure and trial of causes, and certain remedies for present delays and congestion of business.

In trials, rapidity could be obtained by presenting as rapidly as possible evidence  for the decisions of fact, leaving the question of law  to the more deliberate judgment of the court. "Arguments made during the trial either upon the admission of evidence or upon motion for non-suit should  be reserved or presented after the verdict of the jury or findings of fact have been announced."

"Let  the jury dispose of questions of fact, get them entered on the record  and then let the case stand upon the record. From the order granting or refusing a new trial an appeal could be taken, the affirmation or reversal of which would determine once for all the entire controversy."

"In these courts, so far as possible, the judge should deliver his judgment immediately upon the close of the argument."

"Pleadings should be as simple as possible, but they may be settled, and all questions in reference to them  by masters  appointed by the court  leaving the entire time of the judges for trial of causes. Any party  may apply for a new trial and therefrom, for an appeal to the Supreme or other Appellate Court. No bill of exceptions need be prepared, and no bill of exceptions should be permitted in any case."

Appellate Courts.

"It should be possible when the case is called in the appellate court for counsel for the appellant to simply explain the case to the judges and state of what he complains in the way in which the trial was conducted below, or what he alleges the error is in the ruling of the judge or the verdict of the jury. The appellate court should be previously furnished with copies of the pleadings and the evidence and of any exhibits or documents of material importance. It should then have complete control over the action or matter brought before it on appeal and have all the powers, authority and jurisdiction conferred by law on the trial judge and generally to give any judgment and make any order which ought to have been made in the court below. The party complaining of an error in the trial court should show affirmatively that the result would have been different if the error had not been committed."

"If by reason of error a wrong judgment was entered below the appellate court will not, in reversing that judgment, remand the case for a new trial, but it will enter such judgment as in its opinion meets the justice of the case."

"In order that it (a compact system of legal procedure) should be elastic, it should be supplemented by rules or general orders applicable to the several courts in its jurisdiction, to be adopted by the highest court in the judicial system, thus insuring, also, uniformity of practice."

In criminal cases, abolish "any right upon the part of the accused to inquire into the motive of the properly constituted public authorities to charge a commission of a crime."

"* * * require of a defendant to plead guilty * * * and make it more easy to select a jury to try the only questions that should be presented, the guilt or innocence of the accused."

Reduce costs of litigation by abolishing fees and substituting salaries.

Give the judge more power than that of a silent spectator or mere umpire, and permit him, in charging the jury, to review the facts as adduced by the evidence, so that no essential point may be misapprehended.

Mr. Frank Short.

The Hon. Frank Short, of Fresno, after reviewing the origin of our system of jurisprudence and comparing it with others, made the following suggestions:

"The comparison of the brevity and efficiency of procedure in the English courts with the prolixity and delays in American courts, is conclusive in favor of the simplification of our procedure, and is a conclusive argument to the effect that there should be an end in this country of the adoption of new constitutions, the amendment of old ones, the enactment of statutes and the recodification of our laws, except with regard to most important matters, and then only after long periods of time, or where the necessity appears to imperatively demand action."

"If we are to have justice in this country, if we are to have honesty and efficiency in the enforcement of the law, the people, the press and the public generally must have some direct regard for the law and the administration of justice. It must be recognized that the very end sought can only be accomplished in cases of importance by the press and the public refraining from much or violent discussions of the guilt or innocence of a particular person so accused, until, by the liberated sober and dignified process of the law, which is nothing more nor less than the people themselves speaking through their ordained institutions, the guilt or innocence of the party accused can be determined. Comment, criticism and controversy, if such we must have, should come afterwards. This is not only necessary as a matter of theory and as a matter of sentiment, but as a condition to be applied to the question of results it is the only way, and the only method where we can hope to so administer our laws that within a reasonable time and in an orderly way, guilty men can be convicted and duly punished, and innocent men can be vindicated and acquitted. These considerations not only relate to the selection of juries, but to the entire trial."

"The people who imagine that by making the courts and the processes of law amenable to popular pressure better results can be more speedily obtained are the most deluded and misguided people in the world. The whole effort should be made to withdraw the processes of the law from, and place them above politics, and beyond political or popular influence. The process of the law in this country is not the enforcement of the will of the majority, but the administration of justice in accordance with settled principles. Do not beguile yourselves with the idea that this subject is not one of profound importance. With some incidental exceptions, and probably of a temporary nature, this government today is the only government conducted with respect to constitutional limitations and principles of justice and democratic in form."

"Our judges should receive very much higher salaries. They should hold always for life, or for a very long tenure, they should be elected in the first instance, never be subject to re-election, but should hold either for life or for a certain period of years, or to a certain age. The people should come to appreciate that no lawyer is too able or successful to be advanced to the bench. Our judges should be the equal in character, attainments and learning with the judges of England, or any other country. Above all, both as a people and through the press, we should learn and practice self-restraint—respect for courts of justice and the law should be such that we would refrain from any discussion, action or procedure calculated to interfere with the due course of the law."

Judge Dooling.

The Hon. M. T. Dooling, of Hollister, offered an entirely different reason for the evils of the law and a different remedy. He said:

"All over this country to-day, from president to pound master, the question is asked, 'What is the matter with the law?' Bar associations and legislative bodies everywhere are endeavoring to meet the difficulties, which all acknowledge to exist, by means of remedial legislation. And such legislation as is enacted and being tried seems to fail of its purpose; and such legislation will be enacted and will continue to fail of its purpose, because it does not touch the root of the difficulty."

"For the greatest trouble with the law to-day, the chief obstacle in the way of its due administration, is the lawyer himself. Much of the apparent necessity for amending the law would be practically obviated by the more effective method, apparently as yet untried, of amending the lawyer. And the judges, you will say? Yes and the judges. For the judge is recruited from the ranks of the bar, and he is not now, never has been, and never can be any better than the bar that produces him. I know that all of us at some time or other have had the belief, and perhaps we have impressed it upon some enraged and over-inquisitive client, that the judge is not necessarily a lawyer. But, for to-night, I am going to include him in the category."

"The lawyers, then, individually and collectively, are charged by their oaths and their office with the administration and the enforcement of the law. The modern development has produced a class of lawyers whose office seems to be the evasion of the law. To what end, then, should we concern ourselves with the enactment of remedial

POST AND GRANT AVENUE

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

In the Dreadful Dark!

When the moon goes out, and the stars go out,

And the whole world's lost in shade,

Then the wee little tad in his nightie clad

Hides his head as he says, "It's fraid,"

For he's sure there are things—just listen!

hark!

That are hunting for him in the Dreadful Dark.

There are terrible things, with horrible games,

In mantles of darkness clad—

Though papas and mamas don't know their names—

Who wait for the tiny tad;

So I really don't wonder at all—do you?

That he shrinks from the Dreadful Darkness crew.

Sometimes his head by the clothes is hid,

But he looks again, for oh!

It would never do for the little kid

To be caught and never to know.

It would truly be awful, I should remark,

Not to know you are caught in the Dreadful

Dark!

There is just one place in the great world here

Where a bairnie may safely stay,

And it's by the side of his mama dear;

For she frightens the spooks away;

She croons him to sleep, while the angels

hark.

Till he quite forgets 'bout the Dreadful Dark.

Two Pictures.

Pick up your paper tomorrow morning, and the chances are that you will read that one more person have been driven to a state of desperation by the stress of penury. There, too, you shall obtain vague glimpses of women and little children who starve, while men go mad in realizing that they can do nothing for their dear ones. Self-incurred want, some mutter; yet insert a little "want ad." in the paper today, offering a living wage to thirty laborers, and tomorrow you probably would receive 300 applications for the positions.

Poverty is a grim, cruel verity here, as in other communities; and this is one of the pictures that hang on the walls of the gallery of life.

A society bud is to make her debut in this city, and, to lend an atmosphere of distinction to the select occasion, a party which will cost $16,500 (not to mention sums that the guests will expend) will be given.

This is another picture that hangs on the walls of the great gallery. Side by side they hang.

A very good thing, some one says, that this money is to be expended, and thus put into circulation. Perhaps; and Dives, I doubt not, put money into circulation while he lived, but it is written that this fact had little effect later in cooling him off. It was not the money that he did, or did not, circulate, but the need he gave to the condition of Lazarus, that placed him where the temperature was too high for comfort.

Cruel want and callous indifference should not be fellow-journeymen, but too often they are. Not rarely is a Rockefeller's church with-stone's throw of a New York East Side. What we who crawl on the gray old planet need is more christianizing, in the best sense of the word. So runs my moral, but he who thinks that penury should tighten the comforting belt about its own waist will read another meaning into the two pictures.

"Blinks always makes the best of situations."

"What makes you think so?"

"You know he is quite deaf. Well, he went to church last Sunday and sat behind a woman who wore a fashionable hat."

"Well?"

"I asked him how he liked the sermon, and he said it smelled good to him."

The Opinions of Rufus.

When I hear some people talking I can't help remembering that the boy of a jackass goes a good way, but it ain't ever been considered much of an argument.

First Schmitz, then Taylor, an' now McCarthy. Seems ter me the shortage didn't have nough strawberries tween the layers. Fudas sold his master for thirty pieces of silver, but I understand that they's a general feelin' among the Calhoun papers that he didn't git enough.

I reely b'lieve that righteousness is mightier than evil, but sometimes it seems es if it wan't so easy to git it financed.

Generally speakin', a critic is a man who can't do it himself, but can tell anybody how it shoudn't be done.

The Almighty made the woman, an' then he rested. S'pose He knew that things would be kept lively 'nough down here after that.

I wish that the folks that make saints would make one or two that are alive. It's mighty discouragin' to look fer saints an' only find skeletons.

It's a queer thing, but reli'ble doctors have informed me that they didn't git any less calls from them that sang, "I want to be an angel," than they did from them that didn't join in the singin'.

Don't you find it mighty affectin' to look at a little one an' think that he'll grow up to be consider'ble like his pa an' ma?

Aten an' women are like children: Every time they fall down they've learned a little more 'bout how to walk without stumblin'.

The Song You Sing.

The peacock is a handsome bird,

So what does the peacock do?

Why, it hoists its tail, like a rainbow sail.

And displays it to our view,

And the people come from far or near

To see the beautiful thing,

And they much admire the bird, nor tire—

Till they hear the peacock sing!

Old Bullion rides in an autocar,

And rich are his garb's supplies;

He's highly respectable, wholly detectable,

So solemn we're sure he is wise,

And the people say, "He's a wonderful man,

A magnate, a monarch, a king."

Till there comes a day for a grafting play—

Then they hear old Bullion sing!

Good Goodleigh ever to chapel goes,

And he bows his head in prayer,

And he does not shy as the plate goes by,

And he yearns for "Over There,"

Then the hour arrives for a vote for right,

Or for Business, the strenuous thing,

God's summons is clear, but, business! my

And we hear good Goodleigh sing!

Len'voi.

Lassie or laddie, this'er is true

Of peasant and prelate and king;

Not the garb we wear, but the deed' ye do,

Is the key to the song ye sing.

Our Remarkable Higher Criticism.

When the voice of higher criticism of the scriptures is heard we who are not higher critics should listen with humility. Nevertheless, it is right to be astounded at the inevitable outcome of that criticism, and such is the emotion which the recent discoveries concerning the age of Methuselah produce in me.

The higher critic who was considering the case of Methuselah announced that the alleged 959 years of the patriarch's life really were 969 months, or about eighty years, and a considerable number felt much relieved to learn that the longevity of man had not been decreased so much as had been reported. Happy was the man who for me I had been satisfied with this relief and had looked no farther, but, alas! I went to browsing around in the fifth chapter of Genesis, and now I am all at sea again. If a year in one part of that chapter means a month, it undoubtedly means a month throughout the chapter. Now consider the awful consequences.

In the third verse it says that "Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat Seth," Adam at the time was ten years and ten months old, according to the higher criticism. We may not have suspected it of Adam, but are we to reject the higher criticism?

Really, however, Adam was not so swift as we are prone, in our error, to imagine, for "Seth lived an hundred and five years"—nine years and nine months—"and begat Enos." It seems impossible, but, remembering that Methuselah was but eighty years old when he died, we cannot doubt it.

Then Seth steps among the slow class, for "Enos lived ninety years"—seven years and six months—"and begat Cainan." This seems rapid, but "Cainan lived seventy years, and begat Mahalaleel," or according to this higher criticism, at the age of five years and ten months. And Mahalaleel improved the family record by begetting Jared at the age of "sixty and five years," or five years and five months. Mahalaleel won the race, except that Enoch tied him when Methuselah was born.

These figures are authentic, as anyone may satisfy himself by turning to the fifth chapter of Genesis, and certainly if years mean months in the case of Methuselah they must mean the same in the chronology of the other patriarchs mentioned in the same chapter.

"And Enoch lived sixty and five years"—sixty and five months—"and begat Methuselah." Sometimes I almost suspect that the higher critics prove more than they really set out to prove.

Thoughtful Man on What's Left Over.

"Sir," the Thoughtful Man remarked, "this is a time for joy and the care-free abandon of hilarity in this great city. The brave and intelligent laboring men have nobly responded to the appeal of their friend and squelcher, Mr. Calhoun, and have relieved him from an embarrassing dilemma. Now all we can do is honor the shade of his grandire turn his face and hold his nose in the opposite direction from him; no more need he pay out hundreds while he objects to Spreckles paying out units; no more will he be compelled to keep off the witness stand for fear that a thunder storm may come up. 'Tis a great and glorious day, and as soon as Fickick has given Calhoun a letter of recommendation we are going to give a banquet to ourselves.

"Yet as every cup of joy has its drop of bitterness, so has this. Pause in the natural expression of your gratitude long enough to consider the fate of the unfortunate wretches to whom the beneficent Mr. Calhoun, in his tribulation, has been a main financial support. What will they do for milk when the cow has gone dry? How will they play Hamlet when Hamlet has stepped out to get a self-congratulatory drink, and is likely not to come back? How will they sit on the limb after the intelligent voters have cut it off between them and the trunk? How will the Globe prosper when its bank has gone out of business? Where will the Chronicle pick up its windfalls, and the Oakland Tribune strike pay dirt? There will continue to be pick-ups, but the present turning off of the faucet hurts.

"Sir, in the midst of your inevitable joy, I plead with you to remember these weak and broken sisters. Remember, too, the able and honorable lawyers whose eight drafts on Calhoun henceforth are likely to be lost in the shuffle. I meet them on the street, and their tear-suffused eyes mutely tell me how successfully they really have concealed their situation. How are they going to pick the feathers when the bird has 'baw the coop'? So, although we well may rejoice, we sometimes should pause to drop a tear for these, the weary, the disinherited and broken-hearted. Forgive me, let us tenderly remember, the snow has gone and it is very hard sledging."

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly:

On October 29th in two leading articles, you seem to fling to the breeze a cheerful declaration in favor of conquest by the United States. I thought, however, the predatory strength of nations is less objectionable, in your view, than the predatory wealth against which you so actively campaign. May I ask you to reconsider this position, for, being in the way of spokesmen for the public conscience, you are rather bound to keep as near right as possible?

Of late years, and especially since my interest in Mexico was sharpened by a brief visit, I have felt an almost burdensome anxiety that our country might be preserved from aggression south of the Rio Grande. That we were in danger in that quarter was evident enough, danger arising from greed and opportunity, and danger to be avoided only by the prevalence of high principle and far-seeing policy over the cheap motives that feed the world's corruption.

It is disconcerting to find The California Weekly welcoming the temptations to national dishonor, and setting up smiling texts about the world's being governed by those who are fit—the filibuster's motto, but not his incentive.

The pouring of our capital into Mexico should not be injurious to its prospects of continued national development. It should rather contribute to its power to stand alone. Our strong men who find opportunity there should give something of their strength toward helping that government to a fuller service of its people. We are to move more and more over the border, why may we not go bearing honest gifts, seeking peacefully to build up true democracy there, not with the robber's plan in our mind?

It is for our government to safeguard by every sound device our relations of equal friendship with our weaker neighbors. It is for our interest that the people grow strong and wise and just. We shall not make them so by plotting their consanguinity.

Such revelations as those of Mr. Turner may well stir our desire to help the oppressed against the exploiters. We should give what aid we can, individually, to those who are moving in Mexico for a republic that shall exist for the good of all the people. We have some work of our own still unfinished, along those lines, but that need not preclude our sympathy with those who are in far worse case. But what could be the moral of a policy that to use this sympathy as a pretext for spoliation?

Japan's benevolent assimilation of Korea there may be several lessons, varying with our varying information, but, so far as our Mexican prospects are concerned, we may safely say that the "Imperial Conflict" is the conflict, which may be seen all over the world, between greed and hypocrisy on the one hand, and honest self-restraint, conscience and humanity on the other. The California Weekly belongs on the other side from that which would seem to be taken by the writer of the articles in question.

EDWARD S. THACHER.

Norridge, Cal., Nov. 6, 1909.

Our correspondent has us upon the hip. There is nothing more indefensible, or inevitable, than the ways of the world, than the law of evolution, than the survival of the fittest. Before the world's great dramas, aye, tragedies if one will call them so, the legalist and the moralist stand impotent if not dumb and confounded if not consenting. All that we know of evolution is that it is the way God works. Why God works in that way, why he pours out life more prodigally, if anything, than he pours out that nebula from which worlds are made, we do not know. All that we do know is that he does it with a lavishness that pre-supposes a universe charged with life, else the author of it could not squander it with such abandon. There are issues which seem to lie beyond the domain of morals.

For instance, the rights of German women to have two million babies a year can not be questioned. If they persist in having them, and the necessity for German growth keeps all Europe armed to the breaking-down point, the heaviest burden, next to licentiousness and liquor, that the human race has to carry. Despite our too-prevalent race suicide the right of the United States to expand rests along similar lines. Its inevitableness is not less certain than that of Germany.

The decade of American history lying between 1844 and 1854 was a decade of moral disaster. There never was a more unjustifiable iniquity than the war against Mexico, made in the interests of an extension of the human slavery. But how splendidly profitable that iniquity did turn out! But for our great national perfidy our correspondent would not now be living in the beautiful Ojai valley with the Stars and Stripes floating from the center pole of his wigwag.

Between 1844 and the close of 1848 we took from Mexico between half and two thirds of her territory for no other reason than that we wanted it and could take it. Who outside of Mexico regrets it? Who outside of Mexico would have us make restitution of a single acre? There are events which transcend all legalities and all moralities, as we moralize and legalize, because necessities of races demand it. Trying to legalize and moralize over them is not unlike trying to measure the heavens with a yardstick while we are being whirled through space at the rate of fifty thousand miles an hour.

Right or wrong, by purchase or by conquest (so far as results are concerned it is all one whatever the method), we shall do with Mexico what we have done with her in times past, and we shall do with the Mexican people what we have done with them here in California, and we shall keep on doing it clear down to the Big Ditch unless the tropics prove a buffer to Saxon enterprise and the pioneering spirit. There isn't anything we can do about it. This is a prophecy of it rather than an argument for it. And when we come to the crossing of the Rio Grande we shall find some issue of right by which we shall be able to justify our overflowing necessities for more territory. It is an individual so with a nation, it is a matter of no great difficulty to make it seem right to do what we very much want to do and must do in order to perpetuate and extend those institutions in which we heartily believe.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir—If I may be permitted to criticize Mr. Reed's recent criticism of your School for Citizenship, I would suggest that he confuses "patriotism" with "citizenship." The former is normally aroused through emotion or sentiment, or drama; a youth is properly schooled in the latter by an appeal to his intelligence and sense of duty which are trained essentially by application and by interesting stories. Hence a school designed to achieve these results—and such as you have conducted and I hope will continue—will set forth the hard facts with which citizenship must be absorbed under guidance of the persons having authority with the youth (for what young person of the usual sort will naturally turn to your weekly without guidance?). If our youth were trained to view their citizenship as they do their bread and meat, and use it as a cocktail, there would be less of this biennial oscillation between Taylors and McCartlys.

E. O. A.

San Francisco, Cal., Nov. 8, 1909.

It is not impossible that, in the minds of some, patriotism and citizenship may have become confused, but it is fairly evident that the sentiment of patriotism must be aroused before there can be any serious preparation for citizenship, and it is to be doubted if "authority" over youth can by any means make our School for Citizenship acceptable to youth. The horse that is not thirsty will not drink whether he be led or driven to water.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen—You ask for the opinion of your readers as to the value of your "School for Citizenship." The idea seems to me an excellent one, but I have found your articles absolutely unreadable. I have hoped that I might recommend the department to the boys of my school, but I have never myself been able to read more than a few lines on that page, and cannot see how a boy would be interested in the slightest degree. I do not see why the subject could not be treated interestingly, with a certain liveliness of style and concrete examples. But far be it from me to imagine that I could myself do it any better than it has been done, or simply giving you my impression for what it may be worth.

Yours truly,

S. D. F.

The foregoing is frank and straight from the shoulder. The impartiality of a critic who has never read more than five or six lines of any one of our lessons in citizenship is no more to be questioned than that of the critic of a book who has not read the book. Nevertheless we have to confess that, so far as our knowledge goes, persons under twenty-one have not taken to our "Lessons" with much avidity. Older persons have and, because they have found these articles interesting, it has seemed to them that boys ought to. Who knows of a youth that has taken to them?

Editor The California Weekly.

Do not discountage our "School for Citizenship." Unfortunately too many of us know too little of our form of government, and fail to realize the need of knowledge.

Democracy has not yet proven a success; we are stuck in the experimental stage, and as the school house is the foundation stone, citizenship must be the first step up. We need enlightenment, and your lessons, simply explained, will do much good.

Yours truly,

ALLEN GOLDSTEIN.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

A Monumental Mistake Now In the Making

The success of the Union Labor Party appears to have intoxicated Mr. P. H. McCarthy, and his backers, and inspired them with the idea of laying siege to the state. Their purpose appears to be to marshal all the men of the state who toil with their hands, and all the left-over politicians (not now in office) who toil with their jaws, into one indestructible phalanx with the view of governing the whole of California by a single class of the citizenship of California and for the benefit of—well, let us be generous and concede that the common good is the good in view. Nevertheless, the best government that ever was would be as bad as the worst for us if not democratic, as this would not be, for the soil of America is dedicated by all that is holy, all that is sacred, all that is blood-bought, all that is inherited, all that comes to us by tradition, to government of the people rather than for the people. The launching of a Union Labor Party into state politics is a monumental mistake whether viewed from the standpoint of labor or not. The grimmest, cruellest, tendency of our day is the development of that class consciousness which has been the curse of the race, and nothing can so accentuate this miserable tendency as setting the labor folk off by themselves to be counted, not as a part of the whole people, but as the whole of a part of the people. The day that such a thing enters our political life to stay that day the democratic ideal will fly out of the window to come not back again with or without an olive branch of promise.

Eaves Droppings In the Light of Recent Events

It was while the late legislature was in session, and the venal venue bill was up for consideration, that three men held a conference in Sacramento. Two of the three have since been elected to high office in San Francisco and the third was a representative of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company. The discussion waxed warm and the talk louder than the disputants probably realized. In an adjoining room was a man with ears open. He could not hear all that was said, or more than the loudest words. It was like piecing together the fragments of a message over a telephone when some other person persists in breaking in on the party line, but enough was caught to make it certain that the representative of the Political Bureau was making some pledges of support to the Union Labor Party, provided that, the way of reciprocity, the Southern Pacific's United Railroad candidate for district attorney of San Francisco, not yet named, should receive the support of the Union Labor Party in San Francisco. The events of last week have supplied the gaps in that eaves-dropped conversation. A state senator and a noted Union labor leader have promised that McCarthy should receive the Southern Pacific and United Railroads support for mayor, and Tom Finn the same support for sheriff of San Francisco, upon the condition above mentioned. The bargain was made and carried out to the letter. The unfortunate part of it is that it is only in the light of the denouement that the fragments of the utterances overheard at that time become intelligible and convincing. If the dropped phrases could have been supplied then the results of the recent election might have been different.

Will They Try It On the State?

The confidence game operated in San Francisco was too successful, and too simple, to make it likely to be abandoned without first trying it on the state. The scheme was simplicity itself, if given men who can be handled in bunches of hundreds for the carrying out of orders. First register as republicans all the serviceable Union Labor Party voters, and the solidified tenderloin, for the purpose of controlling Republican nominations at the primary. Then get the labor vote back into the Union Labor Party lines for straight voting in the general election. The Republican party is unwieldy. Without being divided a nomination might be equivalent to an election and, peradventure, some good nominations might slip through. That would not be in accordance with the Southern Pacific's view of the eternal fitness of things; but run the Union Labor Party idea like a rip saw through the middle of the Republican Party, and the Democratic vote, the straight Republican vote, and the vote of the Union Labor Party throughout the state, might not develop such a lack of equality as to make it impossible for a rather small, but thoroughly mobilized, payless, countless, conscienceless brigade of voters to hold the balance of power from top to bottom of the ticket. To discharge this delicate and discriminating function Captain Maquereau, of the associated red-light and white-slave trafficking districts of California, will be commissioned. He proved his efficiency in the recent election in San Francisco and all he asked in return is immunity from persecution in the prosecution of his traffic in the bodies of the Daughters of the Poor. It is a great scheme. And it is so very simple. It is morally certain to be tried on the state.

Where That Non-Voting Twenty-nine Per Cent?

The full registration of voters in San Francisco was 90,790. The total vote cast was 64,362, leaving 26,428, of the face of the returns, who failed to discharge their duty as electors. Of course some deductions must be made for fraudulent registrations and for those who registered in San Francisco and went off and died or settled somewhere else, which is much the same thing. But, yet, after making all proper deductions, there have been somewhere between fifteen thousand and twenty thousand qualified voters who, despite the crucial nature of the contest, were too indifferent to get out and vote. Did these issues mean nothing to them? Is it likely that any of these, if they had voted, would have voted for McCarthy or Fickert? Is it presumable that any considerable percentage of them would have voted for a wide-open town? May we not assume with safety that Fickert, McCarthy and the wide-open fellows got out their full strength? Then what sort of people were those who remained at their jobs notwithstanding the fact that the honor of their city was at stake? Verily, they were of the number of those who never do anything very bad or very good. They were the shirkers, the people who are too good to descend into the pool of politics, but probably would have voted right if they had been haled to the polls and made to vote or suffer consequences serious to themselves. Is it not possible that compulsory voting might have fitted their cases? Are not these they who gave their city to McCarthy, Fickert, et al.?

That Sacramento Stinging Rebuke.

The Watchman has it on the faith of the "Sacramento Weekly and Alta California," a name so long as to suggest a rope by which that paper may sometime be tempted to commit suicide, that M. R. Beard was elected mayor by the good people of that city as a "stinging rebuke" to those who conducted the campaign of the opposition candidate for charging that, if elected, Mr. Beard would make Sacramento a wide-open town, whereas the public and private life of Mr. Beard has always been above reproach. And so it has, in all respects save one. During his term as mayor M. R. Beard never touched an unclean thing. His personal acts were exemplary and his private life beyond criticism. He took care for good cause, and laid a hand to every wholesome enterprise. Only once did he fall down: He permitted Tom Fox, the political boss who made him mayor, to name the chief-of-police, and Tom Fox's chief of police suffered Sacramento to be as wide-open a town as might be found west of the Mississippi river. When Clinton L. White came into office as mayor, and named Mr. Sullivan chief of police, the gamblers and maquereaux skurried across the Yolo bridge like coyotes ahead of a prairie fire. Was it really so damning a conclusion that Mr. Beard might let Tom Fox select another chief of police? Sacramento is not the only city where venality secures a servicable, but personally unobjectionable, mask behind which to serve the purposes of Satan. The dodge is old but artful. Nor is Sacramento the only city that has administered a "stinging rebuke" to the forces of morality. The tingle of the sting is felt right here in San Francisco.

The Non-Partisan Primary Succeeds at Los Angeles

San Francisco adopted the partisan primary plan with the result that the voters quickly learned so non-partisan that the candidates that headed the ticket of the dominant party proved a poor third in the mayoralty race. Los Angeles adopted the non-partisan primary plan which the Southern Pacific's political bureau immediately sought to make as partisan as possible, and with some success. The candidate for mayor selected by a Republican convention got a place on the final election ticket, but so also did the mayoralty candidate of the forces that stand for non-partisanship in municipal elections. The final battle will be fought between Mayor George Alexander, now in office and who has made good, and one George Smith, a rather unobjectionable man, like our own Bill Crocker, but, like Crocker, a man with a bad backing. The campaign for Alexander will be fought on the issue of Right Things. The campaign for Smith will be made on "loyalty to the grand old party." The campaign will be Grant, of Garfield and Roosevelt," the last refuge of men who must put on the robes of the great in order to get away with the spoils of offices. About half the registered voters discharged the duties of citizenship in face of the trials of a ballot having no party circle and bearing 140 names arranged alphabetically with nothing to distinguish the sheep from the goats, and this is looked upon as having been a great out-pouring of the people! Either the non-voters should be asexualized or the women enfranchised. The present arrangement isn't fair.

The Best Result of All Never has the Was the Beating of Otis

Never has the spirit of malice been carried farther by any newspaper than the Los Angeles Times has carried it in trying to run out of town Dr. E. C. Moore, superintendent of the schools of Los Angeles, and all because Dr. Moore objected to publishing in a little handbook of Los Angeles, especially gotten out for the visiting teachers of the National Educational Association, a caustic "roast" of labor unionism from the pen of Otis. In his determination to get the superintendent's scalp the Times has fought the schools, fought school boards in the election and in the courts, fought the school board at all points and before the people in the primary election just held. Well, the members of that board were all renominated. It is probable that they will all be elected on the 7th of December; but Otis will keep right on fighting just the same until he dies of it. Afterward he will get the devil with fire, for he is as likely to take a fall out of a friend as an enemy, and the Times will be the biggest paper in Tophet. The editor of the Times is a wonderful man. He is probably the only man who ever entered the profession of journalism with no capital except hate and no qualification except love for a fight and made a million out of it.

THE ENGLISH SUFFRAGETTE HUNGER STRIKE.

By Elizabeth Stillman Chamberlain.

Nearly every one in the United States has felt a disrespect at least, for the apparently undignified actions of the English suffragettes. The reason of their demonstration has been to most people unknown, and it has seemed as though it were simply a foolish undisciplined movement with the petty misdemeanor entirely unwarranted.

It is hard for an American to understand the motive underlying their every action. When Miss Cristabel Pankhurst organized the so-called militant movement, she did it under the inspiration of Mr. Gladstone's (now Home Secretary) remark: "If you want the vote fight for it. Men have gotten everything they wanted by demonstration."

Now in England, one is allowed to "demonstrate" in a way that would not be tolerated in America. So long as the object to be gained is political they are treated as political offenders, that is, simply confined; they are allowed, as prisoners, all the privileges of prisoners of the first class, they can write letters, receive their friends, provide themselves with all necessary comforts not given to any other class of prisoners. For instance, early this year, Mr. Grinnell, Irish member, instigated cattle driving in order to attract attention for some political move and he was not punished for cattle driving as a common crime, but for cattle driving as a political offense. His punishment was first division imprisonment, that is, he was allowed to write, could see his friends and therefore could at all times practically direct his campaign. Mrs. Pankhurst, the leader of the militant movement, on the other hand, was given second division, placed in solitary confinement, could hold no communication with the outside world and knew nothing of what was happening to her party. One of the methods of disapproval used for generations as political protest is to break the windows of the municipal or state building, and when this is done it is not considered a misdemeanor, but is allowed to go unnoticed by the police, or simply fined. The authorities of Winchester, a town not far from London, moved a small cannon from one end of the public square to the other. The cannon had stood in its original spot for many years, and had become a land mark. The men in the town were most indignant and showed their indignation by going en masse to the town hall and by breaking all the windows in the building and in the residences of mayor and town officials. They were not punished in any way, and the next day the cannon was put back in its home spot and quiet reigned supreme.

So it is that when a small body of women break windows or resist the attempt of the guards to keep them from the house of parliament they are not committing misdemeanors but are simply demonstrating in a perfectly authorized British manner in order to call the attention of the public to their demands. But instead of treating them as committing the same offenses have been treated for generations, these women are subjected to the indignity of imprisonment in the third degree, searched, and deprived of all privileges. These women, it must be understood, are not rowdies or hoodlums, they are women of refinement and culture, often professional women, and they are subjected to the humiliation of third class division in jail, while men who have committed far more dreadful offenses have been given first division or not confined at all.

It was this treatment that led to the famous Hunger Strike in July. Thirteen women were sent to prison for breaking windows of the Home Secretary's residence, and they resolved, in order to attract attention to the fact they were not being given the rights of political offenders (and although the government publicly admits them to be), to take no food until they be released. They starved themselves, and since then every suffragette has followed their example, refusing all food brought them by the wardens for six days and thirteen hours, when they were released by the prison authorities.

All England has been moved by this sacrifice, and the government is up a tree. They either have to give the suffragettes first division sentence, let them starve themselves to death, or feed them by force, either of which courses would arouse the deepest public feeling, or release the prisoners; so far they have resorted to the last course, having let them go when they realized that their detention would mean their death.

It has been an all-reaching demonstration and one cannot but hope that at last the public and the authorities will realize that the spirit that moves such deeds is a great spirit, and if they do not yet see the wisdom of granting them their demands, they at least will give them the respect and admiration that their devotion merits.

Hichborn's History

So many applications have come to The California Weekly for copies of Franklin Hichborn's

"STORY OF THE CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE OF 1909,"

that we have arranged to take orders for this valuable book and fill them directly from our office, either in person or by mail. The regular trade edition is $1.25, post paid.

Mr. Hichborn's book should be in the hands of every per-son who desires to gain an interior view of the government of California AS IT IS, and the function of legislation AS IT IS PERFORMED session after session under our very eyes.

Having resided at the state capital and attended upon legislative sessions for a number of years, Mr. Hichborn has had unusual opportunities for getting close up to the true inwardness of things legislative and he deals with his subject in entire frankness.

No better volume could be put into the hands of a young man preparing himself for citizenship and for doing his part in making political conditions better than they are.

AMERICAN SHIPPING IN AMERICAN SHIPS

VI. WHAT OTHER NATIONS DO TO HELP THEIR SHIPPING.

By G. W. DICKIE.

Continuing the inquiry that formed the subject of the last article we find that the Russian government pays yearly to the steamship companies operating under her postal regulations about $2,000,000. She had created what was called the Russian Volunteer Fleet, which did her mail carrying where other ships were not operating; this fleet was maintained at great expense, accounts of which it is difficult to obtain. Most of these vessels were captured or destroyed during the Russian-Japanese war and have not been replaced. Russia, however, is not seeking a merchant marine, for the destruction of her fleet by the Japanese put an end, for the present at least, to her schemes for developing a great sea power.

What Italy Is Doing.

Italy during the past twenty years has been steadily growing as a naval power and has considerable ambition as a mercantile sea power. There is now a proposal before the Italian parliament concerning subsidies to her shipping amounting in the aggregate to 13,250,000 lire ($2,650,000) per annum, which is divided about as follows:

Mediterranean and Adriatic shipping	$95,000
Puglia	480,000
Black sea trade	284,000
Shipping in the East	212,000
Various smaller lines	180,000
Shipping to America	590,000
New lines	2,650,000

Total

This subvention of shipping is for the purpose of maintaining a regular service with countries that Italy wants to do business with.

What Japan Is Doing.

The nation whose attitude toward shipping is at present touching the interests of the United States most closely is Japan. Here is a nation that a few years ago we did not consider as a possible rival suddenly projecting itself into the ocean commerce of the world and far outstripping us in the ocean carrying trade. This condition is especially apparent in the Pacific Ocean.

Thirteen years ago I was walking the quarter-deck of a British warship in the harbor of Yokohama with a Japanese cabinet minister, the captain of the ship and a fleet engineer; we were talking of naval power in relation to the merchant marine when the minister remarked that the ambition of Japan was to be to the Pacific ocean what Great Britain was to the Atlantic. We had been boasting of the naval power, etc., of the several countries we represented and did not consider that there was anything more in the remark made by the Japanese than there was in those made by ourselves. As I write this a stately Japanese liner sweeps down the bay and I am forced to admire her as she passes in full view of my office window carrying to the United States mail and two millions of dollars in gold in her specie room to meet the balance of trade against us in our trade with the Orient.

The Japanese have lately built some liners which are much more advanced in design than any that American designers have had a chance to plan out; naval architecture as an art and science is not stimulated here by any enlightened policy of shipping encouragement, and the shipbuilders of our country have not had a chance to build ships conforming to modern ideas and improvements, although they were building transpacific and transatlantic liners long before the Japanese were building ocean-going vessels of any kind. To account for this condition we must admit that the Japanese government has paid no attention to the building of ships for shipping and commerce. The development of the mercantile marine of Japan has been one of the most important factors in her rapid industrial and commercial progress and it is important to note the conditions that have brought into existence in a remarkably short time a merchant marine that is causing considerable fear to the shipowners of such a great power as Great Britain.

First Japanese Shipping Law.

The first Japanese law for the purpose of encouraging the owning and building of ships was passed in 1870. The law at present in force was passed in 1896 and will expire in 1914. I will take up the provisions of this law under two heads: First in its relations to shipowning and, second, in its relations to shipbuilding.

In this law provision is made for a payment of 12½ cents per gross ton per thousand miles to ships under the Japanese flag engaged in foreign trade of not less than 1,000 tons gross and of not less than 10 knots speed. The amount of payment varies with size and speed, reaching a maximum of 30 cents per ton for ships of not less than 6,000 tons gross and 17 knots speed. (This is just three times as much as was provided by a bill introduced in congress on February 16, this year, by Representative Green of Massachusetts, chairman of the house committee on merchant marine and fisheries.) The amount varies also with the age of the steamers, the full rate being paid for the first five years after launching; it is then reduced by 5 per cent each year up to the fifteenth year and then entirely withdrawn. Ships taking advantage of this law are granted a certificate called the "Navigation Encouragement Certificate."

The encouragement thus provided proved insufficient in competition with foreign companies and in 1899 a very important departure from its limitations was made. Special contracts were entered into with various Japanese steamship companies requiring them to give regular services on certain special routes. The routes and companies obtaining the advantages of these special subsidies are the Europe, Seattle and Australia lines of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, the San Francisco line of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, the lines of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, and two or three local and less known companies and routes. For the line to Europe the contract calls for twelve vessels each of not less than 6,000 tons gross and at least 14 knot speed; for the Seattle line three vessels of not less than 6,000 tons and 15 knots; for the Australia line three vessels of not less than 3,500 tons gross and 16 knots speed; for the San Francisco line three vessels of not less than 6,000 tons gross and 17 knots speed. The number of steamers possessing the "Navigation Encouragement Certificate" in March, 1908, was 52, of an aggregate tonnage of 105,000, and the payments under this head for the year 1908-09 are estimated to be $1,741,977, taking the yen at 50 cents. The number of steamers owned by the six subsidized companies under contract with the Japanese government to carry out the above services was, in 1907, 204; since then six large steamers have been added. The total tonnage is 406,312 tons gross register and the payment under this head for the year 1908-09 is estimated to be $3,443,130.

In its relation to shipbuilding the Japanese law of 1896 provides for a payment on both hull and machinery. For the hull the rate is $6 per ton when the gross tonnage is between 700 and 1,000 and $10 per ton when the tonnage is above 1,000 tons gross. For machinery the rate is $2.50 per indicated horse power actually developed on trial, no payment, however, being made for machinery unless the tonnage exceeds 700 gross and the hull thereby entitled to a subsidy.

It seems probable that these subsidies must be built in Japan and comply with the shipbuilding regulations of the Japanese Marine Bureau. About ninety steamers of an aggregate gross tonnage of about 220,000 have been built to take advantage of this law. The estimated payments to be made under this head for the year 1908-09 aggregate $997,720. As an illustration of this law and its provisions the well-known liner "Tenyo Maru" is a good example. Her builders received a bounty from the Japanese government of about $184,500. The total subsidies to be paid by Japan during the current year will be about $6,182,847.

Subsidies Better Than No Trade.

It may be said that the Japanese government will not be able to continue to pay such large bounties in order to develop her trade on the Pacific; I rather think that she can better afford to pay whatever may be necessary to secure and hold it than to do without the great trade of the Pacific. Bearing on this very topic the following from the Japan Daily Mail is illustrative of the spirit that is enabling Japan to take what she considers her share of the commerce of the Pacific:

"The present expenditure on the navy is part of the nation's policy that is calling forth vehement criticism among the mercantile community at home and the nation's critics both at home and abroad. The encouragement given to shipping and shipbuilding is generally acquiesced in as essential to development. The number of years required before these can be self-supporting and independent of subsidy, can scarcely be estimated, the future alone can decide."

It is manifest from the foregoing that every nation having a frontage on the ocean considers it necessary to maintain a merchant marine in the foreign trade sufficient at least for the requirements of its own ocean commerce, and every nation which seeks power on the ocean considers the merchant ship as an absolute necessity.

Our Navy Without Supply Consorts.

Amid all this activity of other nations the attitude of the United States has been that of an onlooker passively watching the others take all the trade and her own shipping in the foreign trade gradually disappear. The people are willing to pay for the building and maintenance of a very large fleet and to send it round the world to show the maritime nations that the American flag still waves; in very few ports did American vessels salute the flag and the navy. It is supposed that this great and costly navy was built to fight and there is every evidence that it would do so with honor if called upon to do so but no one in authority seems to expect that it will ever be called upon to do so. Other nations have noticed and commented upon the fact that our fleet cannot go out of sight of our own shores without requiring the attendance of a fleet of foreign merchantmen to provide it with fuel and other supplies. If this fleet should be suddenly called upon to do the work it was built and manned to do how would it be supplied with provisions and coal when at a distance from some station? The answer to that question which has been asked many times lately is not comforting; there is no reassuring reply possible when the facts are known as they are getting to be. Here is how Japan on behalf of her policy answers it. Quoting again from the Japan Daily Mail:

"The Japanese government has to choose one of two things; either it must have a special service of government transports or it must bring into existence a mercantile marine such as will furnish transports at any moment. England has subsidized steamship companies whose vessels always hold themselves in readiness to act as transports. Besides, there is the enormous number of vessels plying to and from all parts of the world under the British flag, and upon these she can draw in time of need, and Japan must in proportion to her fleet, have her merchant ships ready in case of need. Without the aid which her merchant fleet was able to furnish in 1904 and 1905 her war with Russia could never have been conducted to a successful issue."

Bearing this in mind, the problem of the Japanese merchant marine is not such a simple thing as it looks at first sight; its future will be of great interest to California.

The Duty of California.

Before taking up the question of the present duty of the Federal Government toward building up the merchant marine in the foreign trade, I wish to refer to a duty resting on this state in regard to the development of shipping interests both in foreign and domestic trade. We cannot as a state consistently urge action by the Federal Government for the relief of shipping when we tax our own shipping more heavily than any other state in the Union. What interest the states bordering on the Atlantic took in their several shipping trades is clearly shown in their early history, which has already been referred to in these articles.

In San Francisco Bay California has the best harbor on the western side of the American continent; it is central as to the state, the country, and the facilities for distribution. What has the state done to enable or help her citizens take advantage of what nature has done in the way of an outlet on the great highway of commerce? The people of this state pay annually to foreign shipowners more than $10,000,000 for carrying the result of their industry to market and nearly as much more for bringing foreign products in exchange. It has never occurred to our legislators and the people who send them to represent their interests that the building and operating of great ships is a legitimate and honorable business the encouragement of which would add vastly to the prosperity of our state and provide a means of support to a much larger population than we now have. Legislation cannot of course put enterprise into our business people, but it can be wisely directed to the removal of obstacles that now make such enterprises as depend on shipping impossible.

Even if the California shipowner could have his ship built here as cheaply as the British or Japanese shipowner could build his, and could operate her as cheaply, he could not compete unless his ship were relieved of the taxes with which she is now burdened. The taxation of seagoing vessels is so absurd that it is difficult to get a foreign merchant shipowner to realize that such an anomalous condition exists. Not one cent either directly or indirectly goes to benefit the property taxed in this flagrant case of taxing seagoing ships; but they have to compete for existence with ships of foreign countries which pursue a more enlightened policy towards their shipping. To remove taxes from their ships would be a simple act of justice to the California shipowner. In no other state has the tax collector such a deadly grip on the throat of shipping.

Harbor Should Be Free to Americans.

If the people of the state ever have the grace to do this tardy act of justice to the shipowner and to themselves one step at least will have been taken to encourage the building and owning of seagoing vessels at this port. I have shown that a ship built here will of necessity cost materially more to build and to operate than a similar vessel built by other nations, and on that very account the home-built ship should be given every advantage that her home port can give. A San Francisco or California ship ought to be entering her home when she steams through the Golden Gate and should get free entry there.

To an American-built ship wholly owned by an American citizen or citizens, registered in California, and engaged in the foreign trade, the harbors of California should be free. There should be on the water front of San Francisco two fitting docks, one between the Ferry building and the South End and one between the Ferry building and the North End. These docks should be fitted with cranes and tracks for handling heavy weights; ships fitting out at them should not be charged wharfage and the use of cranes and power should be fixed at reasonable rates. This is what is being done in other countries and it is found to encourage not only home ships but foreign as well to have their work done where such advantages are available. The German ports, as already noted, take this plan of encouraging home-owned ships, and it is no more than should be done by any seaport that seeks to extend its commerce.

The example of Manchester, England, should be carefully considered when any movement to attract commerce is contemplated. Desirous of building up its commerce which would center in and benefit their own city, although it was many miles from the sea, the citizens of Manchester built a water way to the ocean, constructed extensive docks at the heart of the town, put in every modern convenience and facility for the rapid and economical handling of cargo, offered many advantages to ships that would trade with them and built up the commerce that they sought. This is one of the great engineering and economic achievements of last century. It stands a monument to the genius of the men who planned and executed it in spite of the opposition of many reputed wise men who thought that Manchester was courting ruin in carrying out such a wild scheme. When the great work was finished Manchester set about getting ships to come to her wharves. The first notice given the shipowners was issued in April, 1894, and states in bold and plain words that "seagoing merchant vessels arriving in Manchester will not be charged any ship dues either inward or outward. If a ship uses only the first section of the canal to Rancorn Bridge she must pay ship dues as per schedule; if she goes beyond Rancorn to Lachford locks she pays a lower rate than to Rancorn, while if she goes to Lachford she will not be charged any dues, and further if she is a sailing vessel and going to Manchester she will be towed from the mouth of the canal and back again free of charge."

Manchester's Example Profitable.

This may seem to be overgenerous to the shipowner; Manchester has never regretted her action; the $150,000,000 she expended in her ship canal and docks is being rapidly refunded; her wealth and commerce have been greatly augmented; her ambition to be a seaport and commercial center of world-wide fame and importance has been achieved. California should profit by the example of Man-

IN CLOUD LAND.

JIMMY was an odd child—what child is not, to his elders?—living half his life in the kaleidoscopic variety of animal gambols: that is the despair of parents, and half in those wondering meditations, full of mystery and wishfulness, that are the day-dreams of youth.

He had spent the morning playing run-sheep-run and prisoner's base, and the afternoon at some sort of summer hockey, played with broom-handles and an old tin can. Supper ended the day's diversions, for Jimmy's parents had strict notions about children running the streets at night, and the front gate was a dead-line to him after 6 o'clock. When the early supper was finished Jimmy felt that sense of fullness and contentment which men accentuate by an after-dinner cigar, the smoke of peace in the consciousness of weariness laboriously earned. His father and mother stayed at the table, earnestly discussing a problem of household finances, and Jimmy wandered idly through the house and out to the front porch.

The sun was an hour high still, sinking slowly in the glory of a warm October evening, descending in a golden haze. It was very beautiful, as only these first October days are, and Jimmy yielded to the sensuous enjoyment of it. Ideas forsook him, and he was conscious only of a pleasant saturation of the senses in this vision of autumnal loveliness.

The palm tree in the front yard obscured his vision of the scene in full, and he be-thought him of his favorite retreat, on the roof of the house. Here, where the eaves of the ell met the eaves of the main building, ran a gutter, a ready-made couch which he had first discovered when pursuing an imprudent owl that had ventured out too early one evening and had alighted on the ridge-pole, dazed and blinking. The ascent to the place was easy: an acacia tree stood beside the porch, and the roof of the porch was handy to one of the boughs.

In a minute Jimmy was clear of the tree-tops, lying at length on the shingles with his feet braced in the gutter. The vision was now complete. He could see north over the quiet town, west over the dark red to gold, to opal, to infinite depths of violet blue. Across the zenith and others at the west; not clouds, but fiery pennants and burning seas. The mountains, to the east, capped with snow, were glorious in shades of lavender. The western sky rose from dark red to gold, to opal, to infinite depths of violet blue.

As Jimmy watched the west, the darker clouds formed the outlines of a bay, surrounding the shining waters, and between two headlands he could see the smooth vista of the bay. At length, sail, and then the stately ship rode in the gate and anchored in the bay. Unconsciously, Jimmy was aboard her, a sceptre in his hand, the swishing of a scarlet satin robe at his ankles, a retinue of courtiers and knights behind him. He descended from the ship into a barge, while the purple pennants in the sky fluttered above him, and from the barge stepped on the golden shores. Huzzing peoples met him at the beach, and a deputation knelt before him, imploring his pardon for rebellion. He waved his sceptre magnificently over them, gave them their pardon, ordered all captives to be freed, and bestowed the most beautiful lady of his train upon the rebel chief. The joy of magnanimity in power swept over him as he turned again to his barge, leaving a happy, loyal people behind him, and re-entered his ship.

The anchor was raised, a singing wind made melody through the shrouds, and the ship was alone on the sea.

A great storm arose. The women fled below, shrieking in terror. The clouds lowered closer, the wind screamed louder, the waves broke booming over the bow. The white-faced captain crept to his side, to him, the king, who alone was calm and brave. So he stood through the howling gale till the waters leveled off there and the deep, the purple rack flew, and the stars shone brightly above the milk-white sails.

Suddenly he was on the field of battle, in the thick of cannon-smoke, where bullets rang sharply overhead and the shouts of the captains rose shrill above the din. A shell exploded near by, but he turned his horse to one side and continued his orders to an aide. His eye swept the battlefield, now was his hour, his soldiers felt the omen of defeat, he knew that victory perched on his saddle bow. His breast swelled with the pride of mastery. A word to his bugler, and the band broke into the strains of one of those church hymns that were fondly meant to call to worship, but really thrill the heart to action, and, spurring his horse, he gloriously led the cavalry charge. His soldiers saw him, burst into a mighty cry, and swept with him the faltering enemy into ignominious rout.

The sun was now on the horizon's rim, glaring red and bulking larger. Above it spread the fan-like rays of light, so often seen in pictures and so rarely in the sky. Masses of heated brass, cauldrons of molten gold, angry rivers of carmine, burned at that verge of the world where earth melted into the tortured, beautiful clouds. Childhood's visual images of the preacher's word-paintings crowded Jimmy's mind and rose in menacing reality before him in the west. Yonder was hell, yawning, fiery, prodigious, terrible, but terrible with a thrilling beauty, a fascinating, gorgeous, sensuous, colorful, and splendid pit, worth being cast into for the sheer enjoyment of its glorious painting.

The sun sank and the illusion faded. Jimmy turned to the east where still the glory glowed on purple peaks and rose-draped canyon walls. He was among them, captain of a band, leading his faithful men over the untracked range, beset by Indians and thrilled by the sense of danger. He sat upon a log by a blazing fire, watching his men bringing in boughs for the night, and hearing off in the forest the baby-wail of the mountain lion. Darkness was falling; the circle of light from his fire grew narrower and the impending wall of blackness grew denser with gloom. He was very tired; he would call his servant—

"Mother, where's that boy?"
"Why, I don't know, I'm sure. You'd better go out and call him."

Calling was vain. An hour's search was fruitless. The mother had no intuition. Jimmy's father looked at the little fellow lying in the gutter between the two caves.

"Asleep, by thunder. Well, I'll be darned!" said the father, as he picked him up and bore him gently to bed.

THE CAVE.

H EY, fellows, race you to the cave!" The "fellows" were tads from six to ten years old. The cave was in keeping with their size, but was an ingenious piece of work withal. A vacant lot, partly piled with lumber, was the site. Here the boys had dug a square hole about five feet deep, and from one side of the shaft had "drifted" in eight or ten feet more, widening and deepening, arching the roof after the fashion of masonry, until they had a snug cave in which, though impossible to stand, a dozen boys could sit with ease. Using a piece of stove-pipe for a drill, a chimney had been pierced to the surface at one corner, and a few bricks sufficed for a stove.

The boy who had challenged to the race was the first to arrive at the cave, having taken care, as boys usually do, to have a reasonable handicap established in the direction of the goal before issuing the challenge. He quickly lifted the wooden shutter that covered the entrance shaft, and dropped out of sight. The two closest pursuers jumped in the hole together, getting jammed in the narrow space so neither could go down. The other boys dragged them out, while Carrots, the winner, tickled their legs from below.

All were soon in, however, the last one being required by custom to be shut out over the hole, leaving only enough crack for fresh air and, especially, for the draft for the stove. It made no difference that it was mid-winter in California, where a cloud had not been seen for two months, nor that the sun had shone a blessing; the stove was the pride of the cave, and must be used.

It was soon alight. Pine shavings, dried pieces of boughs pruned the winter before from fruit trees, and odd scraps of lumber were piled on the hearth.

The smoke would have choked an Esquimau, but, though it brought tears to the cheeks of the boys, their eyes glistened brighter at the thought of a camp-fire, and their community of spirit with the savages made the heat a mere incident of a stealthy adventure. One desperate character, more daring than all the rest, even puffed bravely at a cigarette and proudly exhibited the box that it came from, though the others were too fearful to join in his orgy.

Baked potatoes, though, were in tune with the occasion, and involved no threat of physical displeasure. A dozen were soon in the ashes, where they alternately burned and smoked until the skins were all shriveled and they were declared to be done. Nobody minded burnt fingers, nor grumbled very much that the salt had been forgotten, nor cared at all that only a thin layer of the potatoes was cooked, leaving a cold and raw heart for the last. When the boys got to that point in their eating the remains were thrown in the fire, now blazing brightly and calling the perspiration to the surface.

Then Carrots grunted. A hissing sound rose from the hearth, a choking cloud of smoke rolled through the cave, and a large clod hit Carrots square in the pit of the stomach. Then a cataclysm of water came pouring down the chimney, and the gang rushed for the exit.

They were a sorry looking crew that came up from the earth, mud-spattered and coughing, and crying vengeance on the persons that had spoiled their amusement. But vengeance was in other hands that day.

"So you're the varmints that set fire to my lumber, with yer dod-gasted furnace, are ye? Well, I'll fix ye!"

Poor Carrots was the vicarious sufferer for all. The hand of wrath was upon him, and as his wails rose above the whirr of the fire-engine a haze of dust rose up from Merced street where the gang had stampeded.

Chester, should offer inducements to vessels to come to her harbors, to manufacturers to locate on her shores, to the people to come to her population to come and people her rich valleys and fertile hills; she should adopt some policy of steady commercial progress in all ways but particularly by way of her great natural outlet to the trade of the Pacific, San Francisco bay.

In my next and last article I will try to point out the present duty of the United States government towards her shipping in the foreign trade.

GREAT AUK GREAT NO MORE.

Recently the egg of a great auk was sold in London for $175. This bird is extinct, but the hen can do so even in these days, but the hen is not extinct, and the auk is, which makes the difference. There now are 75 great auk eggs in existence, which, at the quoted price, should make the crop worth $12,750. As the bird is extinct, it is not surprising that this record, having gone to join the dodo in the valley of shades. More than three score and ten years have passed since the last of them departed from life on the little island of Funk, near Newfoundland.

measures, which, once enacted, must be entrusted for their enforcement to a profession whose leading lights are largely paid for devising means and theories to evade them.

"In the principal theater of this city, within two weeks, I heard one of the players, himself representing an attorney supposed to head the profession, declare that a lawyer had use for every attribute but conscience. And I heard that sentiment applauded vigorously by an audience that filled every seat in the house. They applauded it because they believed it to be true. And they believed it to be true because their observation of the profession had induced such belief. For the chief thing that tends to bring the legal profession and the law into reproach, is the endeavor, so frequently successful, to obtain from the law for some individual or corporation or class that to which he is not entitled, to which I may add the efforts of some member of the bar to assist him in so doing.

"Why, for instance, do I take for my vote of time the simplest and most obvious illustration; the principle is the same and extends through all the complexities of the law, from the poorest fence of the tenderloin in trouble with the police force to the highest merger in New Jersey defending itself before the highest court of the United States—why, I ask you, should any man who violates the law expect or even hope to escape conviction when brought before a court of justice? For no other reason than because the profession itself encourages him in that expectation. Why should any man who is indebted to his neighbor, believe or hope he can escape a judgment against him when brought into court to answer? For no other reason than because some member of the bar has encouraged him in that belief.

"Shall a man go undefended, then, or his cause untried? Not at all. But why should the guilty man escape or the debtor fail to pay? For no man is entitled to more than justice from any court, and no attorney should encourage him to expect more or help him to obtain it. Why, then, should not an attorney say to his client, 'Yes, if you wish, I will see that you have a fair trial. But I don't see how you are going to escape conviction and I don't see why you should?' Or to the man who is indebted to his neighbor, or who has wrought him injury, 'Yes, if you wish I will see that your case is fairly heard. But I don't see how you are going to avoid a judgment, and I see no reason why you should?' And having said this, if he would then go into court and see that his client gets a fair trial and no more, the guilty would generally be convicted and the debtor lose. But the client would have secured everything to which he was entitled, and the attorney would have done all that is required, and, indeed, all that is warranted or justified by his oath.

"But, you will say, such a procedure would have a tendency to discourage litigation. That is true. It is quite true. In many instances it would undoubtedly 'hurt business.' But in every instance I say it would promote justice. And, after all, is not that what your bar association is to be organized for?

"It would do more than that. It would elevate the profession and bring it to that high standard where it properly belongs and to that place in the estimation of the people which would make the lawyer what he ought to be, a leader in the cause of right. The bar would then be made the nucleus for every movement for the betterment of conditions, while the law itself would become, as it should be, a rule of action to be followed by the willing and enforced against the unwilling through the efforts of the very men to whom the state has entrusted the solemn duty of upholding it. And ultimately, indeed, while we might have fewer lawyers and lawyers poorer in purse, we would inevitably have better ones. I mean better in the broader sense. For any man who then desired to make his name by vicious methods in any of some other field, and those who were left would be engaged in the enforcement and not in the evasion of the law.

"These are not idealistic notions; they are the veriest commonplaces. The obligations laid upon us by our professional oaths should be as certain and as well recognized as any in human life. If the profession had not come to have a distorted view, not only of its duties and obligations, but of its rights and privileges as well, it would be held in vastly higher regard.

"I should not have spoken of this feature, but for the fact that we apparently look far afield for causes that lie close at hand. For even in this strenuous age, this age of strenuous power, when individuals bow to wealth and to power, no just lawyer should preserve inviolate his oath, his high ideals, his spirit of honor and integrity, which is the fairest flower of the profession and the finest fruit of the earnest, studious, and well-regulated life."

PERSONALIA

Oliver Herford, who has been seriously ill with typhoid pneumonia, is slowly recovering.

Wilbur Wright recently said that the aeroplane can be built to attain a speed of 100 miles an hour, and to continue for 1,000 miles and carry six persons.

Captain John Pritchard, commodore of the United Line, who began his 53 years' service at sea in a 150-ton schooner and who ends it in command of the 39,000-ton steamship Mauritania, announced, on November 3, upon sailing for Liverpool that he had resigned.

Word comes from Ohio university that a Mrs. A. D. Winslip has just entered the freshman class at the age of 79. For two seasons she has attended the summer school, and now she has planned a course of study which should occupy her mind till she is 90. The B. D. degree should fall to her somewhere about her 88th year.

It looks as if a duel would form one of the chief scenes in the next Bernstein drama. The young author fought one in Paris early in the week with a well-known dramatic critic. Of course no blood was spilled, as it was a real French duel, such as Mark Twain described in the Gambetta fracas. The funny part of it all was that Bernstein quite forgot to fire his pistol. The other man shot at him and missed.

Miss Lizzie L. Johnson of Casey, Ill., during the twenty-seven years that she has been raised to her room by illness is said to have raised more than $17,000 by making and selling bookmarks. Besides giving a large amount to foreign missions, Miss Johnson assists several native Christian workers in the district. She is said to have carried on the large correspondence connected with her work without assistance.

Mrs. Grover Cleveland recently arrived at Lausanne with her children for a stay of two years, while her son and two daughters are being educated in local Swiss schools. Esther and Marion will go to school at the Villa Cyrano on Lake Geneva, and her son to La Villa School for Boys at Echty, near Lausanne. Mrs. Cleveland herself has taken the "dependance" of the Windsor Hotel (Lausanne), which is a villa of fourteen rooms, with a large garden and terrace overlooking the lake.

Governor Hadley recently appointed the committee which will have charge of the competition for a Missouri state song. The sum of $1,000 has already been raised to be given to the successful author and composer. The committee consists of Capt. Henry King, managing editor of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat; ex-Governor David R. Francis, Henry N. Carey of the St. Louis Republic; Walter S. Dickey, and Fred N. Gaylord of Kansas City. The committee will have charge of the fund, appointment of judges and other arrangements.

SHORT TALKS ON DOMESTIC SCIENCE

As a continuation of the previous issue, a history of the home economics movement will not be out of place.

Public interest was aroused about 1870. The first cooking school was opened in 1874 in New York city by Mrs. Juliet Corson. Miss Parloa, who died recently, was the first teacher and lecturer. Boston wards. Her first cooking class was organized in New London, Conn., in 1876. In 1877, her school on Tremont street, Boston, was opened and she lectured at Laselle Seminary, Auburndale, Mass., a year later. Laselle Seminary was one of the first schools to introduce a department of domestic science. Miss Parloa gave a teachers' training course at the Chautauqua Summer School in 1870.

Boston led in introducing cooking and sewing in the public schools and this was accomplished in 1875. Philadelphia, Washington and Providence soon followed.

New York established the first training school for teachers of both domestic science and of art in 1888 and this school is now the Teachers' College of Columbia University.

Miss Devereux, one of Miss Parloa's pupils, started the school which afterward became known as Mrs. Rorer's cooking school of Philadelphia. The Woman's Educational and Industrial Union of Boston nourished a nucleus which four years later became the Boston Cooking School, and closely identified with its progress are Mrs. Lincoln, Miss Barrows, Miss Farmer, Miss Bradley and Mrs. Hill. Nine years later, or in 1902, the Boston Cooking School became a part of Simmons College. The work in the West, particularly in the States, has made its greatest strides in the past five years. During the past ten years there has been greater development, progress and achievement along this line than in the previous twenty-five years, and all indications point to rapid strides ahead during the coming years.

Just as we must have the physical before the mental, so we must have the practical before the scientific. Our primary, secondary and normal schools throughout the country are fairly well launched upon the practical, now let the colleges give the training to the Ethnics, "right living," and deal with science, hygiene and economics. Men and women may be equally well educated and yet not study the same subjects. Chemistry for the young woman, might deal with general chemistry, supplemented or followed by special work upon food, its relation to the human body, and thus include hygiene; while for the young man, general chemistry might be followed by special work in relation to mining. Each would be equally well educated but in entirely different spheres and yet not so divergent but that each could understand and appreciate the other's work, for general chemistry, hygiene and economics would be studied together even if from a different viewpoint and with varying aims. Co-education might then more fully express co-operation and co-ordination.

False modesty is crowding out much of that knowledge which is included in "right living." Classes in entomology, botany and kindred subjects are taught concerning sex relation and habits of the insects, flowers, etc., but the human beginning is kept a mystery unsolved all too often except by physical and moral mistakes, which are "visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation." Mothers and fathers are equally to blame in believing ignorance is bliss. Can public schools and other institutions of learning find a subject deeper or more fraught with pulsating, physical, mental, moral and spiritual life than this, and if not, why is it such a forbidden topic? Shall children and men be supplied with the different phases of home training and if so, why has the crying need been so long unheeded? M. R. T.

Mill Valley, Cal., Nov. 10.

THE BERKELEY QUARRY INCIDENT.

A mis-understanding of the true facts in the case of the North Berkeley blasting operations is worth clearing up because this mis-understanding has been used to make arguments for and against the initiative clause of the Berkeley charter when the facts, properly stated, show that the utility of the initiative clause was not really involved at all.

The facts are as follows:

The rock quarry has been operated for several years to supply rock for street work within certain real estate tracts opened for settlement. Objections to its operation were based on the too large charges of powder used, on the cutting up of streets by the heavily loaded dump-carts, and on the danger to children of driving these carts on a down grade through the city streets.

Two years ago, under the old charter, the board of trustees passed an ordinance prohibiting blasting in quarries within the city limits except by permit. A permit was issued to the quarry company, to expire September 30, 1909.

Then the new charter was adopted, putting the government of Berkeley under the commission plan. The quarry company recently applied for an extension of the permit for one year, in order to complete certain street work already under way.

The city commissioners threshed the matter out. They learned that the large district mainly affected by the blasting was without high-pressure water mains for fire protection, being above the Berryman reservoir, and being so far below the Summit reservoir that pressure mains were a physical impossibility because the pressure would burst the pipes. They were assured by the water company that, with further excavation of the quarry, the quarry would be ideal for a reservoir, being at the right elevation and of rock bottom and sides; that the quarrying had been done at a greater expense than was necessary if the south wall had not purposely been retained to make of the quarry such a reservoir; and that the People's Water Company would make a reservoir of it for the purpose of fire protection if the city would permit enough more quarrying to be done to make the quarry deep enough to hold the necessary quantity of water.

This situation was explained to the most interested adjacent property-owners, and they agreed to acquiesce in one year of additional blasting, provided no future permits or extensions should be made and provided the quality of rock used on the streets was kept up to a standard understood by all.

This agreement was effected by issuing the permit to the quarry company for six working months (October and November, 1909, and April, May, June and July, 1910), and by passing an ordinance prohibiting blasting in quarries with this one limited exception.

Meanwhile, parties hostile to the new charter and hostile to the city administration, asked the council to pass an ordinance prohibiting all blasting. This ordinance would not be practicable under any conditions, as it would prohibit the city itself from blasting for sewers or roadways. The council therefore refused to pass this ordinance, and the disaffected proponents of it proceeded to circulate a petition for an initiative election to put the ordinance up to the people.

The quarry company thereupon withdrew that part of its request for an extension which relates to next year, leaving the council no alternative but to revoke that part of the permit, which it did.

The proposed initiative movement (the petition has not yet been filed) has had no effect at all so far as the council is concerned, for the subsequent action of the council was automatic and inescapable.

But the practical indirect effect is to cause the city to lose its reservoir and attendant fire protection.

Meanwhile, under the provisions of the curtailed permit, which expires on the 30th of this month, the getting of the rock for the street is graded at the quarry by an expert, and the blasting is being done under the direction of this expert, who was appointed by the Commissioner of Public Works.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Following a Bill to Its Fate.

As soon as a bill is introduced in the legislature, and referred to the appropriate committee by the presiding officer, it goes to the state printing office to be printed and copies are placed on the desk of every senator and assemblyman, besides furnishing copies to all the state officers, the reporters of all the newspapers represented, to many newspapers throughout the state and to as many other persons as ask the sergeant-at-arms for them. Usually 500 copies of each bill are printed. Meantime legislation waits, for the committees can do nothing until the printed copies of the original bills are in the hands of the members.

After getting the bills from the state printing office, which is forced to work with night and day shifts in order to keep up with the demand for bills, the committees meet. Each committee has a clerk, and usually a sergeant-at-arms to have the committee room open, lighted, and to act as door keeper. The bills are taken up for committee consideration in the order of the pressure exerted on their behalf, are read and considered section by section. The discussion is frequently informal and any person having an interest in a bill is permitted to address the committee for or against it as interest may prompt. It often happens that two or three members of a committee do the work of the committee. Every legislator is one half a dozen different committees and, with so many irons in the fire, each legislator looks out for the bills, or classes of bills, that interest him most and lets the rest slide. This situation is conducive to star chamber methods and one or two forceful men may dominate nearly any committee. If they stand on opposite sides such measures get well considered in committee.

It is in committee that most of the work of legislation is done. If it seems likely that the legislature will not consider and give a bill the committee to which it is referred will report that it do not pass. That generally seals the fate of that bill, but sometimes a committee that is opposed to the passage of a bill is afraid that it might pass anyhow and so delays its being reported out of committee at all, which is called pigeonholing. If the proponent of a measure can induce the legislative body to sustain him he can insist upon the observance of the rule requiring all bills to be reported in ten days and a delayed bill may be ordered reported forthwith, but if these proposals are voted down the bill is killed in the pigeonhole.

When a committee reports a bill to the parent body it may report it with as many amendments as it pleases or, as frequently happens when a number of different bills relate to the same matter, it may report a substitute bill of its own to take the place of all the other bills dealing with that subject. If a majority of the house consents thereto the other bills relating to that subject are deemed to have been withdrawn and the new bill goes to the printer and is given a place on the floor.

Bills may be amended at any time on the floor of the chamber before final passage, and each time a bill is amended it must go again to the printer and be reprinted with the new words printed in black letter, and the old words proposed to be stricken out enclosed in brackets, so that the legislator may see at a glance just what changes are proposed.

When bills are introduced they are filed in the order of their introduction, but they are put on the reading files—the files from which they are taken to be acted upon—in the order of their being reported out of committee. Inasmuch as the legislature always leaves many unconsidered bills on the files when it adjourns it is important to be "high up on the files." A special file is made up of such urgency measures as relate to the state institutions and to state revenue, bills which must be acted upon if government is to go on, and this file is generally cleared before adjournment. It is the custom, too, to allow each member to select off the general file one or more measures he is especially interested in and advance them on the file, and he may substitute any measure of his own low down on the file for one of his own higher up, if leave be given him by the chamber.

What constitutes engrossing and enrolling of bills under the law is neither more nor less than sending them to the state printer and taking a receipt for them and, when they have come back, carefully comparing the originals with the copies to see that no errors have been made. This requires great care and great integrity on the part of the engrossing and enrolling clerks. If these clerks have been careless, or have been bribed, they may slip in or slip out words that should not have been allowed, changing the whole meaning of a law, or they may slip a bill from the file, tear it up and so defeat it. Such things have been done and every legislator wise to his own interests personally sees to it that the engrossing and enrolling are carefully and honestly done. He never suffers a bill he is interested in to escape his attention until it is placed in the hands of the governor for executive sanction.

When either house has passed any bill finally it is sent by special messenger to the other house and that house is notified of its passage. It is not sufficient to make them laws that identical bills be passed by both houses separately. One house or other must take any given bill from the other and pass that particular bill. This is accomplished by substituting the bill that has passed through one of the houses for the identical bill that has not yet gotten through the other house.

If one chamber passes a bill, and the other amends it before passing it, it must go back to the house where it originated to have the amendment concurred in. If that chamber does not concur a joint committee is appointed to see if any agreement may be reached. If not reached then one house or the other must recede from its position or the bill fails. Some measures are lost in this way, though many more are lost through failure of one house or the other to act upon them at all.

Behold the heel on California's neck,
Her stifled enterprise in bondage held,
The grinding tribute from her fields compelled,
Her fame, her conscience and her hope awreck.

The cunning league of federated banes
Against unled, divided virtues sped,
Outpour upon this man's devoted head
The venom of all menaced ill-got gains,
Now let the insolence of triumph leer,
And joys hilarious of jail-free men
In loud and shameless boasting culminate;
Have care! It may be that within a year,
The chosen leader of two million
He may our commonwealth emancipate

Which Beat the Other to It?

MESSRS. GOMPERS, MITCHELL AND MORRISON may learn that only multi-millionaires can defy the courts with impunity. Between the time when the injunction against the boycott of the Bucks' Stove and Range Company was granted, and notice thereof was served upon them, the defendants deposited in the mails their final "We don't patronize" warning to the American Federation of Labor. They meant to "beat the courts to it," to use the expressive language of the street, but service upon them was made before this message was delivered. Defendants were properly held to be guilty of contempt. They meant to treat the court with contempt, they still hold it in contempt and their sentiment of contempt for that court and its proceedings is quite generally shared by the American people. Whether or not the injunction was in contravention of a constitutional freedom of speech and liberty of the press is for the Supreme Court of the United States to decide. We think it was. The consequences of sending these men to prison for contempt may be profound, may shake the foundations of social order; but the event may be worth the cost if the result shall be a clear definition of the rights of speech and publication. Let us do our best to keep cool while the problem is being worked out.

A Splendid Array of Reforms.

ATTORNEY GENERAL WICKERSHAM is trying to whip into practical legislative shape President Taft's ideas of the reform work which Congress should take up at the coming session. They are: federal charters for interstate corporations; an interstate commerce court; amplification of powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; such an amendment to the anti-trust law as will define "crime," as used in that act, to consist in conspiracy or combination to suppress competition and monopolize trade; the retention in the government of the ownership in fee of mineral and other common wealth not susceptible of individual development, while allowing such resources to be utilized under such terms as will insure the common good against corporate exploitation. This is a splendid array of practical reforms, but the first question that suggests itself is, at what stage of the proceedings, first or last, will the big stick swing in their behalf. Without it, nothing. With it, much. The logic of conditions more powerful than laws or constitutions forces the initiative in remedial legislation upon the executive.

John Bull's Fight for Right.

THERE IS NOW WAGING in Great Britain, with what consequences none can foresee, one of the most far-reaching battles for the rights of the common man that Anglo-Saxon civilization has witnessed. The rich want a great navy, but they want the poor to pay for it. Mr. Lloyd-George, Chancellor of the Exchequer, wants a big navy, too, but he wants the rich to pay for it. The House of Commons has stood by Lloyd-George. The Peers have just rejected his budget. The fight between Commons and Peers is on and that fight will involve the existence of the House of Lords, or its inundation by the creation of so many Liberal peers as to reverse the action of that house on the budget. The essential features of the budget are the taxation of the capitalized value of unimproved lands (not heretofore taxed at all); and a division between owner and government of any profit hereafter arising from sales of such lands at prices above the valuation made when the law goes into effect, the government to take one-third and the owner two-thirds of that profit. This involves the taking for the common benefit of a third part of the unearned increment and all British landlordism is in arms against it. Watch that fight. It will make history.

One More River to Cross.

THE TENDENCY TO EXTOL THE PERSONAL virtues of Mr. Patrick Calhoun, noticeable in many quarters, is more than coincidental. It suggests a planned effort to rehabilitate him in the public estimation. As to his being a man of power there cannot be two opinions. Any man who can break down the judicial machinery of a commonwealth, and block all its wheels, may properly be regarded as strong. Any man, too, who can mobilize the forces of organized labor to fight shoulder to shoulder with the Citizens' Alliance for the overthrow of the power of organized labor, and his own liberation from durance, may be conceded to be masterful. That his conduct as husband, father, associate, friend, is anything less than exemplary we have not heard a lip. Patrick Calhoun is a big man and his bigness has been proven in getting the better of other big men. But he caused to be paid to Abe Ruef $200,000 wherewith to debauch the government of the city of San Francisco for the advancement of his own interests and the interests of the corporation whose fortunes were confided to his care. Any man who does that is a corruptionist, an enemy to society and the foe of free government. If he were a paragon of all human virtues, and the possessor of all human powers, he would still be unworthy of public regard until he had either affirmatively proved the falsity of these charges, one and all, or expiated his offense against society by suffering that punishment which just laws mete out to high crimes against the state. Triumph over the law he may, but over men's sense of right he never can. That river he will never cross. It was not for nothing that the fruit of the tree of knowledge was eaten in the Garden.

Putting Love to a Final Test.

WERE DR. CHESTER ROWELL, mayor of Fresno, less well beloved in that community than he is he would find Fresno an uncomfortable place of residence. He vetoed a liquor ordinance sanctioned by a majority of the people at the polls, and also by a majority of the common council. That he did it bravely, and in obedience to what he deemed his duty, no one will question. That his reasons were inadequate, and his reasoning fallacious, his own statement proves. He has done the cause of a rational treatment of the liquor evil an incalculable injury by preventing the testing, at Fresno, of a system of control from which public morality had a right to expect much. That plan was to limit liquor selling to bona fide hotels and restaurants, to be served only with meals, and to family liquor stores not to be sold on the premises. No other plan had so much to promise for the temperate use of beverages whose intemperate use will always prove a burden to society. His reasoning raises the presumption that the saloon and saloon license fee are, and must remain, indispensable to municipal life. His stratification of society into those who can afford to drink at restaurants, those who can afford to drink from bottles, and those who can only afford to drink five-cent beer, and contention that legislation for or against any one of these bibulous methods is class legislation, is distinctly humorous. Dr. Rowell has gotten off wrong. So well is he beloved in his home city that the mistake he has made will not seriously hurt him, but he has greatly injured a great movement for social betterment.

Should Cities Own Harbors?

Since Oakland has voted by an overwhelming majority to undertake the improvement of its waterfront as a purely municipal proposition, and as an evidence of good faith has authorized a bond issue of more than two million dollars, it becomes very clear that this is the direction which harbor development is going to take in California. Los Angeles, by its own volition, was left out of the state bond issues for harbor improvements proposed by the last legislature, and since that time San Pedro has been annexed and a pledge given to spend $10,000,000 on the harbor during the next ten years.

Oakland and Los Angeles will have nothing to do with state harbor commissions, because they believe that in their own hands the future welfare of their ports will be safer than in the hands of the state. These cities prefer to bond themselves rather than ask the state to bond itself on the condition usual in the case of San Francisco, viz.: that the bonds shall be paid, principal and interest, out of the revenues of the harbor.

This latter procedure is practicable, up to a certain point, in the instance of San Francisco, but in the cases of Oakland and Los Angeles, if practicable at all, it would insure only a slow development, owing to the smallness of present revenues. San Diego, whose harbor revenues are the smallest of all, has before the people of the state a proposition for the issue of $1,500,000 on the same terms.

It is about time to recognize that a live question is whether or not San Francisco should take over from the state, which has been its guardian until now, the control of its harbor and become responsible for the destiny of this great property. In the last state election two bond issues proposed for the further development of this harbor were voted down by voters living outside San Francisco, and if the same fate should at the next general election overtake the two propositions which will then be voted on, we suppose no one will continue to doubt that San Francisco's interests demand that it shall dissolve the present partnership with the state. The city could with good grace say to the state:

"Thanks for the guardianship you have exercised up to this time. We will assume that it has been all for the best, although there have been occasions when the wisdom and justice of your stewardship appeared doubtful. But now I am more than of age, and it seems best that I should control my own water front, as other great cities control theirs. It ought to be developed more rapidly than it has been in the past and more rapidly than it is likely to be so long as it remains under state control. I am willing to pay for progress. It will be best for the state as well as for the city to make the harbor a municipal property. I do not suppose you will seriously object to this demand an equivalent for cession of the water front. With one or two trifling exceptions, no funds derived from state taxation have gone into the improvement of the harbor, and I can see no reason why you should not hand the whole business over to me, ridding yourself of all future responsibility. We can fix the matter up neatly and with despatch by a simple constitutional amendment."

How Heney Defeated Heney.

That Heney defeated Heney in the recent election in San Francisco seems to be conceded on all sides, but there is a difference of opinion as to just how Heney defeated Heney.

The Los Angeles Times declares that Heney defeated Heney because Heney was not an "impartial prosecutor," to which the Springfield (Mass.) Republican replies that it is "the special function of the judge to be impartial and that of the prosecutor to prosecute." Which is right?

Heney defeated Heney, it is said, because he handled Fickert without gloves. He did. He told the truth about Fickert and there are many who resent the truth as a personal affront.

Heney defeated Heney because Heney went after the rich criminals instead of the poor ones, because he sought to checkmate the influence upon the public of a press hired to lie about the prosecution, day after day and week after week, by going upon the rostrum and blurring out the whole truth in terms that the dullest comprehensions could understand, and so trying his cases at the bar of public opinion, where he was successful, instead of in the courts where the other side could pack the juries against him with dunder-heads if not worse.

Heney defeated Heney because he was in a sense a private prosecutor, working without salary and without rest, whereas, it is contended, prosecutions of malefactors of great wealth should be conducted, if at all, by public prosecutors of their own selection and election through combinations and deals that subvert the very principles of free government, such one, for instance, as has just been so selected and elected to take up the work that Heney must lay down.

Yes, Heney defeated Heney without a doubt. If he had been as mild as a sucking dove, if he had kowtowed before the Big Ones and allowed their attorneys to select his jurors for him without objection, had put one and all through an immunity bath or a process of public whitewash, Heney would not have defeated Heney. He would not have brought into the arena against him all the powers of darkness and all the wealth of the "system" and would have endeared himself to the Devil and made for himself a place in Sheol just near enough to the fire to be comfortable with the social and financial cleft of San Francisco to keep him company for ever and ever.

Yes, on mature reflection, it must be conceded that it was Heney who defeated Heney. In no particular will Charles M. Fickert repeat the "Mistakes of Heney."

Now For a Sierra Water Supply.

Prudent citizenship is demanding to know if it will be wise for San Francisco to go to the Sierras for a municipal water supply while such a supply can be had from the national government free of charge, or if it may not be safer to wait until no Sierra supply can be had without submitting to the exactions of a far-seeing conspiracy of capitalists who can conceive of no use for a municipality except that it may be robbed. Prudent citizenship may not state its case with the same degree of frankness here manifested, but this will be the purport of much that we shall hear during coming weeks. Opposition to the Sierra supply movement will be devoted to delay, and delay in availing itself of the Garfield permit will cost San Francisco the Tuolumne possibility.

It will be well if the Spring Valley system can be purchased and taken over. It should be. No city needs two water systems any more than it needs two telephone systems, and the existence of two of either is a confession of municipal incapacity to deal in a common sense way with a common sense proposition. An independent municipal system would bankrupt the Spring Valley corporation and no kind of competition would be so hard to meet by a municipal system as that of a bankrupt corporation.

San Francisco, therefore, should be willing to pay the Spring Valley company what its system is reasonably worth, and even to treat it generously. This notwithstanding the fact that the Spring Valley company has been an outlaw for a generation, and has no right which the public is under moral obligations to respect, except that a community, no more than an individual, is justified in wreaking vengeance or cherishing hatred whatever the provocation may be.

The sole issue between municipality and corporation should be the real value of what the corporation has to sell, and if both sides want to get at that real value it will be a matter of small difficulty to determine it. "Millions for actual property, but not one dollar for extortion or graft."

But if San Francisco were to succeed to the ownership of the entire Spring Valley plant it would still need to go to the Sierras for an adequate supply, quantity and quality both being considered; and the time to go is when such a supply is to be had without submitting to a hold-up. To this end the bonds should be voted now and the sudden manifestation of a spirit of comity on the part of the Spring Valley should not be permitted to stand in the way of the Hetch-Hetchy system. It may have no other purpose than to gain time, and so lose to the city its access to the Tuolumne system. Indeed, the presumption is against the sincerity of the maneuver and not favorable to it.

Therefore, now for a Sierra water supply for San Francisco!

A Hundred Million Mouths.

What the Staff of The California Weekly call their "backbone" article has, this week, to do with the State Farm at Davis. It is an enterprise that has a right to demand the intelligent concern of every landowner and farmer, or would-be farmer, in California. Whoever reads what Dr. Leroy Anderson, the superintendent, has to say of the work undertaken there, will feel encouraged for the agricultural progress of the state.

For, let it be admitted, except in some few localities, mainly in Southern California, the soil of California has been mined, not farmed. When a ton of product is taken out of a mine there remains just so much less to be taken out thereafter, whereas, under a proper system of farming, the productivity of the soil should no more be exhausted by cultivation than the power producing effect of the coming down of the waters from the summits of the Sierras should be exhausted by running the water through pipes and turbines. The land no more than the water should wear out.

There is a tremendous awakening in agricultural interest all over the country. It is not necessary to ask who started it. It was started by the same man who started every other forward and upward movement of the decade, Theodore Roosevelt. While others were asleep he foresaw that Uncle Sam would soon have a hundred million mouths to feed and that, at the rate he was exhausting his heritage, he would soon be unable to feed them, with the result that the cost of living would be raised still higher and the standard of living depressed still lower.

The Farm Land Congress, in session this week at Chicago, was but one manifestation of this wide-spread interest. The Dry Farming Congress, lately held, was another. These are good. They stimulate a far-reaching interest, but, after all, it is in the patient, plodding work of scientific education in intensive farming that progress is to be made if at all. The rule of thumb will not longer serve. Whoever does not mix brain and conscience, scientific truth with intelligent industry, in farming will deplete the soil, destroy the heritage, foster an agricultural peasantry if not peonage and starve those of our people who live up to the new line.

California needs not only a state farm at Davis, and another at Fresno, but half a dozen more preparatory agricultural schools scattered over the state, with an agricultural course in every high school and nature studies worked into every grammar and primary school as feeders for the intensive agricultural education which the few may take, by and by, at the Agricultural College of the State University. From bean planting, that the kindergarten may see the seed germ sprout, to research work into the mysteries of nature, there should not be one link missing in our educational chain.

With the prospect of a hundred million mouths to feed within the next decade this is a present problem and not one for the future.

Reformation By Simplification.

Attention is called to a resume of an address delivered before the State Bar Association by W. R. Davis, which will be found elsewhere in this paper. His theme is the pressing one of the reform of our laws and he deals with concrete instances rather than with general ideas. He proposes that certain specific things be done and that certain others be not done, and each proposal may be met by yes or no. His simile of the vines of technicality having grown over the doorway of the temple of justice is a happy one, and yet there may be some question if that of the spider having spun its web would not have been nearer the fact. However that may be the doorway to the temple of justice has been seriously obstructed and something like ninety millions of American citizens are demanding that the obstructions be cleared away.

Nor has this growth of obstruction been wholly unnatural, as the growth of vines and briars and the spinning of webs would not be. The human mind, spinning by the subtle process of reasoning, and unrestrained by the saving grace of common sense, runs off into refinements of discrimination and absurdities of logical sequence, as certainly self-destructive as any other unbalanced impulse of nature. Half the birds die of starvation every winter, but if they did not we should rarely see the sun for the clouds of birds that would forever be flying over our heads. Logic has its uses, but unbridled it would make the world a madhouse.

The tendencies toward judicial refinements and technical exactness have been unhampered in this country for more than a century and have run their course. They have reached the point of self destruction and limitation, like many another malady, and have broken down under their own weight. That is the whole story and American common sense must now reassert its authority and see to it that its authority is respected.

In this work the bar can help, but it cannot and will not do it all. It will have to unlearn more than the American people will have to unlearn of Jackson's financial absurdities that a central American bank may be re-established, before it will submit to such a clearing away of the briars and cobwebs as will permit the access of the poor to the temple of justice on terms of equality with the rich. Nothing short of that will serve. As one who goes to a lawyer to have a contract drawn must tell his lawyer what he wants to have put into that contract, so an informed and aroused public sentiment must tell the gentlemen of the bar what reforms are wanted before those gentlemen will be able to whip them into language appropriate to that end.

The bar can help, the press can help, but, in the last analysis, public sentiment will have to lead the riot act to both press and bar if it would be obeyed.

To Lincoln-Roosevelters.

It is time to get busy for the campaign of 1910. Unless all signs fail the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau, re-enforced by the allied infamies that lately overthrew the forces of civic decency in San Francisco (including the McCarthy labor party), have made common cause against a Progressive Republicanism. The issue must be fought out in the coming primaries and for the control of the Republican party machinery. That machinery will still be controlled by a convention and, at the primary election, delegates must be selected to those conventions. Unless the greatest interest is taken those selections will go by default and Herrin will still be found in possession of the works. Anyhow a Progressive Republicanism will have to contend against a solidified tenderloin vote, re-enforced by all others of such elastic consciences as will permit them to register as Republicans for the primary elections, but with full intent and purpose to vote at the general election for the Democratic or McCarthy party candidates. That is what the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement is up against.

Nor is that all. Within its own ranks there are those who have lost their grip. If not downright favorable to Gillett they are unnerved by being told that "he can't be beaten, so what's the use." That kind of timber will not do to build a reform movement on and the sooner those who take that view take themselves out of the reform movement the better for that movement. The interests involved are far beyond those of having a passable governor or a passable government. The issue is as to whether this is to be a free government or one dominated by rapacious and affiliated corporations, a democracy or a plutocracy, a government for the many or for the few already richer than princes; for the preservation of our resources for the common good of all or for the exploitation of the many that the few may become millionaires many times over, perhaps, to astound the world with their largesses.

Let those take a hand in this forward movement who have the stomach for it and let those who have no stomach for a conflict, hand to hand and foot to foot, stay out of it. It is a man's job, anyway.

It is true that the forces of righteousness have just been beaten in San Francisco and beaten soundly, but these forces can do a worse thing than be beaten. They can surrender without a fight. There are those who would like to have such a surrender made. It is not impossible that the Call may counsel it instead of merely foreshadowing it. Things squint that way, but let not those counsels be heeded. They are Greeks bringing gifts. There is every reason for fighting the reelection of Gillett that there is for fighting the election of Curry, and there is every reason for fighting the election of Curry that there would be for fighting McCarthy or Dr. O'Donnell for governor. Give us rather Calhoun, Herrin, Hellman in person.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

There has arisen in society a figure which is certainly the most mournful, and in some respects the most awful, upon which the eye of the moralist can dwell. That unhappy being whose very name is a shame to speak, whose countenance with a cold heart transports of affection, and submits herself as the passive instrument of lust; who is scorned and insulted as the vilest of her sex, and doomed, like herself, to disease and abject wretchedness and an early death, appears in every age as the perpetual symbol of the degradation and the sinfulness of man. Herself the supreme type of vice, she is ultimately the most efficient guardian of virtue. But for her, the unchallenged purity of countless homes would be polluted, and not a few who, in the pride of their untutored charity, think of her with an indignant shudder, would have known the agony of remorse and of despair. On that one degraded and ignoble form are concentrated the passions that might have filled the world with shame. She remains, while creeds and civilizations rise and fall, the eternal priestess of humanity, blasted for the sins of the people.

The foregoing is from the pen of William Edward Hartpole Lecky, the Irish historian, philosopher and man of letters. Is he right? This we do know: In all ages, in all climes, and in all countries, there have never been a dearth of faithless women to meet the requirements of licentious men. The ranks of the fallen are filled as fast as the chariot closes over them.

Is it unavoidable, inevitable and necessary? It relieves the mind of a great responsibility if one may accept that inevitable and inevitable as axiomatic. Is it? Now that the White Slave Trade is before the public for discussion these queries become pertinent.

The Socialist says "no, the social evil is the fault of capitalism. Revolutionize society, reform it on our plan and every woman will have a husband and every man a wife, poverty will grind nowhere, and it is poverty that produces prostitution." The Socialist is nothing if not sanguine. He is all intellect and, if he were to turn his attention to mechanics, perpetual motion would come easy to him. No sort of mechanism would have so many wheels and balances as it is, as it is so complicated for his comprehension, but the world distrusts his common sense.

There are women, perhaps three to five in the hundred of those who have fallen, who are congenitally evil. Let them go to their place. The rest have been recruited from two principal sources. They have been sinned against or they have yielded to an overwhelming desire to live beyond their means. In strict justice to the male let it be said that the latter cause accounts many times over the other for moral failure among young women. It may be confessed that no woman thus disposed is long left without a market for her wares, but let not men be blamed beyond their deserts.

It has pleased God or modern evolutionary tendencies, one or both, to endow the female of the human species, almost alone of all others, with a love of finery and for making a brave show that she may attract a mate. Outside the human family it is the male that struts and crows and decks himself out in bright colors. Given this instinct in high degree, together with a low earning capacity and an undisciplined moral fibre, and moral failure becomes nearly inevitable.

Sex emotion, love of finery, low earning capacity and undisciplined moral fibre all culminate during the silly age of girlhood, the time of her life when every girl pre-eminently needs a mother and careful loving restraint. Added to this she is likely to have boy on the brain, and boy will further complicate her case. Tide her over this period and she will be as safe as her mother.

The significant culmination of what has been said is that the girl in a broken home has no proper guardianship during this vulnerable period in her life, and it is from the broken homes that the ranks of the prostitution are recruited. It is not so much the "daughters of the poor" who are sacrificed as the daughters of the divorce court. Here is a source of social evil that may be lessened whenever public sentiment gives the word.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Suicide Is On the Increase.

For several years Frederick L. Hoffman has tabulated the suicide records of the United States, and his tables are recognized as being as authentic as can be compiled. They are not reassuring to one who would believe that the world's misery is decreasing, showing, as they do, that both the number and the rate of suicides are increasing. For instance, there were 601 more suicides in 1908 than there were in 1907, and the rate per 100,000 for the latter year was 18.8, while in 1908 it was 21.8, the highest point yet attained. Nor is it comforting to a Californian to see it demonstrated, by the implacable logic of figures, that there are far more self-murders about our magnificent bay than in any other part of our country, yet this is the statistical fact. In San Francisco, during the decade from 1898 to 1907, inclusive, there were 1,792 suicides, an estimated rate of 5.6 to the 100,000 of population. In 1908 the number rose to 211, and the rate to 55.8. In Oakland, during the 1898-1907 decade, the number of suicides was 233, the rate 32.6, in 1908 the suicides were 54, the rate 66.2. No other city in the country begins to touch these figures, the nearest being Hoboken, St. Louis, and Denver, with rates respectively (for the decade and for the year) of 29.1 and 37.6, 28.2 and 31.9, 24.7 and 36.6. Even New York city, where one might suppose most people would grow weary of the struggle, showed a record for the decade of but 20.8, and 33.7 for 1908, an average of about half the rate about this bay. In Charleston, S. C., the rates for the two terms were only 4.6 and 7.1. Our fearful showing may in part be due to the fact that our population since the earthquake has been more or less an unknown quantity, but, after making liberal allowance for this fact, there is not much room for doubt that the record still is against us. As for the reason, pages might be devoted to it and the answer still be remote.

German Emigrants Well Off.

It is generally recognized that the Germans are a thrifty people, and wherever they go they are likely to carry prosperity with them. Because of this thrift, too, their emigrants more frequently have money than have those from most other nations, notably those from southern Europe. A recent investigation of the emigration from one parish of Berlin revealed the fact that of 1,470 persons who emigrated during the three months ending with last September not more than one-third could be described as poor, the others varying from comfort to comparative wealth. Six had more than $20,000 each, four over $12,000, ten over $10,000, twelve over $6,000, while the number possessing from $2,000 to $6,000 ran into the scores. This is such a showing as probably could not be made by any European nation to the south of Germany, with the exception of Switzerland. These are the kind of people whom Uncle Sam can afford to welcome with open arms, not because they bring wealth, but because they create wealth both for themselves and him.

Facts Concerning Our Roads.

According to Logan W. Page, director of the United States office of public roads, "in mileage we have the most tremendous system of roads which any country has ever possessed since the world began. According to a careful road census the length of all of our roads amounts to 2,155,000 miles." On these roads we expend about $90,000,000 annually, or $41.75 per mile. These figures appear to lump big, but compare them with those of England. In that country there are only 150,000 miles of road, and on them annually is spent $80,000,000, or $533.10 for each mile. That is to say, for each dollar that we expend on each mile of road the Englishman expends $12.75. Yet it must be clear that the need of a new country for road expenditure is greater than that of our old country. Of our road expenditures, too, no small part is used with such poor judgment as to produce little permanent or valuable effect. Indeed, Mr. Page remarks that "about half of the states are operating under practically the same road laws as prevailed in England when America was a colony," it is pleasant to note that California is included in the limited number of states in which Mr. Page finds the road-building conditions most hopeful.

The French Government's Little Rake-Off.

On all money which is won on gambling devices at French resorts the government receives a bonus of 15 per cent. It now is known that its "rake-off" for the season of 1908-9 was $943,393. This means, if the gamblers did not succeed in evading any payments, that the sum total of bets was $6,289,286.70, a very pretty sum to be paid in hope of winning a smile from the fickle goddess. Concerning the right or wrong of the government's action in sanctioning gambling something might be said, but, letting that question pass, it is just to say that much of the sum thus secured is put to excellent service. Fully $600,000 was divided among hospitals, orphanages, etc., of Paris, and other sums went to similar institutions throughout France. Queer about money! It may come covered with filth, and go to do heaven's own work.

A Great Increase in Imports.

The United States bureau of statistics has issued a bulletin showing the great increase in the importation of manufacturers' materials in September of this year as compared with the same month last year. In many instances these increases amount to 40 to 200 per cent. Here are figures relating to some of the staples, in all cases referring to the month of September of either this year or last: Wool imports, 25,250,000 pounds in 1909, $5,000,000 in 1908; cotton, 6,000,000 to 3,000,000 last year; hides and skins, 51,000,000 to 35,000,000; pig tin, 9,500,000 pounds, to 6,750,000. Most food stuffs, however, show a decline, the following being a few of the notable, with comparison between the same months: Sugar imports, 227,000,000 pounds, against 383,000,000 last year; tea, 11,000,000 pounds, against 14,000,000; cocoa, 4,000,000 pounds, against 6,750,000. Luxuries appear to be booming. In September of this year 50,176 dozen quarts of champagne were imported, while in that month last year the importation was but 18,230 quarts. This year (September) diamonds of the value of $3,800,000 were imported, while last year the valuation was only $1,700,000. Probably a deduction from these facts that the American people this year mean to "live higher" and eat less than usual would be fallacious, but this is what a rash reasoner might take the figures to indicate.

English Society Now Is "Bombarding."

English Society—that is, Society of the real tutti-frutti variety—has rather varied that article in its creed which asserted that bridge is the chief end of man and woman, and shows an inclination to adopt "bombarding" in its stead. The average reader does not know what Society bombarding it, and this is to inform him or her. The object is to break into the house of the person to be bombarded, he being notified of the intention. Srenuous measures frequently are adopted. One fair young creature tucked her hair beneath a cap, first, presumably, having doffed any that did not grow on her head, donned a messenger boy's uniform, and delivered a message. The scheme worked. Another being bombarded had herself delivered in a roll of linoleum which the householder was expecting, although he was not expecting to receive her in it. She, too, bombarded with success, but how she unpacked herself has not been told.

Such, briefly sketched, is the game that Society over there now is playing—its own invention, too. Any yet there are people so sacrilegious as to assert that Society—always with a capital letter—is not a sacred institution!

Billions Given to the Public.

It is said that, during the years 1903 to 1906, inclusive, more than four billion dollars (an absolutely inconceivable sum) was given by various individuals for the public good. John D. Rockefeller has thus given nearly $115,000,000, while Andrew Carnegie is a close second with a sum approximating $100,000,000, and the beauty of the case is that neither one of these men will miss the money. Next to these two, perhaps, is Mrs. Russell Sage, who, within three or four years, has given away about $25,000,000 of the $65,000,000 her husband left her, and if Russell does not turn in his grave they who are over there do not know what is going on this side of the misty boundary line. As is generally known, a very considerable part of these gifts has gone to educational and kindred institutions.

New Stamps for the Red Cross.

The national Red Cross Society has selected the design for its new stamps, and 50,000,000 of them will be issued. These will be placed on sale some time during the present month, and the proceeds will be used by the society in its war-against consumption. Last year it cleared $140,000 by the sale of such stamps.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

"Tale of Two Cities."

"The least Dickensian of Dickens's works" is the phrase generally applied to the "Tale of Two Cities." This is true only as to the form of the story, which is the most compact, best organized and most logical of his novels. But beneath the form, or dress, of the story, the beloved qualities of Dickens appear clearly; a heart shaken by pity for the unfortunates of the world, a feminine compassion for human frailties, a warm love and admiration for the good and the brave, a passionate hatred of oppression and greed and cruelty, a valiant determination to pursue the strong wicked to their innermost secret refuge and stab their conscience with their own meanness.

As a novel the tale is admirable in its vivid characterization of the people who act the drama, in the steady rise of interest in the plot, in the grand tragedy of the climax where death resolves all complications, freeing the wretched from misery, freeing the innocent from evil, and cleansing a life of weakness and failure by a supreme act of moral heroism. The figure of Sidney Carton goes calmly to the shambles rises amongst the heroes of tragedy with Shakespeare's Brutus. A strange and moving narrative, the "Tale of Two Cities" stands in a region of fiction peculiar to itself, like nothing written before or since, a true tragedy that really points a moral and adorns a tale.

WHY ILLUSTRATE?

The New York Sun once happily hit off a weakness of certain types of mind. In substance, the Sun said:

"One of our contemporaries mourns that so much public interest is aroused over the centenary of the birth of Oliver Wendell Holmes. Our contemporary says that Doctor Holmes was not profound. Another contemporary assures us that the profoundest living thinker is Prof. Josiah Royce, of Harvard."

There the Sun discreetly stopped, leaving the reader to ask the inevitable question, Who the dickens is Royce?

Profundity of the Royce type affects few other minds. Doctor Holmes has touched millions. Perhaps a million blows of a tack-hammer will drive more piles than a pile-driver that hits no piles.

Something of this principle explains the value of illustrating periodicals. The elder Houghton was once urged to illustrate the Atlantic Monthly. He flew into a rage at the thought of such desecration, and the Atlantic Monthly to-day has all of 12,000 subscribers. It is profound, but it is read mainly by people who would have a varied opportunity for culture if it did not endeavor to improve.

The illustrated periodicals, however, stoop to every device to attract the eye, to surprise the mind into taking a nibble, from a nibble to a bite, from a bite to a banquet. Collier's Weekly may not deliver sledge-hammer blows (though we think it does), but every blow strikes nearly a million minds. Everybody's may not have such profound messages to deliver (though Judge Lindsey strikes to the heart of a world tragedy), but its messages are read by more than a half million. The American Magazine touches a reading public that the Atlantic could never reach—a vaster and more potent public.

Illustration helps. Life, the satirical weekly, discovered that tabloid doses of philosophy were avidly devoured when surrounded by large draughts of pictures. There is hardly enough reading matter in Life to occupy one's time on the ferry trip across San Francisco bay, but it is so attractively served that everybody wants it.

The question is all one of effect, and the public seems to have settled in its favor of the decorated and interesting as against the plain and heavily profound.

RARE THACKERAY BOOKS.

The Wilhelmus Mynderse library, which was sold in New York recently, contained several rare volumes of Thackeray's work. The most valuable of them was a copy of "Floret Zephyr, Ballet Mythologique, Par Theophile Wagstaff," folio London and Paris, 1836. Thackeray's first separate publication, consisting of eight plates, "Scenes in the Life of a Ballet Girl," with an account of the various plates. It was knocked down to G. D. Smith for $700. This same copy was in the Augustin Daily sale and sold there for $420.

"The Second Funeral of Napoleon and the Chronicle of the Drum," by M. A. Titmarsh, London, 1841, a Thackeray item of great importance, was bought by J. O. Wright for $200.

Copies of The Snob: A literary and Not-Scientific Journal, Conducted by Members of the University, and The Gownsmen (formerly called The Snob), a Literary and Scientific Journal, now conducted by members of the university, Cambridge, 1820-30, containing original contributions by Thackeray, went to G. D. Smith for $135.

"The Yellow Plush Correspondence," first edition, Philadelphia, 1838, spoken of by Mrs. Ritchie as the "first of Thackeray's writings ever published as a book," brought only $10, due in part to spotted pages.

A fine copy of the first edition of "Comic Tales and Sketches," edited and illustrated by Michael Angelo Titmarsh, author of "The Paris Sketch Book," two volumes, binding by Zachusdorf, was knocked down to F. W. Morris for $92.

Californian Poets' Corner

THE RETURN OF KUNOTSUKI.

By Ralph Erwin Gibbs.

Of all the young men whom California has had and lost none was of greater promise than Ralph Erwin Gibbs, graduate of the University of California, who met with a sad and accidental death just at the beginning of a career of letters which there is reason to believe would have been of more than ordinary distinction.

I came through the village, and none—not one—

Saw aught but a traveler, strange and old;
Still swift as of yore doth the river run.

But fast as the river the years have rolled;
Now are the hearts of men grown cold;

And Youth is a word graven on a tomb;
Yet, ah!—as I came by the riverside,—hold!

'Twas the old sweet scent of Azalea bloom.

The rice-fields, shimmering green in the sun,
Are narrower now than they seemed of old;

Here used we to watch how the dragon-flies spun
About us in mazes of scarlet and gold;

But now the gay haunts of youth are held
Are dimmed,—as the tinsel that used to illumine

Our shadowless world where all grief was consoled
In the sooth sweet scent of Azalea bloom.

Changed, all changed where my life was begun!
New paths they have trodden where once we were strolled;

And here,—in that garden where, one by one,

We saw the gay haunts of youth are held—
The vine-curtained arbor is sunk into mould,

And only there lingers the old perfume
From the Tale that shall never again be told,—

The sad sweet scent of Azalea bloom.

Friend of My Youth,—though our hearts be cold,
And new paths trodden where once we were strolled,—

Lo, the Tale drifts back in this weird perfume—

The old sweet scent of Azalea bloom.

OLD MAGAZINES AND NEW.

Goethe once said that there was really no such thing as originality in literature; all possible subjects had been sounded and their depths were known; and that what is commonly called originality is simply the power to write about old subjects in so fresh a manner as to make them sound new. He tested his theory by taking the ancient story of Faust, around which a dozen classics had been already written, and making it a masterpiece.

The idea seems further justified by contemporaneous American periodical literature. The first American magazines were patterned after the English reviews; those unillustrated, ponderous monthly broadsides of intellect which still find favor across the water. The Atlantic Monthly and the Forum cling to this ideal to-day, and have a profound influence with about 20,000 people out of eighty millions.

Enterprising American publishers concluded that the reason more magazines were not read was that the magazines did not contain things these people wanted to read, and that the magazines cost too much. Frank Munsey led the most radical movement to popularize magazines. He reduced the price to ten cents, introduced elaborate illustrations, shorter and more popular stories, and very light popular descriptions of great men and great movements. He achieved an early and enormous success.

Then S. S. McClure started a magazine with a purpose, the purpose of informing the American public about public affairs in a way that would be interesting as well as significant. He discovered a secret, that the ideal expert in any subject generally knows nothing about writing, whereas a trained newspaper reporter, with a reasonable outlay of time in interviewing the technical expert, can understand the expert's explanations of his information and can then write that information up in an interesting manner that is comprehensible to the average reader.

This discovery has since led to the development of the trained corps of writers on public questions, such as Lincoln Steffens, Ray Stannard Baker, Miss Ida Tarbell, George Kibbe Turner, Henry Beach Needham, and George Kennan. These writers are primarily expert reporters, but their training has made them also expert students of politics, of economics, and of sociology, gatherers of the fruits of labor of thousands of technical experts. But they are first of all entertaining writers.

The result is that American periodicals now get their largest circulation because of the articles they contain on the same subjects that the old-time magazines discussed, with the difference that the new magazines make these subjects interesting and human where the old ones continue to make them dull and technical. And it is noteworthy that Munsey's belongs to the past, though for another reason. It is not dead, but it is not genuinely informing. It has not caught step with the journalism that has a vital connection with vital affairs of life.

THE HUMBLE LIBRETTIST.

In the history of opera there are many curious anomalies, says the Forum; but perhaps the strangest is the role played by the librettist. For the most part obscure and unimportant and generally unremembered, his ranks have nevertheless been recruited from the ablest and most brilliant men of letters. Among those who have undertaken the part are such unlikely names as Voltaire, Goethe, Wieland, Addison and Fielding; while others of considerable poetic talent, for example Metastasio, Calzabigi, Rinuccini, Boito and Coppee, have tried their hand at libretto writing with assurance, giving it their best efforts. And yet the successful librettists are few—the merest handful out of a harvest of three centuries.

REFORM OF LAW AND LAWYERS

REMEDIES SUGGESTED BY W. R. DAVIS, OF OAKLAND.

[The following address concludes the series of speeches delivered at the banquet of November 9th, preceding the formation of the state bar association. The California Weekly has adopted the same method as before in reprinting this address: it is given in its literary unity and style of the original for the purpose of throwing up into bold relief the positive suggestions of the speaker for the reform of our law. —Editor.]

One-third of the cases brought to court go out of court upon technical points of procedure, such cases never being disposed of upon their merits. This is a shocking fact. A system leading to such a result must be radically wrong.

We are making too many lawyers. Competition is a good thing, but there is a limit as to how much raw material any country or any profession can absorb to advantage. The course at the law schools should certainly not be less, and the examination for admission should certainly be more exhaustive than it has been. If it takes one day to examine a class, let us take that. If it takes two, let it be two. And if it takes a week to get to the bottom of their minds before they shall be armed with a license to invade the community, let it take a week. The examining court, in my opinion, can perform its more important public duty during any week of their service than to scan and probe and reach the bottom of the qualifications of these young men.

Nor do I believe that the function of a lawyer before an appellate court is to occupy time to display to his clients his alleged learning. I have always supposed that our service there is to aid the court of appeal by presenting and clarifying what would otherwise require more time on the part of the higher courts. So I suggest that the young novitiate, before he is admitted to the bar he must first practice the profession at least three years in the Superior Court, as a member of that court, before becoming eligible to occupy the time of the courts of last resort.

Now as to procedure. Let me say a word with reference to the forms of doing things. If you wish to raise the question of jurisdiction for any defect in the service of summonses, you must make a special appearance. If you want to appear but are not yet ready to do anything else, why, you appear. If you want to do something else before demurring, you move. If you want to demur, you demur. By-and-by, when you are ready to answer, you answer. Now we have there a series of five forms of getting into court, and yet, generally speaking, all we have done as to the merits between the parties is to have an answer in. Why should not the defendant, when he appears in a case, appear, and if he has any objection to make, make it? His rights can be saved just the same.

Then, too, we have gone on for forty years having to say twice that we objected to the same thing, or else it didn't count. You first objected, and then, if you did not note an exception to the ruling which followed the objection and your statement of the grounds, your objection went for naught. There never was any sense in that, and it never served any purpose except to entrap the unwary or the unskilled.

Another thing as I pass along occurs to me. Who of you would profess to know for sure the difference in this state between a setoff, a recoupment, a counterclaim, and a cross-complaint? The bar does not know it. Nor is it any reflection upon the learning of the bench to say that the bench does not yet know it, either. What sense is there in all that attempted refinement gone to seed in confusion? If a defendant has something against a claim asserted on the part of the plaintiff, why is it not enough that he set it up (whether it is recoupment, setoff, counterclaim, or cross-complaint), in one splendidly simple pleading on behalf of the defendant, and get at the merits of that case? Why not?

One or two things in our probate procedure have occurred to me as easy of improvement. The present probate machinery which we have is mechanically beautiful. It fits cog into cog like a piece of steel machinery. But most men die without leaving a million. Take the estates under ten thousand, or say under five thousand dollars. Why should all this laborious machinery of a million dollar estate be made applicable to a small estate like that? This little estate cannot bear the burden. If the work is to be paid for in proportion to the value of the unnecessary work required, the estate cannot stand it; and if only in proportion to the net value of the little estate, then there are some hard-working lawyers bearing the burden of that unnecessary labor without fair compensation.

I think there should be an alternative plan for the small estates, illustrated in this way: After the court has obtained jurisdiction of the parties by a notice such as we now give, with or without a will, where there is no contest, or the contest is disposed of as to the administrator or executor, or as to the validity of the will, turn the business administration of that little estate into the hands of the judge of the superior court sitting in probate as a chancellor, clothed with the ordinary powers of a business man, to go on in a business way and handle the affairs of that small estate and wind it up. If it should be necessary under such a plan that additional security should be required, let it be required.

Another thing in the same quarter. There should be a law under which a man, at his option, may file and record his will and have it contested if it is ever to be open to contest, while he is yet a living witness. The testator should have the right to record the instrument by which he proposes to distribute his property and call forth the slumbering contest while he can speak and answer it. It may be well that notice of the recordation should be served upon the heirs resident in the state (as we now do when we come to the probate of a will), and then allow a reasonable number of days, say sixty, within which contests must be filed, if they are ever to be filed, against his own distribution of his property.

If a man does not choose to record his will, then, of course, he might be permitted to follow the old plan. For my part, I can see great advantage in this optional plan and I think I can see the practical annihilation of an illegitimate industry (of contesting wills) and the uplifting of the law in the esteem of the people of the state, whose laws these laws are. These laws are not for us, professionally, but for them and us as citizens of a commonwealth. That is the ever present atmosphere of all this.

Some time when I have been spoken to about remedial legislation to be accomplished through the activity of the bar I have said, "Why, these are not my laws. These are not the bar's laws. You made them. We all want better laws. If you wish better ones, why don't you elect a better man to the legislature and make better laws for yourselves and for us? It is as much your task as mine." But, as I have thought more of it I am convinced that that answer is no better than a plea in abatement. It does not answer to the merits of the difficulty. How can the unskilled make it much better?

All honest men, and nearly all men are honest, want better laws precisely as we do, simpler in their execution and more efficient—just as we do. But they do not know as well how to frame them, and we cannot evade the responsibility of helping to make better laws, of acquiring better education and of elevating the practice of the law and of the better qualification of those promoted to the bench—we cannot evade this responsibility as citizen-lawyers or as lawyer-citizens if we would. If that work is to be done, it must be formulated, shaped, constructed, fathered and forwarded by the profession of which you and I are members.

Our country is a republic. And the will here which ultimately determines law is that complex, component, collective will of millions of fellow citizens—of whom we lawyers are a small part, yet bearing not only their average responsibility but also the added responsibility to which I have already referred. It is to be regretted that of recent years there has come to be a disintegration of confidence in matters pertaining to the law and its operation. It is chiefly not because many in the profession have been found corrupt, nor because here and there one on the bench has been found derelict; but because in the administration of law the practice and the procedure have grown up so that like an immense, multifarious, irresistible vine the procedure, the forms, the technicalities and the delays of the law have overgrown the doorway of the temple of justice itself, until, when the citizen looks at the law, he sees first of all overgrowth, undergrowth, obstruction, forms, entangling vines and sinuosities by which all direct approach to the merits of a controversy is so encumbered and his time and his experience so increased that he withdraws confidence and commends itself and substitutes condemnation of his own law.

There are millions of that average citizen. Something is the matter when millions of men become dissatisfied with the administration and the practice of the law. How shall we restore that respect for the judiciary and that confidence in the bar which existed fifty years ago? It cannot be done by high sentiments alone, expressed here to-night. We must produce results, must be prepared to frame and to support measures which will cut away some of this growth and these vines and enable the citizen and the litigant to have confidence and to be able to proceed rapidly, safely and with certainty to the proper ends of justice.

One other suggestion and I have done. Every man must contribute in proportion to his taxable property to the school fund, to the maintenance of the public school system of this country, its greatest safety and strength, the greatest factor making for the perpetuity of our institutions. It does not matter that he is unmarried or childless, he must contribute, willingly or unwillingly, his due proportion to the maintenance of that which makes for the public good, for better citizenship, for the perpetuity of the institutions of the republic. And this is right. Without such principles as these, without such enforcements against the will of the unwilling, the narrow and the sordid, this republic could not endure another hundred years.

Now, what is the chief difficulty in getting the best action of the collective legislative will of the state? Or in utilizing it for the greatest general good? In the judicial department we have mandamus to compel action. But there is no corresponding mandamus of compulsion yet adopted in this country by which the citizen, negligent of his duty with reference to the franchise, can be compelled to go to the polls and discharge his duty to his state and to the nation. Yet he holds part of this collective will. He is part of it. We ought to have, and I think with the earnest support of our profession can have, legislation compelling those clothed with the franchise, who are found negligent in the discharge of their duty, to discharge that duty. The very men failing now to discharge their duty are men of property, men of judgment, of sense, of industry, of sobriety and of family, stable men in the community. They should be compelled into that duty by a statute requiring them to perform it. And presently a secondary result from that will follow, equally important with the primary result. They who have no interest in the discharge of the duty of electors, being forced to participate in the discharge of that duty, will presently become informed in it, interested in it, and then they will cease to be stay-aways and become active, intelligent, potent factors in the collective will of the

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

My Nellie.

I wake in the night with a sobbing cry
For Nellie,
And the voice of the wind is an answering sigh
For Nellie.
Then, seeking and seeking, o'er hill and plain
The wind-wraith presses its search again,
But ever and ever it seeks its vain
For Nellie.

Her feet were as wee as a wee babe's are—
My Nellie—
And yet they have wandered so far, so far!
Ah, Nellie,
Is there never a course from the unseen shore
That little, wee sailors may journey o'er?
Then come, with kisses mine own once more,
My Nellie.

Have the angels taught you, in God's school,
this,
My Nellie,
How our hearts still yearn for the babe we miss,
My Nellie?

Then whisper a prayer to the Master kind
That he will lead you to find
To the loving ones whom you left behind,
My Nellie.

I wake in the night with a sobbing cry
For Nellie,
For again in my dreams I see her lie,
My Nellie,
With a rosebud clasped in her rosebud hand
As she gently drifts to the unseen land,
And my heart refuses to understand,
My Nellie.

Boston on the Baconian Trail.

A dispatch from Boston announces that a party of men and women of that city, "all noted for their learning and high social position," now are in England, and, guided by a Baconian cipher, are about to find the "secret chamber" in which all of Lord Bacon's manuscripts were hidden by him. Just why Bacon hid them the dispatch does not say, but it does not really matter, for if the Boston people are of "high social position" everything must be all right. However, it is what these people are going to find in the "secret chamber" that most interests. I quote:
"From a literary standpoint, what is considered to be the most important result of this discovery is the expected establishing of Bacon's claim to the authorship of the Shakespeare plays and to much of the writings of Robert Greene, George Peele, Christopher Marlowe's plays, Edmund Spenser's 'Faerie Queene,' Burton's 'Anatomy of Melancholy' and other important historical and literary masterpieces."

The list is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. The world still will demand that those Boston people of "high social position" inform it whether or not Lord Bacon wrote "Beautiful Snow" in some moment of graceful ease. Why should they discover so much, and not discover the rest? It has been claimed that both Ella Wheeler Wilcox and Colonel Joyce wrote "Laugh, and the world laughs with you." Is it not possible to end this controversy by discovering, in the secret chamber, the original manuscript written by Bacon? If so, these people of high social position owe it to suffering mankind to discover it. By the way, the Boston party also owes it to everybody to discover whether anybody besides Bacon wrote anything in his time, for this is becoming a question of serious importance.

I b'lieve in the old-fashioned experience meetin's, fer if some folks don't tell you they're converted how are you ever goin' to find it out?

Lives of rich men oft remind us that if gold our coffers fills we may also leave behind us heirs to contest our last wills.

Seems ter me that the trouble with some good people that want to see things movin' just right is that they ain't willin' to give God time enough.

Life always has its compensations. We know more at forty than we did at twenty; but we don't have near so much fun knowin' it.

My observation is that they's no enemy outside of a church that can hit it as steady an tellin' blows es do some of the people that b'long to it.

I've 'bout come to the conclusion that any man is a good deal better an' a good deal worse than we give him credit for.

Be Pitiful for Him.

Be pitiful for him. Nay, pass him by,
Indifferent, with cold, averted eye.
Stumbling and fallen, cruel is his lot,
Which God shall heed, and shall not you an

Child of the slums, where litters Evil's brood, Their atmosphere of death through youth was his,

Lettered in sin, but all untaught of good,
How should he be save what he must, and is?

Be pitiful for him.

Be pitiful for him. He is the fruit
Of man's dark upas tree of doubts and fears,
Or, better, is the black, distorted root Planted with sighs and watered with our tears.

Here Davy rides, there Lazarus doth creep;
A palace here, a falling hovel there;
Fate dealt you good, to him the woe he weeps;
His heart knew dreams, but all his days were bare.

Be pitiful for him.

Be pitiful for him. Though lost he be,
God's love may find him in a distant day,
And haply you and I more foul than he Might now have been if we had walked his way.

Out of the slum shall dainty things be born?
Yet from the depths a cry may reach to Him.

Hopeless and sodden, wretched and forlorn, Man, and man's victim, aye, and menace grim—

Be pitiful for him.

No Use to Give It Up.

This life is all a riddle

Is a song that is true,

But you'll have to keep on guessing

If you ever guess it right.

A Thanksgiving Ode.

Etftoon Thanksgiving Day is here,
And I a grateful song would raise
To herald blessings far or near
And sum them in a chant of praise.
High ring the notes from my wee lyre—
The price of turkey rises higher.

To sing the good that bides with me,
Ring out, ye notes, all sweet and clear,
A grateful spirit fix the key,

A heart unknowing dread and fear:
Rise fast, ye notes, and doubt o'ermaster—
The price of turkey rises faster.

With bounding feet my spirit runs
To greet the glad Thanksgiving Day,
The day of praise for genial suns
That shine in Californian ways;
It bounds, it speeds, life's lowlands shunning—
The draited turkey beats it running!

The Daily Papers and Alma Bell.

A Placer county girl, mentally unformed, neglected throughout her childhood and little cared for throughout her unfortunate young womanhood, miserably commonplace, loved a man "not wisely, but too well," and because he deserted her in her sore dilemma, killed the fellow. Perhaps he deserved his fate, possibly he did not; I do not know, and I shall live quite as happily if I never know. It is sufficient to realize that the simple recital of such facts is pathetic and that not one of us all can do anything to make it less so.

But now watch the daily papers. The feast of lecherous foulness and death is spread, and the ghouls do gloat upon it. Inch after inch of space, column after column, page after page—so this menu of moral corruption is dealt out to the "intelligent public" through foul days and filthy weeks. For it reports write their prettiest of drool and slaver, and so mix pathos and bathos that even intelligence scarcely can distinguish between them. Even mighty editors occasionally pause in their majestic careers to dip their pens in the stretch-pots of this case and add their philosophy anent it to the general odor that permeates the moral atmosphere. If you read the daily papers you do not merely touch pitch; you suffocate in it.

And why?

For two reasons. First, this case chanced to come on the boards when there was a dearth of sensations. The sun rose and set, leaving scarcely a streak of yellow on the newspaper sky. This, as every great editor knows, is an unbearable situation. Well, there was considerable yellow to the Alma Bell case. It would do to fill a yawning chasm which the great editors knew the intelligent public insisted should be filled.

Second, there was a streak of lubricity in this case, and do not our great editors know that the public demands this not only for the desert but as the piece de resistance of its newspaper meal? The dear people insist upon a skeleton at their feast. Very well, the great editors are the home missionaries to supply the demand.

It is impossible that I am the only person who turns with repugnance from this window-dish of lechery and murder. It must be that there are others, too, who are nauseated by this thousand-tongued bray concerning an unknown woman's misfortune and crime. But what can we do about it? Do not the great editors know that our moral and intellectual appetites are not normal, that indeed, they must be abnormal, else would they not be content when they are satisfied with something other than filth and corruption? They know what is good for us, and we must take it and look pleasant, or else go without our daily paper—which would be a trying thing to do. But is it really true that there are so few who prefer the decent that no daily paper in San Francisco could afford to pander to them?

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly.

Sir:—I had your circular letter, soliciting my subscription to your weekly chiefly or wholly on the ground that it is the "chief advocate" of reform of our American judiciary. I have frequently read the weekly, and like it, but not chiefly as the exponent of the reform of our system of jurisprudence. I do not agree with you that the "administration of justice in this country is on trial at the bar of public opinion." On the other hand I think that public opinion, or, rather, popular government, of which our administration of justice, our system of law-making, etc., are but parts, is itself now and ever since the foundation of our government has been, on trial. The administration of justice is quite as good as the people will permit, quite as good, if not a little better, than they desire. Some of the so-called adverse guard, among whom, I presume, I may without offense, class the "Weekly," do not work for some changes which they think would be improvements but they do not seem to have convinced the people, the real barriers. As yet that they are desirable. The test whether any of the changes urged would be an improvement is, does the government, upon its fitness. If the people don't want it, it is idle to thrust it upon them. If they really want it, they will have it. I have no patience with President Taft's dictum that the "administration of justice in this country is a disgrace to our civilization." The truth is that the administration of justice is, in part, and a great part, of our civilization, or, if not exactly that, it constitutes one of the vital tests of civilization. How else can we measure the degree of civilization which we, as a community or as a people, have attained, except as we find it characterized by the character of our institutions and in all the forms in which it expresses itself? It is of no moment that you say that the administration of law is far from perfect. Of course it is, and it ought to be. So is everything else. So are the people, far very far from perfect, and all their institutions are far from perfect. In New Jersey, recently, the people by their vote refused to adopt a few measures of reform so-called, and those, too, by no means revolutionary, not even very radical, but they were not prepared for them, and wouldn't have them. Institutions are all the time in the process of improvement, more fully reflect the then attained civilization of the people. This is preeminently true of a free people, at liberty to express itself. To say that any form which that civilization expresses itself is a disgrace to that civilization is sheer nonsense, a mere contradiction of terms. Let us admit that some of the more enlightened of our people would like to see radical changes in constitutions, methods and measures. They are discontented with present methods. Very well. A people discontented is, no doubt, the pathway to heaven. Nevertheless, let them keep in mind the eternal unchangeable things; that every age and people must have its own measures and methods, suited to its own special genius, such as it is, and as it can understand. We are a conglomerate people, constantly at variance, still by means of a predominant type, and of our universal system of common education, we are slowly becoming more or less of a homogeneous race. It is indeed a question whether our capacity to assimilate has not been tested to the uttermost and whether a halt should not be called. This has to do, however, chiefly with lowering the standard of our people, and is reflected as it is in our institutions and methods. I welcome the "Weekly" as an instrumentality in the work of education. It does something more than merely reflect existing public sentiment. It is probably an advance agent of the civilization of the future. But let it not be too anxious about immediate changes in methods and forms. These will come as soon and as fast as the people are prepared for them. But rather, "whatever things are true, whatever things are honest, whatever things are just"—to these things, let it continue chiefly to direct its attention, and as a result of its labors, our readers I shall consider myself a thousand times repaid.

Very truly,

GEO. F. CHURCH.

Pismo, Cal., Nov. 16, 1909.

At the risk of overstepping the bounds of the proprieties we give space to the above letter from Superior Judge Church without his specific assent, though he said nothing to the contrary. In our judgment the conservative element has a right to a voice and The California Weekly will as heartily welcome contributions from that quarter as from any other. The trouble with conservatism is that it generally sulks and says nothing, but votes "no" in bitterness and demagoguery. If it would let its mind it would feel better and the public judgment would be better advised.

However, The California Weekly does not believe that the administration of justice in this country is as good as the people will permit or desire, or that the executive department of government, or the legislative, is as good. The people would stand a great deal better government in all its departments than they are getting. The government the people get is not as good as they will stand, but as good as they will have. That is the test.

The administration of justice is just as bad as the people will stand without deposing the judges they have and elevating Judge Lynch. The bar is as bad as it can be without discrediting every man who belongs to it. Our legislatures and congresses are as regardless of the popular welfare as they dare be with any hope of being retained in office by congress or legislature, all because of the malign influence of an incorporated plutocracy that has no purpose other than gain, no fear of anything except disorder and that revolutionary spirit that would make themselves and their riches unsafe, and they are servile regardless even as to that. The people get what they will have or know the reason why and not one benefit more.

My dear Mr. Pillsbury:

I have received the copy of The California Weekly you kindly sent me. I heard something about your having started a paper, but this is the first copy I have seen. I congratulate you on the paper and what it stands for. I am glad you have had the courage to do it and I trust that you may be able to swing it. Long may it shine and shine brightly! I have read the paper through and I am delighted with your positions, think I rather beat you in getting to some of these positions, but I won't crow. All I am afraid of is that there are not enough people in California who will take the trouble to stand behind you in the long fight which lies ahead. The trouble with the majority in California is that it is a disunion thing, any leader they now are. That's a pretty wide-spread trouble, to be sure, but I really believe it is worse in California than in any other place, and they are fighting it with the Remnant—Mathew Arnold's Remnant, I mean—and the Remnant is often painfully indifferent to holding on the hand of those who are fighting it with it.

I have just read of your defeat on Tuesday, which is deplorable. However there is one comfort: it is absolutely sure that the people of San Francisco get what they have subscribed for. The old boys who used to talk about hell so much had things a little out of perspective, as we now see, but after all they were on the right track. What they meant was that every man was sure to get what he wanted to him. And they were right. San Francisco will get a right good bunch of the article for the solid reason that she deserves it. That is what she has just spoken for.

I herely join the Remnant by enclosing a money order for two dollars. Long live The California Weekly!

Yours,

S. D. AYERS.

Walla Walla, Wash., Nov. 3, 1909.

704 University Street.

That is how it looks to an outsider who, however, was once an insider and still has an interest in California and its affairs. Nevertheless, we protest that what happens in California is not the will of the majority, but only the will of the majority that has the power enough in it, and either good or bad conscience enough, to get out and vote. If the political non-combatants can either be "breeze-shaken and hair-hung over Hades" until they get a first-class care on, or can be shamed or punished into voicing their sentiments it will be found that the dear old ladies of the male persuasion will vote right and for the reason that they weakly and inconsequently wish that Right Things might triumph. Compulsory voting may help. It won't hurt to try it on.

Editors The California Weekly:

By all means continue your School for Citizenship. And the lessons highly instructive, and they may be the means of inspiring some young reader to devote his time to the thorough study of the matter and become a energetic worker for the people. Having the good laws enforced and the bad ones repealed. You could not put a page to better use. I am in thorough accord with the policy of your paper. Every body who reads it will be benefited.

Respectfully,

F. C. JOHNSON.

San Francisco, Nov. 4, 1909.

Perhaps. This is encouraging anyhow, but will someone who has observed carefully tell us at what age youths who do become interested in public affairs become interested? And about where are they in their school work?

Editor The California Weekly.

San Francisco, Cal.

My Dear Sir:—Congratulations on the brighter appearance of the first page of "our paper." That is by all odds the most "speaking" type there is. It may be only a personal fancy, yet I believe that a half measure of words in this larger, clearer type, will speak up, will get more attention and have the weight of a full measure of words in the smaller type.

Also let me enclose the opinion of Mr. Clarence Reed of Palo Alto regarding the "School for Citizenship" page. I find it dry reading but had laid it to a mental review. I have my own part. It lacks a little of going still further in my criticism I will say that is the one defect in the whole paper. It reminds me of a six-kind, were individual sitting up on a high price

By THE WATCHMAN.

Gov. Gillett Banker James N. Gillett is no fool On Full Stomachs and no bull raging in a crockery shop. Without being a suffragist, he has returned from women the best time to handle men. It is when they are gorged. At such a time an insurgent Republican might be minded to greet old Joe Cannon, or Senator Aldrich, with a cheer. It was upon such an occasion that the late E. H. Harriman launched the Gillett candidacy for governor of California back at Washington and commissioned one W. F. Herrin to see the enterprise through, which he did. That dinner was not ostensibly called for any purpose, but before they got away every member of the California delegation was, if not committed to it, at least extorted from opposing that candidacy. Gillett knew the psychological moment to launch his canoe. He may have learned it from Harriman instead of from his own wife, but he knows the power in the banquet and how to turn it to account. Thus endeth the first lesson.

How the Union League The Union League Was Utilized by Gillett Club is an organization of Republicans without distinction with regard to their being "reformers" or "performers." This organization has leased, and moved into, a permanent home on O'Farrell street in San Francisco. What more appropriate than that the event should be signaled by a banquet to which the entire membership should be invited, and what more in keeping with the eternal fitness of things than that the Republican governor of a Republican state should be invited to attend and be given a seat at the table of honor? Such a banquet for such a purpose was given on Saturday night of last week, and Governor James N. Gillett graced the occasion with his presence. Michael Henri De Young is president of the league. It was his function to introduce the speakers and the first speaker was, of course, the governor of the state. Michael Henri is a "performer." In every crucial situation he can be relied on to come to the aid of the "organization." This was a pivotal opportunity and when the members present were now filled with delectables and were merry with wine he, said Michael Henri, apologist and retainer of the higher-ups, sprung the candidacy of Gillett to succeed himself as governor of California. Gillett himself, he "lay low and say nothing," in particular, but Tom Dozier, to use his own expression, "not nasty nice" as to how he "does politics," was called immediately after Gillett. This was a great opportunity for a man with a ringing voice, an alert mind and an eagerness to serve the "organization." Of course he joined with De Young in making of an occasion that was intended to be a dedication of the Union League Club, rooms a launching of a second term for governor for James N. Gillett. It was as adroit a performance as cunning could have devised and no men less brazen than De Young and Tom Dozier could have had the courage to check the thing through. Of course other speakers could not, without being discourteous, avoid saying some kindly thing of the governor. It was a well-planned and well-executed rather surly job. Thus endeth the second lesson.

Would Be Less Dangerous James N. Gillett If He Were a Worse Man

not a bad man. Taken afoot and alone he is a good, clean, kindly, forceful, clear-headed man who would a thousand times rather do a good deed than a bad one. He has neither made the best governor of California ever had nor the worst. He has made good appointments and bad. What governor has not? But what kind of man he is and what sort of governor he has made is not the question. Before he left Eureka to come to Sacramento to be governor he declared that his every appointment would be made to strengthen the "organization" element in his party. Every child knows that the term "organization" so employed means the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau, and Gillett has kept that promise to the letter. During his first two years of administration his every appointment was made practically at the dictation of the Herrin machine and its paid manipulators, Parker, Burke and Hatton. If he has seemingly been more independent since then it was because he had redeemed every pre-nomination pledge and had earned a brief opportunity to play governor on his own hook. And even then the independence may be more seeming than real. For we are not at liberty to forget that during the 32d and 33d sessions of the legislature he made, in the senate, such a reputation for freedom from corporation control that he was able to win his way to congress on the strength of it, and yet brought that reputation, all unsullied, to the feet of Harriman and there exchanged it for corporation backing for his gubernatorial aspirations. From the Santa Cruz convention on Saturday night of last week, when the Union League Club was razzle-dazzled into a seeming endorsement of his candidacy, there has not been a day nor an hour in which James N. Gillett has been anything less than a willing worker in the interests of a corporation domination of the political affairs of California. In the person of the late Angel Gabriel, instead of the late E. H. Harriman, (and the never-late William F. Herrin,) there is no reason why his candidacy should appeal to any free Republican in all California. He is a tool of corporate government and an enemy to the state, and if he were a paragon of personal virtues they should not save him from condemnation. It is not enough that government shall be good. It must also be of the people and by the people as well as for the people, and these it must be whether good or not. He would be less dangerous if he were a worse man.

Mrs. Gillett In an interview Governor Or Mr. Herrin? Gillett has said that he will let Mrs. Gillett say whether or not he shall run again for governor. This does not imply that Mr. Herrin may not have the last say, but it has been leaking out that Mrs. Gillett would a good deal rather be the wife of a United States Senator than of the governor. Howbeit that can't be until there is a vacancy in the north end of the state and the good lady may decide that a bird in sight is better than one out of sight and hearing. Then, too, Mrs. Gillett is known not to like Sacramento very well. The social reception accorded the new governor three years ago still produces a chilly feeling. Washington suits her better. It is expected that Mrs. Gillett will make up her mind with the incoming of the new year. Mr. Herrin's name will be made up in time to put the word down the line through all the redlight districts and cheap boarding house centers of the state, through the gin mills and to McCarthy's handy men so that the mobilized infamies may pluck for his cash, never he may be, Gillett or Curry. Neither of these men will know for sure until the votes are counted. For it is understood that the offensive and defensive compact entered into between the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau and the McCarthy labor forces for the San Francisco campaign is to hold good through the state campaign.

Gov. Gillett's Strength The governor stands Not to Be Underrated in better plight before the people today than he stood two years ago. He has earned something of this better public estimation and if it came to him it goes to him. As his good luck would have it the last legislature made a better reputation on the whole than any preceding one for a number of years, notwithstanding its fall-down at the end. He has been industrious in the dispatch of public business and has not procrastinated in making appointments, perhaps for the reason that many of his appointments were made when he wasn't looking. He signed the anti-race track and the direct primary bills when they got to him, but, as will be remembered, he refused to lift a finger on behalf of either until they got to him. Finally, word has been allowed to filter out to the effect that he is no longer persona grata with the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau. That report is a little belated. It was expected half a year earlier, for, be it remembered, neither the head nor the tailenders of that bureau will hesitate to capitalize the detestation in which the public holds them that the product may be used to further their aims. It need astonish no one if the wildest-eyed opponent of Herrinism and apostle of reform should prove to be in the pay of that bureau. Let no man be deceived by a little plausible and superficial evidence. James N. Gillett has done nothing to make himself unavailable as a Southern Pacific candidate for governor. That den of statecraft wants a plausible quality of candidate and Gillett made the people believe that he was "no man's man" once and he may do it again if the people don't watch out.

The Trend of the Call There is gnashing of Plainly Foreshadowed teeth, if not wailing, in the office of the San Francisco Call. Ernest S. Simpson, the editor, is a clean man who would like to stand for Right Things and stand hard, but his associates are not of tempered steel and the ownership of the paper is injurious. The Call has been falling from grace. At first its feet slipped, then it slid and finally it gathered momentum and did the toboggan act. Sunday morning it got there with both feet—in the middle of the Gillett camp. Its political misfortunes have been confided to one George Van Smith, imported from Minnesota to make the Call's campaign for a direct primary law of some sort for the glory of the Call. Before coming to California Van Smith served the political ends of James J. Hill, the personification of the "system" idea in politics, with the same enthusiasm that he served the cause of justice in San Francisco up to the programming of the late city election. He can accommodate his principles to the exigencies of his employment as readily as a tramp can accommodate his appetite to what is in the hand-out shoved at him through a crack in the door. In the interests of a primary election law he made injurious compromises with the Herrin crowd in two legislatures. A part of the consideration must have been the support by the Call of the candidacy of Gillett to succeed himself as governor, and also the championing of Gillett's eighteen million dollar good name. The Call has given Gillett credit for the manifestation of a political independence that he has never manifested and it played a star part in the De Young-Dozier curtain-raiser for Gillett at the expense of the Union League Club. The Call will have to be born again, and more legitimately, before it will be received back into good society.

Is the Sun About to Shine Word has On the California Democracy? been passed around that the San Francisco Morning Sun is to be launched with the new year. It is reported also that it is to be a Democratic party organ. That sounds like Caminetti. He is a hawk from the tombs and is still discussing squatter sovereignty and orating about the "sovereign states of this confederacy." San Francisco needs a morning paper that the people can tie to. It was once a paper that is controlled neither by the longest leashed liar, a moral idiot nor millions dominated by intellectual stupidity, but San Francisco will show scant courtesy to a party hawk. The era of the party hawk has passed. The Democrats will not support a paper because it is Democratic. Republiicans will not support a paper because it is Republican. Both would join in supporting any paper that would tell the truth, be decent and get the news. What the Democratic party wants is not papers but leaders, men of convictions and ability to stand for them. If we want free government we must have free parties and free papers. There are now no issues between Democrats and Republicans as such, but there are issues without number between those who would control government in the interests of an incorporated plutocracy and those who would re-establish equality of opportunity, equality before the law and the square deal. If the Democratic party can beat the Republican party to that goal it will win, but that race cannot be won on a party hack.

The Fight for Right Is a Fight for Party Control. In state and national affairs the fight for right is a fight for party control. Progressive Republicans see this and are making a hard fight to get hold of the machinery of their party and progressive Democrats should make the same kind of fight in their own organization. This will keep them all busy without wasting time and effort on political side shows. The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League made that fight two years ago and nearly succeeded in winning it. They will shortly be up and at 'em again. This time the direct primary law gives them a better chance of winning. As the Republican party is the dominant party in this state the success of this movement becomes tremendously important to the state. Let the Democrats do likewise and free government will be re-established in California where free government has not existed for more than a quarter of a century. The Southern Pacific's political bureau has held control of the machinery of both parties and Mr. Herrin cares not who does the recruiting so long as he is free to select the officers. A multiplicity of political organizations is not going to help this work. The best interests of the state require a good, strong Republican, and a good, strong Democratic, party. The weakness of the Democratic party in California is a public calamity. It ought to get into fighting trim or get itself buried even if it has to stand the undertaker off for funeral expenses. It ought to be a free party as well as an alive one. Who is doing anything about that?

Perhaps It Is Needed The Good Government League in San Francisco has served a good purpose. Every considerable municipality in California should have a Good Government League. The Good Government League in San Francisco chiefly consisted of Isidor Jacobs, and every considerable municipality in California should have an Isidor Jacobs. Then there would be something doing everywhere every minute. No one but an Isidor Jacobs can think of so many different things that ought to be done as an Isidor Jacobs and no one not an Isidor Jacobs can go about doing them all at the same time with such an unbounded enthusiasm. As The Watchman understands it a purpose has been formed to organize an Isidor Jacobs—no, a Good Government League—in every considerable municipality in the state and then federate them all together into one indissoluble, indestructible phalanx to act in the capacity of "candlestick" with which to steady the political teeterboard so that neither the Republican nor the Democratic end shall hog the whole plank. Perhaps it is needed and perhaps it is not.

Parties for States It will be a sad day when Leagues for Cities political reformers go in for a go-as-you-please, catch-as-catch-can method of selecting public officials in state and nation. Unless state and nation are governed by political parties they will be governed by political factions and that is the next thing to political anarchy. The majority should rule and, that it may rule, there should be only two political parties. Any other plan leads to minority rule by virtue of temporary coalitions of discordant factions with trouble for the administration never out of sight or hearing. The balance of power in such case will be held by the discriminating, self-centered individual who will go with his party when it goes right, or near it, but go against it when it stands for what the independent voter believes to be wrong measures or wrong men. Independent voters, voters who hold country above party and right above office, need no organization. All they need is information. Given information upon which they can act with reliance they will act right without being told as certainly as they will eat and sleep without being urged

Hichborn's History

So many applications have come to The California Weekly for copies of Franklin Hichborn's

"STORY OF THE CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE OF 1909."

that we have arranged to take orders for this valuable book and fill them directly from our office, either in person or by mail.

The regular trade edition is $1.25, post paid.

Mr. Hichborn's book should be in the hands of every person who desires to gain an interior view of the government of California AS IT IS, and the function of legislation AS IT IS PERFORMED session after session under our very eyes.

Having resided at the state capital and attended upon legislative sessions for a number of years, Mr. Hichborn has had unusual opportunities for getting close up to the true inwardness of things legislative and he deals with his subject in entire frankness.

No better volume could be put into the hands of a young man preparing himself for citizenship and for doing his part in making political conditions better than they are.

THE UNIVERSITY FARM AT DAVIS

PRACTICAL DEMONSTRATIONS OF FARM PRACTICE.

By LEROY ANDERSON.

The University Farm is an area of nearly eight hundred acres of land purchased for the University of California by a special act of the legislature of 1905. It is situated at Davis, in Yolo county, is of alluvial formation and capable of the highest degree of productivity. When purchased in 1906 all but a few acres were one big grain field and the work of development into a wholly useful college farm is therefore a big problem entailing large expenditures of money and a long period of time.

Farm a Field Laboratory.

This farm has already come to be something more than land and crops. It comprises buildings and equipment for instruction and most important of all men who are filled with an ardent desire to carry out the purposes of the institution. In a material way there are buildings, either standing or under construction, with laboratories for instruction in dairying, livestock business, fruit growing, cereal production, soil study, irrigation, and living accommodations for students and the working force of the farm proper. The men are a part of the faculty of the College of Agriculture which is much increased in number through larger appropriations made directly to the support of the farm and its varied enterprises. For, in the first and last analysis, this farm is a part and parcel of the College of Agriculture, a field laboratory, as it were, in which and on which may be worked out and taught the increasingly vital questions of rural progress which the college is called upon to aid in solving. This college is not new. It has been in our midst for more than a generation, but this farm part of it is new, thanks to generous appropriations from the last three legislatures, and I believe the people and third, that which deals with agriculture as an industry and farmers as a class of people." These three lines, taken together, make up the training of the well-educated farmer. Let us look into them for a moment.

Problem of Soil Fertility.

We are looking for increased production from our soil. We admit that most of California agriculture has consisted of a mining of the soil, not of farming the soil. We have taken out the easily worked gold—the "high crops of better products at less cost, and still maintain soil fertility, and the solution of the problem is a matter of education.

Farm Administration.

But the farmer is not only a producer, he is also a seller. He has capital invested and is a manager of an industry. The capital invested in agriculture is four-fifths of the capital invested in manufacturing and railway transportation combined. He is of necessity a business man and must handle his enterprise in a business way. He must be possessed of good sense, good judgment, and ability to handle men. These are qualifications that may be difficult to teach a man, but he can study the principles that govern the business of agriculture and thereby improve upon his natural inheritance. The progress of the farmer is retarded and his education incomplete unless he includes the farm administration as one of the essential subjects for study.

The individual farmer may succeed financially if he is thoroughly conversant with the principles of production and farm management. But the farmer of to-day cannot live unto himself alone and give agriculture the full success it deserves. He must have the larger view which arises from a consideration of the farmers as a class and which tends toward the realization of the social position which he and his neighbor farmers ought to occupy. Agriculture is an industry among other industries and is subject to economic laws. Besides growing and selling it involves a study of markets, transportation, taxation, tariff and similar questions common to other industries, and means co-operation for protection and progress. Again, farmers are, or ought to be, social beings. They will grade"—and have left the tougher base which requires the stamp mill and the cyanide process to yield an income. In other words we have depleted the soil of its fertility and have called upon the agricultural experiment station and the scientist to analyze and experiment with our soil to tell us what we must do to restore the virgin productivity. Scientists began a half century ago to study ple will not be disappointed in the enlarged usefulness the college will be to them by means of the farm. We might properly, then, substitute in our title the words "College of Agriculture" for "University Farm."

Rural progress, like progress in every other field of human activity, is a matter of education, both technical and general. As we learn more of the principles and practices of our varied enterprises and fill our minds with proper knowledge we move forward. President Butterfield, of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, says that the education of the farmer is along three lines, "first, that which deals with the growth of products; second, that which deals with the selling of products; these things, but it is not much more than a decade since the farmers began to really listen to them or to go to them for help. The farmer who has listened and studied is to-day the more progressive man, he is growing more and better products than he who has not listened. To avail himself of the scientist's discoveries, the farmer must know their meaning and how to apply them to his special need. By this means he is educated and this is agricultural education. This education gives a partial mastery of the principles that govern proper soil management and plant and animal growth. Because the farmer is dealing with natural laws, he must know their application to farm practice. The first demand of modern agriculture is how to grow larger then consider the social life of the community, its school facilities, its clubs, its privileges, its clubs, organizations or any means to bring the rural community together for common weal and welfare. This is the human side of agricultural education and therefore all important.

This all around training of the farmers—the three-fold training as it were—is what the College of Agriculture is striving for and what the University Farm is established to foster and push forward. The research work of the college has long been recognized as helpful in increased productivity of the soil. Our investigations in soils, cereals, plant production, plant diseases, and the like are of acknowledged financial benefit to the growers of farm products. We have undertaken the problem of farm management and students of the college may have an introductory knowledge at least of farm administration. The farmers' institutes have done much toward developing the social side of farm life, while at the same time giving technical knowledge of recognized value. California is fully up to her eastern sister states in farmers' organizations with the grange, many farmers' clubs and the various organizations for marketing fruit, vegetables, poultry products and the like. However, there are only at the beginning of what we shall ultimately accomplish in these three lines.

Many Students.

I will be pardoned if I note somewhat in detail what is doing at the University Farm, for it is the center of quite as varied an activity in behalf of rural progress as the college proper at Berkeley. It is less than a year since we opened our doors to receive regular students in agriculture and now there are about forty young men studying in the three years' course. They are admitted when they are at least fifteen years of age and have finished the eighth grade of the public schools. Some statistics of these forty are interesting. One-half have had some high school training—from less than a year to graduation from high school. Their ages range from fifteen to twenty-four and the average is eighteen. They are a sturdy lot of fellows with a purpose in view and a keen desire to know agriculture in all its phases.

In general they are studying the principles and sciences which underlie agriculture, with enough of the practice to fix the principles firmly in mind. In particular, the chief subjects are soil fertility and farm crops, botany, plant propagation, entomology, chemistry, animal and dairy industry, poultry husbandry, horticulture, viticulture, irrigation, farm practice and farm mechanics, farm accounts, English, mathematics, civics and United States history. The subjects sound like those of college. They are named the same but taught in a more elementary manner, easily within reach and calculated to arouse the interest of the boy in rural activities. The total cost per student, including board, lodging, fees and books, is about $225 for the year of eight months.

Farmers' Short Courses.

On October fourth the second series of farmers' short courses opened at the farm. The first, dairy manufacture, is a course especially designed for those who wish to become better trained in operation of creameries and cheese factories, or to acquire a better understanding of the principles involved in handling milk and milk products. This course continues for eight weeks. On the seventh three more short courses began, each to be two weeks in length. One in irrigation, field crops and soil fertility, which gives practice in handling instruments for leveling, laying out ditches and land for irrigation and measuring water, teaches the principles and methods of growing grain and sugar beets and fertilizing the soil. Another is for the dairy farmer who sells milk or cream. He is taught the most improved methods of handling his milk and separating and handling cream. The farm has one of the best dairy barns and best equipped creameries in the United States and two weeks working with this equipment means much to the dairyman. The third is in poultry husbandry and is of interest to the man or woman who specializes in poultry or other farm products of general farming. The course includes feeding, breeding, care and management, construction of incubators, brooders and houses, scoring and judging and marketing fowls.

Beginning with November fifth are two more short courses, horticulture for two weeks and animal industry for three weeks. The first includes viticulture and entomology and instruction is given by lecture and field and laboratory work. Animal industry covers briefly a study of the different breeds of livestock with each afternoon of practice in scoring and judging animals and study of anatomy and treatment of the more common diseases. All of the courses are the epitome of condensation in order that the busy farmer may learn a large amount in as short a time as possible. The days are full from eight in the morning until five in the afternoon with evenings occupied in the library or more lectures. The courses are free with the exception of a small fee on the basis of one dollar per week. Similar short courses may be expected each year at about the same time.

Farmers' Week.

The desire to have something for everybody has led us to establish an even shorter course than any yet mentioned. We call it Farmers' Week. The name is not original with us for it has been used two or three years in eastern institutions. Ours this year was the last week in October, beginning Monday the twenty-fifth. There are to be from two to five lectures on each leading agricultural topic by members of the college faculty and each day a demonstration in judging some breed of livestock. Afternoons and evenings are to be given to addresses and discussions on topics of live rural interest. Farmers' Week does not take the place of any of the short courses and we hope it will not reduce the attendance upon these courses. On the other hand we are trusting it may prove a means of getting together a large number of farmers who cannot leave home for long and who can help their fellow men by rubbing elbows in a class-room and laboratory for a few days. Farmers from different parts of the state need to know each other better. This is a grand opportunity amid educational surroundings.

Practical Work for College Men.

I have described how the college, through its farm, is touching the boy who is the farmer of the future and the farmer who is now in the harness. We also use the farm to give the four-year college man a taste of the soil and of real farm life and atmosphere. At present the men and women in the four-year agricultural course spend a half year on the farm pursuing chiefly studies in animal and dairy industry, horticulture and plant production. When the new buildings now under way are completed and needed equipment

IF the reader will turn to page 137 of the minutes of the Society for the Promotion and Prosecution of Research in the Domain of the Spiritual and Occult he will find the record of the resolution from which the following excerpt is taken:

"And it is further directed and ordered that the person thus responsible and blameable for the deplorable mishap do write and publish a full and succinct account of it, to the end, first, that the misapprehension concerning the affair which now is on the tongue of a cold and unsympathetic world may be hushed, and, second, that any money which may be received from said publication may be added to the Fund for the Benefit of Broken, Crushed and Maltreated Spirits."

I am "the person thus responsible and blameable," and what follows written in accordance with the terms of the foregoing resolution. Yet, before proceeding farther, I feel that it is due to myself to say that I cannot hold myself entirely blame-worthy, for, in the first place, I really did at the time believe that the work was my own, and, in the second place, I had not the least realization that a spirit could be so easily damaged. Prior to then I never had seen a spirit with a blacked eye and a bloody—But I perceive that I am getting ahead of my simple narrative; so I will take a fresh start and begin at the beginning.

When I began writing that evening I glanced at the clock and noted that the time was twenty-five minutes after seven. When the last line had been written, and, satisfied with my—that is, with the spirit's work—I was ready to retire, the same timepiece indicated 3:50 a. m. I had—I should say, the spirit had—consumed eight hours and twenty-five minutes in our labor, and an ineffably sweet poem, instinct with the mystery of life, was the result. Its soulful quality will best be indicated by quoting the first verse:

"They walk beside us on the way,
Our astral friends who urge us on;
The Elementals in the fray
Cheer us, with faces weird and wan;
They come to us when lights are low
And test conditions they can choose,
And flit and flit, both to and fro,
When they the medium can use."

Probably there are thousands of people who would like to read the remainder of this poem of intangible sweetness, but the editor will pay only prose rates for it in this connection, and so I will save it until a time when it will add more to the Fund for the Benefit of Broken, Crushed and Maltreated Spirits.

I was very proud of what I then considered my own poem, and on the following evening I read it to my friend, Horatio K. Browne, who is, like myself, a thoughtful member of the Society for the Promotion and Prosecution of Research in the Domain of the Spiritual and Occult. After I had concluded, he said:

"Beautiful! It is beautiful! How I wish the spirits would write poems for me, too!"

"Hey! What?" I responded, for I did not fully catch his idea.

"It is so good of them to write these poetical gems for you. I should be so happy if they would write even one for me. And I would not ask them to write an epic, either; some little, simple lay would be sufficient to fill my soul with glad—"

"Do you mean to say that spirits wrote the poem I just read to you?"

"Of course. That is, some spirit wrote it. To be sure, I do not know exactly which spirit it was, and I could not tell you his name, but you may be very certain that an unseen presence wrote the beautiful poem to which you have attached your name. I do not suggest that in doing so you have committed a forgery, but—"

"And you contend that this is not my poem?"

"Certainly I do. There can be no doubt of it."

"And that I did not write it?"

"Then what I want to know is what I really was doing between 7:25 p. m. and 3:50 a. m. last night, when I was scratching my head and biting my pencil and perspiring in what I supposed to be a search for poetical ideas and expressions. What was I doing then?"

WHO STRUCK THE MEDIUM?

ALPHEUS JAMES

"You simply were the medium through whom the beneficent spirit gave a new poem to the waiting world, and the part of the medium frequently is laborious and painful."

I refused to be convinced. I told Horatio K. Browne that to sweat all night in order that some anonymous citizen of the unseen world might have the credit seemed to me unfair; I said it was too tough on the medium. He admitted that it might appear hard to the thoughtless, but held to his position, and suggested that if I would be at the next meeting of the Circle within the Society I might obtain light.

The Circle met on Thursday evening, and I was present. It was a materializing circle, and the mediums were a large man, who owed me ten dollars for borrowed money, and his wife. The lights were turned very low, and, sitting in darkness, an eerie feeling crept upon me. Pale blue sparks flitted to and fro, soft, tinkling music filled the room; a vague rustling was heard, and gentle hands caressed us who sat there. Dear departed friends came, and some of those about me wept in the happiness of this reunion.

It was a solemn, an impressive, an almost sacred hour. To think that we were sitting there and conversing with gentlemen and ladies who had been advertised as dead for some time was so awful a thought that it nearly overcame me. But, after a time, a sense of disquietude crept upon me, for I could not fail to notice that I alone, of all present, had not been visited by one of the departed. Was it possible that I was not on the spirits' calling list? This question was disconcerting me more and more, when the male medium spoke, and in his voice there was an indefinable shudder.

"A mighty, a potent, a master spirit is here," he said; then, after a moment's pause: "He will speak with him before whom his astral lamp shall linger."

A pale blue spark descended from the ceiling, wandered about for a time like some miniature and elusive will-o'-the-wisp, and finally paused in front of me. Gradually, from out of the darkness, a form dimly took semblance of the human; then a sepulchral voice was heard.

"Child, man," it said; "I am he who wrote the lyric beginning, 'They walk beside us on the way.'"

My words were spoken impulsively, because I still felt that I had more or less to do with writing the lyric. In passionless tones the spirit responded:

"You think that you wrote it, yet you were but the plastic medium through which my poetical soul spoke. I am William Shakespeare."

I felt flattered, as I think that anybody must. I had realized that the verses were good; in fact, I had considered them very good, but to think that Shakespeare would claim them as his own! Oh, it was wonderful! Who now would deny that I possessed genius? But with the pride came also a sense of grievance and injury. I determined that not even the peerless Shakespeare would deprive me of the result of my labor.

"I feel honored," I said, "by your evident desire to add my laurels to your own, but the verses are mine; I wrote them."

"Nay, child of man, struggle not against the omnipotent truth. Verily I wrote the lyric."

Never can I sufficiently regret the immediately subsequent events. Naturally I am impatient, and my temper is not readily controlled. Before I realized what I was doing my arm had been drawn back, and I had struck out for where the face of Shakespeare was dimly visible through the darkness.

The processes of thought and electric in their swiftness. Before my doubled fist reached its destination I had time to realize my folly. "Here you go again!" I said to myself, "exhibiting yourself as a hopeless imbecile, trying to fight an intangible nothing through which your arm will pass as if it were the phantasm that it really is." But it was too late to check the blow; it landed, and Shakespeare dropped. Me miserable! I had laid out the great bard.

A scene of indescribable confusion followed, and when the lights were turned up the male medium was discovered lying on the floor, with one eye closed and his nose slowly dripping gore. I was astounded. Who had struck the medium? The answer to this question seemed to be beyond my ken.

Finally, after the medium had been raised to his feet, amidst the muttered imprecations and lamentations of masculine and feminine true-believers; after a raw beefsteak had been applied to his eye and his nose had been tenderly bathed, I took one of the faithful to one side, and sought for light on the problem that perplexed me.

"Who struck the medium?" I anxiously inquired.

"Why, you did, and you ought to be ashamed of yourself."

No, I didn't; I give you my word that I didn't. I struck William Shakespeare. Of course I know that I should not have done it, but I was nervous and exasperated. Don't you suppose it was Shakespeare that struck the medium?

After several people had explained the matter to me all was very clear, and I condemned myself for not sooner understanding the situation. It appears, as anyone should know, that, in materializing, the disembodied spirit uses the matter contained in the form of the medium. I indeed struck Mr. Shakespeare, but the blow affected the medium's matter; in fact, his matter carried a black eye for several days. This is what was the matter with the medium.

So far as the medium was concerned, the misadventure was happily adjusted, he forgiving me on condition that I would forgive him the ten dollars he owed me. But I greatly fear that William Shakespeare and myself are hopelessly estranged, as the medium informs me that the immortal bard feels that my offense cannot be condoned. The information is in line with deep reason, for I had ventured to hope that we might become quite intimate, not to say friendly.

This really is all there is to the story, and it would have been unnecessary to have written it had not a rumor of the affair reached the outside world, only to be mangled and grossly misrepresented on the wagging tongues of men. I hope that the publication of this truthful account, together with my admission that the credit for the poem does not belong to me, may add no inconsiderable amount to the Fund for the Benefit of Broken, Crushed and Maltreated Spirits, although the distinction between the spirit and the medium, in such a case, still is not entirely clear to me.

In conclusion, it must be unnecessary for me to repeat that I always shall deeply regret the acquaintance with the great of all bards was thus unfortunately nipped in the bud.

The election of L. C. Hull, a Rhodes scholar in Oxford, to the place of president of the Oxford University Athletic Club marks a signal honor to an American student in the British university. It is probably the first time that any American has headed a varsity athletic team at Oxford.

and preaching an irreproachable philosophy about things in general. Another fancy of my own, possibly. The great leaders of the California Weekly are monthly periodicals. The California Weekly is a monthly paper for leadership. But it seems to want focus. It seems to lack concentration of purpose.

(One other point: Why not make The California Weekly a popular stock company with shares, say at $20 each? Its stockholders could help build the paper and thus come into closer touch with its aims and purposes.)

Sincerely yours,

RAY P. BRUBAKER.

Shandon, Cal., Nov. 2, 1909.

The foregoing was read with mingled feelings. If the writer of the School for Citizenship had thought himself sitting in a high place and talking down the foregoing would certainly have brought him to his level. The idea of making The California Weekly company a popular stock company, with shares at $5.00, is good, only we have already done better by making the shares at $20.00. Every subscriber is a shareholder with the difference that he escapes liability for bad management. We want 10,000 just such stockholders before the first of January. Will everybody please tell everybody else of this rare opportunity?

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir: In partial answer to your questions on page 760, I wish to say that I approve of your School for Citizenship, and wish it continued. I read it weekly, but have such doubts of its accuracy that I do not commend it to my children. Its writer's intent is unquestionable. If, before publication, it was submitted to legal criticism, it might be bettered.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM CROSBY.

Mullfones, Livermore P. O., Cal., Nov. 10, 1909.

The writer of the School for Citizenship has had a legal education, and somewhere among his traps is a certificate of admission to the bar of the supreme court of one of the states in this union. All those articles were submitted to one lawyer before publication some gain in accuracy might be made, but if they were submitted to two lawyers they would have to go to a judge for final decision and heaven knows when a decision could be reached. It is short in mind that California has fifty-four times as many judges in proportion to population as England and the more judges the longer it takes to decide cases. If our correspondent allows his children access to only those sources of knowledge for whose accuracy he can vouch they must be confined to a strictly mathematical intellectual diet.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir: I want to thank you for the splendid paper you are making; there is nothing that strikes so high and strong a note for civic righteousness; and then the sanity of your utterances is a constant delight to me. I never take it up but I say to myself, "what a shame that wisdom lifts up its voice in the streets and no man regards it with a loss to our citizenry that they do not know that a prophet is crying in the wilderness."

Never mind, it took a Bull Run to prepare the way for Appomattox—the triumph at the polls last week of the appointed villainies—the Herod of Union Labor and the Pilate of the United Alliance—has not been so cruelly the Lord, will I believe, when we see what it takes for the popular heart which is, after all, sound at the core.

I thank you for the nomination of Henry for governor. He has a right to it. He has a right to sweep the state if he were nominated and the election were held to-morrow. He stands for and embodies the people's ideals. I think he is the best man for the job.

Again I thank you for the course of the Weekly. It gets better and better. It is no muckraker, running amuck and discounting itself Alliance and muckless criticism. Long may the Weekly wave!

Yours truly,

ALBERT R. DILLE.

San Francisco, Nov. 12, 1909.

The foregoing would put courage into a mugwump and we value it particularly because of the personality and vigor of the man whose name is attached. He is of a type of manhood that made the Great West what it is, the heart of the Great Republic. But we get lots of encouragement for The California Weekly. What we want our good friends particularly to do is to pass the good word along as far and as fast as possible, that we may get subscriptions and advertising as well as praise and appreciation. In the long run it is business that counts. Therefore let every friend to The California Weekly tell every friend he meets what Dr. Dille says of The California Weekly, adding the gentle hint that he ought also to subscribe for it.

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded.)

to do so. They will gain the advice and information they require from the papers in which they believe and from individual men in whom they have confidence, not from leagues whose moving spirits they do not know. Good Government Leagues can exercise influence only at short range. Beyond arm's length the issue must be left to political parties and independent voters.

Will It Be a Partisan Party politics in municipal affairs has had its day and is done for.

Its only purpose now is to enable political fixers, in the control of predominating interests, to hold some forces in leash while unruly actors are being corralled. Voters with intelligence little heed the party call to arms. This affords a fine field for thoroughly representative good government leagues to perform a useful service in municipalities, but only in one way—by recommending to the people what the people themselves know to be the wisest course, the bestest course, to pursue in any given emergency. A mistake in judgment is as certainly fatal to the influence of a good government league as a suspicion of dishonesty. It is only as such a league can commend exactly the right thing that it can commend anything with any hope of its being accepted. The independent voter is just as intelligent and as discriminating as the moving spirits in a good government league. If the Good Government League in San Francisco accomplished less in the late election than was hoped for, in the light of the good it did in the election of two years ago, it was because many had come to distrust its good judgment rather than its good intentions. But suppose the non-partisan element were organized into a compact body enduring from election to election, and covering the state as well as all the cities in the state, how long before it would be as partisan as the partisan parties?

Superintendent Randall It has been kept very quiet at Preston School

W. T. Randall has been dropped from the superintendency of Preston State School at Lone, and President Dutton, of the board of trustees, is expected to take his place. It is not anticipated that Dutton will keep the place permanently, but only until the political bureau that runs the state can fix on the man. Rumor has it that Randall wallowed some boy unmercifully and was degraded upon resigning without having been fired. The Watchman does not know the facts but he does know Randall and he will wager something to nothing that the boy deserved all he got. There are at that school, besides a lot of boys who have not had a fair chance, as bad a lot of criminals as may be found either at San Quentin or Folsom, and without that saving grace of common sense that age imparts even to criminality. The most dangerous period of a criminal's life is between seventeen and twenty-two years, the period of the "lone," especially characteristic of the lone commitment. If Mr. Randall were to handle some one of these fellows man-fashion, and did it up brown, he is not to be blamed for it, whatever a mawkish public sentiment may have to say. William T. Randall is not without his limitations, but he has fewer of them than Dutton, and fewer than any other superintendent that Preston State School has ever had, and the public has a right to know the whys and wherefores of his being forced out of that institution. It is not the excuse that is important. It is the real reason why.

"While the Letter does not agree with it in every particular, still it is wished every man in California capable of reading and digesting what he reads would take The California Weekly and form the habit of scanning its pages carefully. And every man who does. Taken by and large, it is by far the most wholesome and uplifting publication printed on the Pacific Coast, or elsewhere. Nothing of which the Letter has a knowledge approaches it—and that knowledge is pretty complete."—Saul's Letter.

SHORT TALKS ON DOMESTIC SCIENCE

By Mary Robinson Thomas.

Mr. William Watson, when ill in London, and attempting a dinner for which he had no appetite, scribbled these lines on a scrap of paper, which he threw to his attendant:

"Strange sauce that's mingled with the meat,
Strange meat that's mingled with the sauce
—in vain;

I eat, and wondering what and why I eat,
Long for the porridge of my youth again."

Apologies of the foregoing gastronomic stanza, diet, dietetics and the dietitian will be discussed.

Medical and domestic science should go hand in hand. While the latter is slower in its results, it is quite as important and effectual and more permanent in its cure. The cure of nearly all diseases is hastened by a restricted or special diet, and there are several diseases which can be cured only by diet.

Lack or misuse of nourishment is the most frequent cause of disease. A pampered appetite takes to itself only that which tastes good, regardless of food values, and it is as unreasonable to hope that a sound human body can be built upon such diet as that a substantial house can be built of shakes instead of stone or brick. Good material, whether found in a house, land, clothes, or food, makes a perfect whole.

The needs of the normal and abnormal human body demand more scientific research year by year. Let us hope that the time is not far distant when all mothers will know why raw starch, in the shape of an uncooked banana, for instance, is indigestible for young children. The preparation of food is a science as well as an art, the chemistry of which is as precise as the chemistry of the laboratory. When we are willing to be as exact and careful in our work as we are in chemical experiments our success will become a certainty. No other technical art can, with so little practical knowledge, go so far in simplifying that which is otherwise complicated and laborious, or do more towards accomplishing that which is the chief result of all science—adding to the comfort and happiness of the human race. Too much emphasis cannot be laid on the importance of diet from infancy to old age. In dietetic requirements infancy is vastly different from adolescence, adolescence from middle life and middle life from old age. Variety is the key note of proper feeding at all times. Not that each meal should provide the variety, but the day, the week. While our markets are liberal providers we must repeat a dish too often if a great variety is placed before us at one meal. Housekeepers, whether in public institutions or private homes, are just beginning to realize the necessity of different diets for different ages or occupations of different individuals. In an institution the portion given the book-keeper would be better fitted to nourish a gardener and often the physician and patient are given the same diet, and in the home the young child is allowed the school girl's diet and so on ad libitum.

Undoubtedly the meaning of the word diet is not known as it is rarely used correctly. The dictionary tells us "diet is a course of living or nourishment, habitual food, etc.," but in common use it is applied only in connection with disease!

A good authority tells us that "invalid cooking should form the basis of all 'trained' education." Nursing, after all, is largely housekeeping for the sick, and depends primarily upon such thorough knowledge of housekeeping for the well as can be obtained only from both instruction and long practice.

PERSONALIA

A pronounced success has been scored in the well-known municipal opera at Trier, South Germany, by the Boston tenor, Gardner Lamson.

Senator Gore, although blind, has been present at a number of airplane flights. He says that he cannot "watch" them as well as he can a ball game.

Sir Oliver Lodge's long expected book on psychical research, "The Survival of Man," will be ready, on this side of the Atlantic, at the end of the month.

The Rev. Sarah A. Dixon, Ph. D., has been made pastor of the Congregational Church at Tewksbury, Mass. Miss Dixon is a graduate of the Boston University. She formerly held a pastorate at Tyngsboro, Mass.

Mrs. Nellie Showman has been licensed to preach in the Church of the United Brethren. She passed the examination for the ministry at the recent conference of the denomination held in Altoona, Pa., and a short time later received her license.

George F. Durant, general manager of the Bell Telephone company of Missouri, who died the other day, was the pioneer in its introduction in St. Louis and beyond. He helped Professor Bell make the first exhibit of the telephone in St. Louis in 1878.

Mayor McClellan has surprised and greatly pleased the women of New York city by appointing three women as commissioners of the board of education. They are Mrs. Helen Carroll Robbins, a Roman Catholic, Miss Olivia Leventritt, a Jewess, and Mrs. Alice L. Post, an Episcopalian.

The American operatic invasion of Europe is extending. Recently four new American singers, all young women, have been engaged for the operas in Germany and Switzerland, including Miss Alice Sovern, at Posen, Miss Cal Dollmann at Crefeld, Miss Edna Hoff at St. Gall, and Miss May Scheider at Zurich.

Another of the Kaiser's personally supervised dramatic productions, "The German King," a fervidly patriotic melodrama written by the late Poet Laureate of the present reign, Ernest von Wildenbruch, had its first performance on any stage at the Theater Royal, in Berlin, on the night of November 2nd. It failed to win the critics.

King Menelik, of Abyssinia, is a heavy investor in American railroad securities. He styles himself Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Juda, Elect of the Savior, King of Kings of Ethiopia; but he is a progressive monarch, having abolished slavery and introduced European improvements and a constitutional form of government.

The new piece by Moreau with Mme. Bernhardt will shortly produce at her theater, appearing herself in the principal role, is exactly what the title, "Le Procès de Jeanne d'Arc," would indicate. It is almost entirely taken up with the trial of the maid of Orleans, the whole action passing at Rouen, two of the scenes in the castle of Philippe Auguste, one in the cell of the accused, and one in the grand hall of Parliament overlooking the place of execution.

Franz Lehár, composer of "The Merry Widow," produced during last summer no less than three new operettas. The first of these, "The Prince's Child," now being performed at the Johann Strauss Theater, is not evoking anything like the enthusiasm created by "The Merry Widow." The libretto is by Victor Leon, who wrote that of "The Merry Widow." The one entitled "The Gypsy's Child," will be produced shortly at the Vienna Carl Theater; the other, called "The Count of Luxemburg," will be brought out at the Theater an der Wien, the same house at which "The Merry Widow" first made her bow to the Viennese public.

"Bliggins says he believes in telepathy." "Yes. But when he wants to be sure of being understood he reaches for the telephone like the rest of us."—Washington Star.

Noitt: "Jagsby is the most popular after-dinner speaker in the state." Askitt: "Indeed! What is the secret of his popularity?" Noitt: "By the time he is called upon to speak he is speechless."—Chicago News.

An English minister announced from his pulpit that there would be a christening the next Sunday in the church. Then, as an afterthought, "Remember, Mrs. Tomlinson, I said 10.30. You were late a year ago."—Springfield Republican.

Two men had finished their dinner in a Springfield cafe when one of them ordered the waiter to bring a couple of cigars. "Don't order more than one," put in the other man, "I've got a whole pocketful."—Kansas City Star.

"How is your courtship coming along?" "Oh, fairly well." "Are you getting any nearer her father?" "A trifle since fall began. We've moved in from the front veranda to the parlor and he's moved in from the back porch to the kitchen."—Washington Herald.

"How do you like this system by which you deposit your fare instead of waiting for the conductor to come and collect it?" "First rate," answered Mr. Groucher. "But why don't they go a little further and put in a treadmill so that the passengers can furnish their own power?"—Washington Star.

A group of politicians agreed to go on a fishing expedition to Florida if the late election turned their way. "Well," inquired an outsider, "if it is on the program, I am going to Florida to hunt if you win, what'll you do if you lose?" "Oh," replied one of the statesmen carelessly, "I guess we'll go down on Salt river and fish!"—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"Look here, uncle," said the impecunious young man, "you've promised to give me all your money when you die, haven't you?" "Yes." "Well, why wait? Give me a little of it now, and I'll pray every night that you may live long, and be happy." "I'll tell you what I'll do. You pray every night for six months that you may develop a liking for work and if at the end of that time it appears that your prayers are worth bargaining for, I'll take your proposition under consideration."—Chicago Record-Herald.

A minister, frequently away from home, was in the habit of getting some one to stay with his wife and small daughter in his absence. Once, however, he went so unexpectedly and hurriedly that he had no time to make such provision for them. The wife was very brave until night came, when her courage began to fail. After exhausting every reasonable excuse for staying up, she put the child to bed with the injunction to pray especially for God's protection during her father's absence. "Yes, mother, we will do that to-night," said the little girl, "but the next time we will make better arrangements."—Delineator.

Not long since a devotee was overheard interpreting to a poor woman the ceremony accompanying the penance of Ash Wednesday. The priest on that day, as he marks the penitent's forehead with ashes, pronounces the text, "Pulvis es et in pulverem reverteris" (Dust thou art and to dust thou shalt return). On coming out of chapel, this poor woman asked the devotee what the words were. "They're Latin; that's what they are." "But what do they mean?" Sure it's what they mean," said the Ash Wednesday devotee. "They're the manin' of it?" "Oh, the manin' of it. Well, it's this way, it is. It manes, in a way of speakin', 'If it don't do you no good, it won't do you no harm.'"—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

added, we expect these college men to spend at least a full year on the farm and so round out their technical and scientific training.

The field of direct influence of the college in the great educational movement for rural progress is limited—limited to the students of the three sorts above named who come to it, to the adults reached in farmers' institutes and to those reached by our bulletins and correspondence. Somehow this rural education must filter down to the children in the schools. We must interest the teachers and gain their co-operation in the problem. To do this we have now under contemplation a summer course of three or four weeks for teachers. If our plans materialize we will ask them to come to the farm and throw open our gardens, laboratories and everything we have of use to help them teach a little agriculture in the little red school houses. Our men will be there to guide and instruct and inspire, and our dormitory and dining hall for their comfort.

Our motto is "Something for Everybody." We cannot realize it just now, for we have not sufficient equipment either material or human, but we are working toward it fast. The success of our republic is dependent upon an educated rural population. "Agriculture must be made to pay for itself in wealth, in opportunity, in contentment, in social position, sufficient to attract and to hold to it a class of intelligent, educated American citizens. This is an end vital to the preservation of American democratic ideals." This is the problem of rural progress. It demands the co-operation of all who love the soil and who love America.

("Reform of Law"—Concluded.)

state and nation. Then we shall have a legislative better than we sometimes have. Then we can rally behind the bar association a citizenship endorsing and, at the polls, supporting men and measures making for better laws and better government, and as I verily believe, making for the perpetuity, the integrity and the betterment of the states, as states, and for the perpetuity and splendor of the nation as a nation. Spain has just adopted such a compulsory voting law. Cannot we progress faster than Spain?

Let us consider these things, then, in that atmosphere, not merely as matters of lawyerlyship, but of lawyer-citizenship; not as mere matters of jurisprudence or legislation, but as matters of the power and possibilities of the collective will of an intelligent and great people moving on in this republic, striving to uplift the human level through better citizenship, better laws, better administration and better manhood. It is not easy, but it is worth while.

"Spelling is now absolutely no guide to pronunciation," said Professor Jones speaking on "Phonetics" at University College, London, recently. This is exemplified by a puzzle which required the word "fixture" to be spelt without using any of the letters in it. The answer is "physksha."

Potato could be spelt "ghoughphightheiteau," "gh" representing "p" in "hiccough," "ough"—"o" in "though," "phth"—"t" in "phthisis," "eigh"—"a" in "weigh," "tte"—"t" in "gazette," and "eau"—"o" in "beau."

How the State's Budget Is Made Up.

A government partakes of the nature of a family, and also something of the nature of a big business corporation. It partakes of the nature of a family in that it has a great many dependents to support, a great many innumerable mouths to feed, backs to clothe and heads that must have roofs kept over them. It partakes of the nature of a business concern in that it handles many millions of dollars, buys largely if it sells little, and hires a great deal of help. But government does not try to make money. It is content if it can make the money that is given it meet the necessities of its numerous and ever increasing family of dependents. There are those who think that government should undertake all gainful pursuits that have to do with production or distribution, in fact take the whole function of doing business into its own hands, but the majority is far from being convinced of the wisdom of this policy and state socialism is yet a long way off. A government lives on its income and its income is withdrawn from the people under it are minded to give it in the shape of taxes. Taxation itself will be the subject of a special lesson.

The legislature has control of the public purse. Everywhere in the world where free government has obtained any foothold it was over the issue as to who should control the purse and, step by step, the representatives of the people who pay the taxes have, in most countries, won that much of control. Therefore no dollar can be paid out of the state treasury without legislative sanction.

Sometimes before the legislature meets the state controller makes an estimate of the probable income and expenditure of the state government for the next two years, each fiscal year ending June 30th.

As soon as the legislature meets and organizes the state senate constitutes a finance committee of, usually, fifteen members and, for this committee, as strong and seasoned legislators as possible are selected. The assembly likewise selects a ways and means committee, also numbering fifteen strong men. The greatest honor to be conferred, next to being elected speaker, is to be selected as chairman of the committee on ways and means.

To these committees are referred all bills that carry appropriations. Also to these committees go all persons who want appropriations, especially the heads of state institutions and their local boards of managers.

Here lies an evil tendency in our institutional life. The state institutions of California are widely scattered and they are managed by localized boards of control. Precinct patriotism requires each community where is located a state institution to stand by, and pull for, that institution, and the assemblyman and senator from each such district is expected to act as a special pleader and worker for the home institution. Nothing is more natural, therefore, than that all such assemblymen and senators, from districts wherein state institutions are located, should stand together to help each other out in getting their bills through. This combination results in very generous appropriations being made for all state institutions, and encourages each such institution to ask for more and more. Nevertheless, the actual needs of all such institutions are so great that, even by this unfortunate process, they seldom get more money in the aggregate than they can make use of, although they do get more for some things and less for some others.

The appropriations for state government and state institutions go into one omnibus bill known as the general appropriation bill, setting out so much for each state office and so much for each state institution. Then the whole is totalled. The total is generally too big. What makes it too big? Well, it being bigger than the taxpayers will stand without turning out of office everybody who had anything to do with making it so big. It is the desire for re-election to senate and assembly, and for the success of the dominant party, that limits taxation. Nothing else does. The issue is: How much will the people stand and not kick us out? That is a question of judgment upon which, first the two committees mentioned, then both houses of the legislature and, finally, the governor of the state, take their guess. Having stuck their peg at what they think the people will stand, if the total be too great when all the items asked for are in (and it always is) the pruning process begins. Estimates are cut down, items are cut out and the general appropriation bill brought within reasonable limits before passing the two houses. Then it goes to the governor and the constitution allows him to do with this bill, what he cannot do with any other, veto special items without vetoing the whole bill. By the time he gets through with it there is usually wailing and gnashing of teeth in the state institutions, for, as with individuals, so with institutions, they always want a lot of things that they have got to wait for until they are able to afford them.

The final act of legislation regarding the tax budget is to fix the amounts to be raised for each of the two succeeding fiscal years. These two sums the legislature fixes to a dollar. Afterwards, when the state assessment roll is made up and equalized, and 5 per cent. deducted to cover anticipated delinquencies, the net sum is divided into the sum that the legislature declared must be raised for the next year, after deducting anticipated receipts from other sources, and the quotient is the state rate of taxation.
